PREFACE

The purpose of this volume is to supply in convenient form a body of reading material suitable for use in a course of study dealing with the Romantic Movement in English literature. The selections included have been chosen with a two-fold intention: first, to provide in one book all the material, with the single exception of the novel, necessary to acquaint the student with the best and most characteristic work of the men who made the years 1798 to 1832 one of the notable epochs of English literature, secondly, to add to this body of prose and verse on which critical appreciation has set the seal of final approval, and which not to know is to argue oneself unknown, enough of what preceded and accompanied the triumph of the Romantic temper to show the inception of the Movement, its growth, its contrasts, its failings. Selections from Percy's Reliqués of Ancient English Poetry and from Scott's The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border are included because of the recognized influence of both of these collections upon the Romantic Movement, Percy and Scott were the most conspicuous of the group of antiquarians who were consciously concerned with the revival of interest in medieval ballads and romances. It seemed advisable also that the Gothic revival, another important phase of Romanticism, should be given representation, and therefore selections have been included from Walpole's The Castle of Otranto and from Beckford's The History of the Caliph Vathek. With these exceptions, the novelists have been excluded, inasmuch as a novel does not readily lend itself to selection, and had best be studied in its entirety.

It has been the aim to include, whenever possible, literary wholes, but in some cases the desire adequately to illustrate all the Romantic interests of a given writer has made it necessary to include only extracts from the longer works. But as a rule these extracts are distinctly characteristic in themselves as well as self-explanatory, where needed, summaries of omitted portions have been supplied in the notes. In the case of such works as Don Juan and The Prelude, enough is given to make the use of other books practically unnecessary. As it was impossible to give space to all of any one of Scott's longer poems, two cantos of The Lady of the Lake have been included as representative of this side of Scott's work. The complete poem, as well as Marmion, which is represented in the text only by songs, may easily be procured in cheap editions, if it is so desired.

The selections under each author are arranged in the order of writing, so far as this could be determined, except that in the case of writers from whom both poetry and prose are included, the selections of poetry are placed first. Dates of writing and publication, when known, are given at the beginning of each selection; dates of writing are printed in italics. Lines of verse are numbered as in the complete poems; dots are used to indicate editor's omissions; asterisks are used as the authors used them and usually denote that the selection in which they occur was left incomplete. Unless the original spelling is distinctly important, as it is in the case of Chatterton's poems, modern spelling is employed. In the references to pages in this volume, the letter a is used to indicate the first column on the page; the letter b, to indicate the second column. Brief glossarial notes are given at the foot of the page, additional notes, both explanatory and critical in character, are given in the Appendix, where are also to be found bibliographies and reference lists, selections from the writings of Pope, Johnson, and Burke, a table of important historical events and a list of English, German, and French writers of the period, a glossary of proper names occurring in the text, and an index of authors, titles, first lines of poems, and first lines of lyrics found in the dramas and other long works printed in this volume

I wish to express my thanks to the Houghton Mifflin Company, to Ginn and Company, to the Macmillan Company, to the John Lane Company, and to E. P. Dutton and Company for the privilege of quoting extracts from their publications; to the Librarian of the Harvard University Library for the use of a number of books which otherwise would have been inaccessible to me, to Professor Arthur W. Craver, of Miami University, and to Professor George Benedict, of Brown University, for suggestions regarding individual writers and selections; to Miss Iva Firkins, of the Library of the University of Minnesota, and to Mr. R. L. Walkley, of the Minneapolis Public Library, for help in preparing the bibliographies, to several of my colleagues and students who have been generous of their time in supplying necessary information or other help, and especially to Professor Lindsay Todd Damon, of Brown University, whose careful supervision and keen critical judgment have made for countless improvements throughout the book.

In a book of this size and nature, it is extremely difficult to preserve complete consistency of treatment, and no doubt inaccuracies have resulted. I shall appreciate notification of any corrections which may occur to students or instructors using the volume

ENGLISH POETRY AND PROSE OF THE ROMANTIC MOVEMENT

I. EIGHTEENTH CENTURY FORERUNNERS

ANNE, COUNTESS OF WIN-CHILSEA (1661-1720)

THE TREE
1903

Fair tree, for thy delightful shade
 'T is just that some return be made;
 Sure some return is due from me
 To thy cool shadows and to thee.
 5 When thou to birds dost shelter give Thou music dost from them receive;
 If travellers beneath thee stay Till storms have worn themselves away,
 That time in praising thee they spend, 10 And thy protecting pow'r commend;
 The shepherd here, from scorching freed, Tunes to thy dancing leaves his reed, Whilst his lov'd nymph in thanks bestows
 Her flow'ry chaplets on thy boughs.
 15 Shall I then only silent be,
 And no return be made by me?
 No! let this wish upon thee wait,
 And still to flourish be thy fate;
 'To future ages mayst thou stand 20 Untouch'd by the rash workman's hand, Till that large stock of sap is spent Which gives thy summer's ornament;
 Till the fierce winds, that vainly strive To shock thy greatness whilst alive, 25 Shall on thy lifeless hour attend, Prevent¹ the axe, and grace thy end,
 Their scatter'd strength together call
 And to the clouds proclaim thy fall;
 Who then their ev'ning dew may spare, 30 When 'thou no longer art their care,
 But shalt, like ancient heroes, burn,
 And some bright hearth be made thy urn.

From THE PETITION FOR AN
1713

Give me, O indulgent Fate!
 Give me yet, before I die,
 A sweet, but absolute retreat,
 'Mongst paths so lost, and trees so high,

5 That the world may ne'er invade, Through such windings and such shade,
 My unshaken liberty.

No intruders thither come,
 Who visit, but to be from home;
 10 None who their vain moments pass,
 Only studious of their glass.
 News, that charm to list'ning ears,
 That false alarm to hopes and fears,
 That common theme for every fop, 15 From the statesman to the shop,
 In those coverts ne'er be spread.
 Of who's deceas'd, or who's to wed,
 Be no tidings thither brought,
 But silent, as a midnight thought, 20 Where the world may ne'er invade,
 Be those windings, and that shade!

Courteous Fate! afford me there A table spread without my care
 With what the neighb'ring fields impart, 25 Whose cleanliness be all its art.
 When of old the calf was drest —
 Tho' to make an angel's feast —
 In the plain, unstudied sauce Nor truffle,¹ nor morillia¹ was;
 30 Nor could the mighty patriarch's board
 One far-fetch'd ortolane² afford.
 Courteous Fate, then give me there Only plain and wholesome fare Fruits indeed, would Heaven bestow, 35 All, that did in Eden grow,—
 All, but the forbidden tree,
 Would be coveted by me:
 Grapes, with juice so crowded up
 As breaking² thro' the native cup; 40 Figs, yet growing, candied o'er By the sun's attracting power;
 Cherries, with the downy peach,
 All within my easy reach;
 Whilst, creeping near the humble ground, 45 Should the strawberry be found, Springing wheresoe'er I strayed,
 Thro' those windings and that shade.

¹ A kind of edible fungus ing, often served as a delicacy.

² A small bird, the common European bunt- as if about to break

For my garments, let them be What may with the time agree;
 50 Warm, when Phoebus does retire,
 And is ill-supplied by fire;
 But when he renews the year
 And verdant all the fields appear, Beauty every thing resumes, 55 Birds have dropt their winter-plumes;
 When the lily full display'd Stands in purer white array'd Than that vest which heretofore
 The luxurious monarch¹ wore 60 When from Salem's gates he drove To the soft retreat of love, Lebanon's all burnish'd house,
 And the dear Egyptian spouse,— Clothe me, Fate, tho' not so gay, 65 Clothe me light, and fresh as May.
 In the fountains let me view
 All my habit cheap and new,
 Such as, when sweet zephyrs fly,
 With their motions may comply, 70 Gently waving, to express Unaffected carelessness.
 No perfumes have there a part,
 Borrow'd from the chemist's art;
 But such as rise from flow'ry beds, 75 Or the falling jasmine sheds!
 'Twas the odor of the field Esau's rural coat did yield That inspir'd his father's prayer For blessings of the earth and air 80 Of gums or powders had it smelt,
 The supplanter, then unfelt,
 Easily had been descry'd
 For one that did in tents abide,
 For some beauteous handmaid's jov 85 And his mother's darling boy.²
 Let me then no fragrance wear
 But what the winds from gardens bear
 In such kind, surprising gales
 As gather'd from Fidentia's vales 90 All the flowers that in them grew;
 Which intermixing, as they flew,
 In wreathen garlands dropt again
 On Lucullus, and his men, Who, cheer'd by the victorious sight 95 Trebl'd numbers put to flight.
 Let me, when I must be fine,
 In such natural colors shine;
 Wove, and painted by the sun,
 Whose resplendent rays to shun, 100 When they do too fiercely beat,
 Let me find some close retreat
 Where they have no passage made Thro' those windings, and that shade

TO THE NIGHTINGALE 1713

Exert thy voice, sweet harbinger of Spring!
 This moment is thy time to sing,
 This moment I attend to praise,
 And set my numbers to thy lays.
 5 Free as thine shall be my song;
 As thy music, short, or long Poets, wild as thee, were born, Pleasing best when unconfin'd,
 When to please is least design'd, 10 Soothing but their cares to rest; Cares do still their thoughts molest,
 And still th' unhappy poet's breast, Like thine, when best he sings, is plac'd against a thorn¹
 She begins; let all be still!
 15 Muse, thy promise now fulfil!
 Sweet, oh! sweet, still sweeter yet!
 Can thy words such accents fit?
 Canst thou syllables refine, Melt a sense that shall retain 20 Still some spirit of the brain, Till with sounds like these it join?
 'Twill not be! then change thy note;
 Let division² shake thy throat.
 Hark! division now she tries, 25 Yet as far the muse outflies Cease then, prithee, cease thy tune; Trifler, wilt thou sing till June?
 Till thy bus'ness all lies waste,
 And the time of building's past!
 30 Thus we poets that have speech, Unlike what thy forests teach,
 If a fluent vein be shown That's transcendent to our own,
 Criticise, reform, or preach, 35 Or censure what we cannot reach

A NOCTURNAL REVERIE 1713

In such a night, when every louder wind
 Is to its distant cavern safe confin'd,
 And only gentle zephyr fans his wings,
 And lonely Philomel, still waking, sings, 5 Or from some tree, fam'd for the owl's delight,
 She, hollowing clear, directs the wand'rer right;
 In such a night, when passing clouds give place,
 Or thinly veil the Heav'n's mysterious face;
 When in some river, overhung with green,

¹ A popular superstition See Young's Night Thoughts, 1, 439 ff

² A series of notes to be sung in one breath to each syllable

10 The waving moon[^] and trembling leaves are seen;
When freshen'd grass now bears itself upright,
And makes cool banks to pleasing rest invite,
When spring the woodbine and the bramble-rose,
And where the sleepy cowslip shelter'd grows, 15 Whilst now a paler hue the foxglove takes,
Yet chequers still with red the dusky brakes,
When scatter'd glow-worms, but in twilight fine,
Show trivial beauties watch their hour to shine, Whilst Salusbury stands the test of every light 20 In perfect charms and perfect virtue bright,
When odors which declin'd repelling
day
Thro' temp'rate air uninterrupted stray, When darken'd groves their softest shadows wear,
And falling waters we distinctly hear; 25 When thro' the gloom more venerable shows
Some ancient fabric, awful in repose.
While sunburnt hills their swarthy looks conceal
And swelling havcocks thicken up the vale,
When the loos'd horse now, as his pasture leads,
30 Comes slowly grazing thro' th' adjoining meads,
Whose stealing pace, and lengthen'd shade we fear,
Till torn up forage in his teeth we hear,
When nibbling sheep at large pursue their food,
And unmolested kine re-chew the cud, 35 When curlews cry beneath the village-walls,
And to her straggling brood the partridge calls,
Their shortliv'd jubilee the creatures
keep,
Which but endures whilst tyrant-man does sleep;
When a sedate content the spirit feels.
40 And no fierce light disturb, whilst it reveals;
But silent musings urge the mind to seek Something too high for syllables to speak;

Till the free soul to a composes'dness charm'd,
Finding the elements of rage disarm'd, 45 O'er all below a solemn quiet grown, Joys in th' inferior world and thinks it like her own:
In such a night let me abroad remain Till morning breaks and all's confus'd
again;
Our cares, our toils, our clamors are renew'd, 50 Or pleasures, seldom reach'd, again pur-su'd

THOMAS PARNELL (1679-1718)

A FAIRY TALE

IN THE ANCIENT ENGLISH STYLE
1721

In Britain's isle and Arthur's days, When midnight faeries daunc'd the maze, Liv'd Edwin of the green;
Edwin, I wis,¹ a gentle youth,
5 Endow'd with courage, sense, and truth Though badly shap'd he been

His mountain back mote well be said
To measure heighth against his head,
And lift itself above:
10 Yet spite of all that nature did
To make his uncouth form forbid,
This creature dar'd to love.

He felt the charms of Edith's eyes, Nor wanted hope to gain the prize, 15 Could ladies look within;
But one Sir Topaz dress'd with art,
And, if a shape could win a heart,
He had a shape to win

Edwin, if right I read my song, 20 With slighted passion pac'd along All in the moony light:
'Twas near an old enchanted court, Where sportive faeries made resort
To revel out the night

25 His heart was drear, his hope was cross'd,
'Twas late, 'twas farr, the path was lost
That reach'd the neighbor-town;
With weary steps he quits the shades, Resolv'd, the darkling dome he treads, 30 And drops his limbs adown.

But scant he lays him on the floor,
When hollow winds remove the door,
¹ know

A trembling rocks the ground.
 And, well I ween¹ to count aright, 35 At once an hundred tapers light On all the walls around.

Now sounding tongues assail his ear, Now sounding feet approachen near,
 And now the sounds encrease, 40 And from the corner where he lay He sees a train profusely gay Come prancing o'er the place.

But, trust me, gentles, never yet
 Was dight² a masking half so neat, 45 Or half so rich before;
 The country lent the sweet perfumes,
 The sea the pearl, the sky the plumes,
 The town its silken store.

Now whilst he gaz'd, a gallant drest 50 In flaunting robes above the rest,
 With awfull accent cried,
 What mortal of a wretched mind,
 Whose sighs infect the balmy wind,
 Has here presumed to hide?

At this the swain, whose venturous soul
 No fears of magic art controul, Advanc'd in open sight, 55 "Nor have I cause of dread," he said,
 "Who view, by no presumption led, 60 Your revels of the night

" 'Twas grief for scorn of faithful love,
 Which made my steps unweeting³ love Amid the nightly dew."

'Tis well, the gallant cries again, 65 We faeries never injure men Who dare to tell us true.

Exalt thy love-dejected heart,
 Be mine the task, or ere we part,
 To make thee grief resign;
 70 Now take the pleasure of thy chance.
 Whilst I with Mab my partner dance,
 Be little Mable thine

He spoke, and all a sudden there Light musick floats in wanton air; 75 The monarch leads the queen;
 The rest their faerie partners found,
 And Mable trimly tript the ground With Edwin of the green.

The dauncing past, the board was laid, 80 And siker⁴ such a feast was made As heart and lip desire;

¹ think ² dressed

³ unknowing
⁴ certainly

Withouten hands the dishes fly,
 The glasses with a wish come nigh.
 And with a wish retire.

85 But now to please the faerie king, Full every deal¹ they laugh and sing,
 And antick feats devise;
 Some wind and tumble like an ape,
 And other-some transmute their shape 90 In Edwin's wondering eyes.

Till one at last that Robin hight,² Renown'd for pinching maids by night,
 Has hent³ him up aloof;
 And full against the beam he flung, 95 Where by the back the youth he hung
 To spraul unneath the roof.

From thence, "Reverse my charm," he cries,

"And let it fairly now suffice
 The gambol has been shown" 100 But Oberon answers with a smile, Content thee, Edwin, for a while,
 The vantage is thine own

Here ended all the phantome play;
 They smelt the fresh approach of day, 105 And heard a cock to crow;
 The whirling wind that bore the crowd
 Has clapp'd the door, and whistled loud,
 To warn them all to go.

Then screaming all at once they fly
 And all at once the tapers die;
 Poor Edwin falls to floor;
 Forlorn his state, and dark the place,
 Was never wight in sike⁴ a case
 Through all the land before.

115 But soon as Dan⁵ Apollo rose, Full jolly creature home he goes,
 He feels his back the less;
 His honest tongue and steady mind Han rid him of the lump behind 120 Which made him want success.

With lusty livelyhed⁶ he talks
 He seems a dauncing as he walks;
 His story soon took wind;
 And beauteous Edith sees the youth, 125 Endow'd with courage, sense, and truth,
 Without a bunch behind.

The story told, Sir Topaz mov'd,
 The youth of Edith erst approv'd,⁷

⁶ liveliness
⁷ the youth formerly approved by Edith

To see the revel scene:
 130 At close of eve he leaves his home,
 And wends to find the ruin'd dome
 All on the gloomy plain.

As there he bides, it so befell,
 The wind came rustling down a dell, 135 A shaking seiz'd the wall:
 Up spring the tapers as before,
 The faeries bragly¹ foot the floor,
 And musick fills the hall.

But certes² sorely sunk with woe 140 Sir Topaz sees the elfin show, His spirits in him die.
 When Oberon cries, "A man is near,
 A mortall passion, cleeped³ fear, Hangs flagging in the sky "'

145 With that Sir Topaz, hapless youth!
 In accents faltering ay for ruth Intreats them pity graunt,
 For als he been a mister wight⁴ Betray'd by wandering in the night 150 To tread the circled haunt

"Ah losell' vile!'" at once they roar,
 "And little skill'd of faerie lore.
 Thy cause to come we know,
 Now has thy kestrell⁵ courage fell, 155 And faeries, since a lie you tell,
 Are free to work thee woe "

Then Will,⁷ who bears the wispy fire
 To trail the swains among the mire,
 The captive upward flung, 160 There like a tortoise in a shop
 He dangled from the chamber-top, Where whilome Edwin hung

The revel now proceeds apace, Deffly⁸ they frisk it o'er the place, 165 They sit, they drink, and eat;
 The time with frolic mirth beguile,
 And poor Sir Topaz hangs the while Till all the rout retreat

By this the starrs began to wink.
 170 They shriek, they fly, the tapers sink.
 And down ydrops the knight.
 For never spell by faerie laid With strong enchantment bound a glade Beyond the length of night

 Till up the welkin² rose the day, Then deem'd the dole was o'er:
 But wot ye well his harder lot?
 His seely³ back the bunch has got 180 Which Edwin lost afore.

This tale a Sibyl-nurse⁴ ared;⁵
 She softly strok'd my youngling head,
 And when the tale was done,
 "Thus some are born, my son," she cries, 185 "With base impediments to rise,
 And some are born with none.

But virtue can itself advance To what the favorite fools of chance By fortune seem'd design'd;
 190 Virtue can gain the odds of fate,
 And from itself shake off the weight Upon th' unworthy mind."

A NIGHT-PIECE ON DEATH

By the blue taper's trembling light,
 No more I waste the wakeful night, Intent with endless view to pore
 The schoolmen and the sages o'er.
 5 Their books from wisdom widely stray,
 Or point at best the longest way.
 I'll seek a readier path, and go Where wisdom's surely taught below.

How deep von azure dyes the sky, 10 Where orbs of gold unnumber'd lie, While through their ranks in silver pride
 The nether crescent seems to glide!
 The slumbering breeze forgets to breathe,
 The lake is smooth and clear beneath, 15 Where once again the spangled show Descends to meet our eyes below.
 The grounds which on the right aspire,
 In dimness from the view retire:
 The left presents a place of graves, 20 Whose wall the silent water laves.
 That steeple guides thy doubtful sight
 Among the livid gleams of night.
 There pass, with melancholy state,
 By all the solemn heaps of fate, 25 And think, as softly-sad you tread Above the venerable dead,
 "Time was, like thee they life possess,
 And time shall be that thou shalt rest."

¹ afraid
² sky
³ poor
⁴ An old woman professing to have the gift of prophecy, like that ascribed to the ancient Sibyls ⁵ told

Those graves, with bending osier¹ bound, 30 That nameless heave the crumbled ground,
 Quick to the glancing thought disclose,
 Where toil and poverty repose.

The flat smooth stones that bear a name,
 The chisel's slender help to fame, 35 (Which ere our set of friends decay Their frequent steps may wear away,) A middle race of mortals own, Men, half ambitious, all unknown

The marble tombs that rise on high, 40 Whose dead in vaulted arches lie, Whose pillars swell with sculptur'd stones,
 Arms, angels, epitaphs, and bones,
 These, all the poor remains of state, Adorn the rich, or praise the great, 45 Who while on earth in fame they live,
 Are senseless of the fame they give.

Hah! while I gaze, pale Cynthia fades,
 The bursting earth unveils the shades!
 All slow, and wan, and wrapp'd with shrouds,

50 They rise in visionary crowds,
 And all with sober accent cry,
 "Think, mortal, what it is to die "

Now from yon black and funeral yew,²
 That bathes the charnel-house with dew, 55 Methinks I hear a voice begin, (Ye ravens, cease your croaking din, Ye tolling clocks, no time resound O'er the long lake and midnight ground!)
 It sends a peal of hollow groans.
 60 Thus speaking from among the bones

"When men my scythe and darts supply.
 How great a king of fears am I!
 They view me like the last of things.
 They make, and then they dread, my stings

65 Fools! if you less provok'd your fears.
 No more my specter-form appears.
 Death's but a path that must be trod.
 If man would ever pass to God;
 A port of calms, a state of ease 70 From the rough rage of swelling seas

"Why then thy flowing sable stoles.
 Deep pendant cypress,³ mourning poles,⁴ Loose scarfs to fall athwart thy weeds,

Long palls, drawn hearses, cover'd steeds,

75 And plumes of black, that, as they tread, Nod o'er the scutcheons of the dead?

"Nor can the parted body know, Nor wants the soul, these forms of woe,
 As men who long in prison dwell, 80 With lamps that glimmer round the cell, Whene'er their suffering years are run,
 Spring forth to greet the glittering sun
 Such joy, though far transcending sense,
 Have pious souls at parting hence 85 On earth, and in the body plac'd,
 A few, and evil years they waste;
 But when their chains are cast aside.
 See the glad scene unfolding wide, Clap the glad wing, and tower away, 90 And mingle with the blaze of day."

A HYMN TO CONTENTMENT 1721

Lovely, lasting peace of mind!
 Sweet delight of human-kind!
 Heavenly-born, and bred on high.
 To crown the favorites of the sky 5 With more of happiness below, Than victors in a triumph know!
 Whither, O whither art thou fled,
 To lay thy meek, contented head?
 What happy region dost thou please 10 To make the seat of calms and ease?

Ambition searches all its sphere
 Of pomp and state, to meet thee there Encreasing avarice would find Thy presence in its gold enshrin'd 15 The bold adventurer ploughs his way Through rocks amidst the foaming sea.
 To gain thy love, and then perceives Thou wert not in the rocks and waves
 The silent heart, which grief assails.
 20 Treads soft and lonesome o'er the vales Sees daisies open, rivers run.
 And seeks, as I have vainly done, Amusing thought, but learns to know That solitude's the nurse of woe 25 No real happiness is found In trailing purple o'er the ground;¹
 Or in a soul exalted high.
 To range the circuit of the sky.
 Converse with stars above, and know 30 All Nature in its forms below;
 The rest it seeks, in seeking dies,
 And doubts at last, for knowledge, rise

Lovely, lasting peace, appear!
 This world itself, if thou art here,

¹ willow

² The yew is a common tree in graveyards

³ A kind of thin cloth, often used for mourning

⁴ A pole (pile) is a fabric with a heavy nap

35 Is once again with Eden blest, And man contains it in his breast.

"Twas thus, as under shade I stood,
I sung my wishes to the wood,
And, lost in thought, no more perceiv'd 40 The branches whisper as they wav'd;
It seem'd as all the quiet place Confess'd the presence of the Grace.
When thus she spoke: "Go rule thy will;
Bid thy wild passions all be still, 45 Know God, and bring thy heart to know
The joys which from religion flow
Then every Grace shall prove its guest,
And I'll be there to crown the rest."

Oh! by yonder mossy seat, 50 In my hours of sweet retreat, Might I thus my soul employ With sense of gratitude and joy!
Rais'd as ancient prophets were,
In heavenly vision, praise, and prayer, 55 Pleasing all men, hurting none, Pleas'd and bless'd with God alone:
Then while the gardens take¹ my sight,
With all the colors of delight,
While silver waters glide along, 60 To please my ear, and court my song, I'll lift my voice, and tune my string,
And Thee, great Source of Nature, sing

The sun, that walks his airy way,
To light the world, and give the day, 65 The moon, that shines with borrow'd
light;

The stars, that gild the gloomy night;
The seas, that roll unnumber'd waves,
The wood, that spreads its shady leaves,
The field, whose ears conceal the grain.
70 The yellow treasure of the plain;

All of these, and all I see,
Should be sung, and sung by me:
They speak their Maker as they can,
But want and ask the tongue of man.

75 Go search among your idle dreams,
Your busy or your vain extremes,
And find a life of equal bliss,
Or own the next begun in this.

ALLAN RAMSAY (1686-1758)

THE HIGHLAND LADDIE

The Lawland lads think they are fine,
But O they're vain and idly gaudy;
How much unlike that gracefu' mien And manly looks of my Highland laddie!

Chorus

5 O my bonny, bonny Highland laddie!
My handsome, charming Highland laddie!
May Heaven still guard and love reward Our Lawland lass and her Highland
laddie!

If I were free at will to chuse 10 To be the wealthiest Lawland lady, I'd take young Donald without trews,¹ With bonnet blew and belted plaidy.

The brawest² beau in borrows town,³
In a' his aurs, with art made ready, 15 Compared to him, he's but a clown;
He's finer far in 's tartan⁴ plaidy.

O'er benty⁵ hill with him I'll run,
And leave my Lawland kin and dady;
Frae winter's cauld and summer's sun 20 He'll screen me with his Highland plaidy.

A painted room and silken bed
May please a Lawland laird and lady,
But I can kiss and be as glad Behind a bush in 's Highland plaidy.

25 Few compliments between us pass:
I ca' him my dear Highland laddie;
And he ca's me his Lawland lass, Syne rows⁶ me in his Highland plaidy.

Nae greater joy I'll e'er pretend 30 Than that his love prove true and steady,
Like mine to him, which ne'er shall end While Heaven preserve my Highland
laddie.

SWEET WILLIAM'S GHOST 1724

There came a ghost to Margret's door,
 With many a grievous grone,
 And ay he tirl'd at the pin,⁵ But answer made she none.

⁵ Is this my father Philip?
 Or is't my brother John?
 Or is't my true love Willie,

'Tis not thy father Philip, 10 Nor yet thy brother John.
 But 'tis thy true love Willie

O sweet Margret! O dear Margret!
 I pray thee speak to mee:
 15 Give me my faith and troth, Margret,

SCENE IV.

Behind a tree upon the plain,

Pate and his Peggy meet;

In love, without a vicious stain,

The bonny lass and cheerfu' awain Change vows an' kisses sweet.

 Thy cheek an' breast the finest flow'rs appear.

Thy words excel the maist delightfu' notes, 20 That warble thro' the merl or mavis' throats.
 Wi' thee I tent³ nae flow'rs that busk³ the field,
 Or riper berries that our mountains yield.

Bloom'd bonny on the muir⁷ an' rising fells,

Nae birns,⁸ or briers, or whins,⁹ e'er troubl'd me

PREFACE TO THE EVERGREEN 1724

I have observed that readers of the best and most exquisite discernment frequently complain of our modern writings as filled with affected delicacies and studied refinements, which they would gladly exchange for that natural strength of thought and simplicity of style our forefathers practiced. To such, I hope, the following collection of poems will not be displeasing.

When these good old bards wrote, we had not yet made use of imported trimming upon our clothes, nor of foreign embroidery in our writings. Their poetry ¹⁵ is the product of their own country, not

¹ loses
² have suffered

³ attempt

pilfered and spoiled in the transportation from abroad. Their images are native, and their landscapes domestic; copied from those fields and meadows we every day behold.

The morning rises (in the poet's description) as she does in the Scottish horizon. We are not carried to Greece or Italy for a shade, a stream, or a breeze. The groves rise in our own valleys; the rivers flow from our own fountains, and the winds blow upon our own hills. I find not fault with those things as they are in Greece or Italy; but with a Northern poet for fetching his materials from these places in a poem of which his own country is the scene, as our hymn-writers to the spring and makers of pastorals frequently do.

This miscellany will likewise recommend itself by the diversity of subjects and humor it contains. The grave description and the wanton story, the moral saying and the mirthful jest, will illustrate and alternately relieve each other.

The reader whose temper is splenored with the vices and follies now in fashion, may gratify his humor with the satires he will here find upon the follies and vices that were uppermost two or three hundred years ago. The man whose inclinations are turned to mirth will be pleased to know how the good fellow of a former age told his jovial tale; and the lover may divert himself with the old fashioned sonnet of an amorous poet in Queen Margaret and Queen Mary's days.¹ In a word, the following collection will be such another prospect to the eye of the mind as to the outward eye is the various meadow, where flowers of different hue and smell are mingled together in a beautiful irregularity.

I hope also the reader, when he dips into these poems, will not be displeased with this reflection, that he is stepping back into the times that are past and that exist no more. Thus, the manners and customs then in vogue, as he will find them here described, will have all the air and charm of novelty; and that seldom fails of exciting attention and pleasing the mind.

Besides, the numbers in which these images are conveyed, as they are not now commonly practiced, will appear new and amusing.

The different stanza and varied cadence will likewise much soothe and engage the ear, which in poetry especially must be always flattered. However, I do not expect that these poems should please everybody; nay, the critical reader must needs find several faults, for I own that there will be found in these volumes two or three pieces whose antiquity is their greatest value. Yet still I am persuaded there are many more that shall merit approbation and applause than censure and blame. The best works are but a kind of miscellany, and the cleanest corn is not without some chaff; no, not after often winnowing. Besides, dispraise is the easiest part of learning, and but at best the offspring of uncharitable wit. Every clown can see that the furrow is crooked; but where is the man that will plow me one straight?

There is nothing can be heard more silly than one's expressing his ignorance of his native language; yet, such there are who can vaunt of acquiring a tolerable perfection in the French or Italian tongues if they have been a fortnight in Paris, or a month in Rome. But show them the most elegant thoughts in a Scots dress, they as disdainfully as stupidly condemn it as barbarous. But the true reason is obvious: every one that is born never so little superior to the vulgar would fain distinguish themselves from them by some manner or other, and such, it would appear, cannot arrive at a better method. But this affected class of fops give no uneasiness, not being numerous; for the most part of our gentlemen, who are generally masters of the most useful and politest languages, can take pleasure (for a change) to speak and read their own.

maun she weep, lang maun she weep with dule⁵ and
sorrow,
And lang maun I nae mair weel be 20 Puing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow

For she has tint⁶ her luvver, luvver
dear,
Her luvver dear, the cause of sorrow;
And I hae slain the comliest swain That eir pu'd birks on the Braes of Yarrow

25 Why rins thy stream, O Yarrow, Yarrow, reid?
Why on thy braes heard the voice of sorrow?
And why yon melancholious weids Hung on the bonny birks of Yarrow?

What's yonder floats on the rueful rueful flude?
30 What's yonder floats? O dule and sorrow!

O 'tis he the comely swain I slew Upon the duleful Braes of Yarrow.

Wash, O wash his wounds, his wounds in tears,
His wounds in tears with dule and
sorrow;

35 And wrap his limbs in mourning weids,
And lay him on the Braes of Yarrow.

Then build, then build, ye sisters, sisters sad,
Ye sisters sad, his tomb with
sorrow;

And weep around in wae'ful wise His hapless fate on the Braes of Yarrow.

Curse ye, curse ye, his useless, useless shield,
My arm that wrought the deed of
sorrow,
The fatal spear that pierc'd his breast,
His comely breast on the Braes of Yarrow.

45 Did I not warn thee, not to, not to lue?
And warn from fight? but to my
sorrow
Too rashly bauld a stronger arm Thou mett'st, and fell'st on the Braes of Yarrow.

That slew my luvè on the Braes of Yarrow?
O Yarrow fields, may never, never 70 Nor dew thy tender blossoms cover For there was basely slain my luvè.

My luvè, as he had not been a lover
The boy put on his robes, his robes of green,
His purple vest, 'twas my awn sewing:
75 Ah! wretched me! I little, little kenn'd
He was in these to meet his ruin
The boy took out his milk-white, milk-white steed,
Unheedful of my dule and sorrow
But ere the to-fall' of the night 80 He lay a corps on the Braes of Yarrow
Much I rejoye'd that wae'ful, wae'ful
day,
I sang, my voice the woods returning:
But lang ere night the spear was flown,
That slew my luvè, and left me mourning.
- 85 What can my barbarous, barbarous father do,
But with his cruel rage pursue me?
My luvè's blood is on thy spear,
How canst thou, barbarous man, then wooe me?
My happy sisters may be, may be proud 90 With cruel and ungentle scoffin', May bid me seek on Yarrow's Braes
My luvè nailed in his coffin My brother Douglas may upbraid, upbraid,
And strive with threatening words to muve me.
95 My luvè's blood is on thy spear,
How canst thou ever bid me luvè
thee?
Yes, yes, prepare the bed, the bed of luvè.
With bridal sheets my body cover, Unbar, ye bridal maids, the door, 100 Let in the expected husband lover But who the expected husband husband is?
His hands, methinks, are bath'd in slaughter
Ah me! what ghastly specter's yon Comes in his pale shroud, bleeding after?
Pale as he is, here lay him, lay him
down,
O lay his cold head on my pillow.
Take aff, take aff, these bridal weeds,
And crown my careful head with willow Pale tho' thou art, yet best, yet best beluv'd,
O could my warmth to life restore
thee!
Yet lye all night between my breasts,
No youth lay ever there before thee Pale, pale indeed, O lovely, lovely youth!
Forgive, forgive so foul a slaughter And lye all night between my breasts;
No youth shall ever lye there after A Return, return, O mournful, mournful bride,
Return, and dry thy useless sorrow
Thy luvè heeds none of thy sighs, He lyes a corps on the Braes of Yarrow

4 And stood at William's feet.

Her face was like an April morn Clad in a wintry cloud;
And clay-cold was her lily hand 8 That held her sable shroud.

So shall the fairest face appear,
When youth and years are flown.
Such is the robe that kings must wear, 12 When death has reft their crown.

Her bloom was like the springing flower,
That sips the silver dew,
The rose was budded in her cheek, 16 Just opening to the view

But love had, like the canker-worm, Consumed her early prime,
The rose grew pale, and left her cheek, 20 She died before her time

"Awake!" she cried, "thy true love calls,
Come from her midnight grave
Now let thy pity hear the maid 24 Thy love refused to save.

"This is the dark and dreary hour
When injured ghosts complain; When yawning graves give up their dead,
28 To haunt the faithless swain

"Bethink thee, William, of thy fault, Thy pledge and broken oath!
And give me back my maiden vow.
32 And give me back my troth

"Why did you promise love to me.
And not that promise keep?
Why did you swear my eyes were bright, 36 Yet leave those eyes to weep?

"How could you say my face was fair,
And yet that face forsake?
How could you win my virgin heart, 40 Yet leave that heart to break?

"Why did you say my lip was sweet,
And make the scarlet pale?
And why did I, young, witless maid!
44 Believe the flattering tale?

"That face, alas! no more is fair,
Those lips no longer red:
Dark are my eyes, now closed in death, 48 And every charm is fled.

"The hungry worm my sister is;
This winding-sheet I wear:
And cold and weary lasts our night, 52 Till that last morn appear.

"But hark! the cock has warned me
hence;
A long and last adieu!
Come see, false man, how low she lies, 56 Who died for love of you."

The lark sung loud; the morning smiled
With beams of rosy red:
Pale William quaked in every limb, 60 And raving left his bed.

He hied him to the fatal place Where Margaret's body lay;
And stretched him on the green-grass turf
64 That wrapt her breathless clay

And thrice he called on Margaret's name,
And thrice he wept full sore;
Then laid his cheek to her cold grave, 68 And word spake never more!

THE BIRKS OF ENDERMAY

The smiling morn, the breathing spring, Invite the tuneful birds to sing:
And while they warble from each spray,
Love melts the universal lay.
5 Let us, Amanda, timely wise,
Like them improve the hour that flies;
And, in soft raptures, waste the day,
Among the shades of Endermay.

For soon the winter of the year.
10 And age, life's winter, will appear:
At this, thy living bloom must fade:
As that will strip the verdant shade.
Our taste of pleasure then is o'er;
The feather'd songsters love no more:
15 And when they droop, and we decay, Adieu the shades of Endermay!

GRONGAR HILL

1726

Silent nymph¹ with curious eye,
 Who, the purple ev'ning, lie On the mountain's lonely van,
 Beyond the noise of busy man, 5 Painting fair the form of things, While the yellow linnet sings,
 Or the tuneful nightingale Charms the forest with her tale,
 Come, with all thy various hues, 10 Come, and aid thy sister Muse;
 Now while Phoebus, riding high,
 Gives lustre to the land and sky,
 Grongar Hill invites my song,
 Draw the landskip bright and strong; 15 Grongar, in whose mossy cells, Sweetly musing Quiet dwells; Grongar, in whose silent shade,
 For the modest Muses made,
 So oft I have, the ev'ning still, 20 At the fountain of a rill, Sat upon a flow'ry bed,
 With my hand beneath my head, While stray'd my eyes o'er Towy's flood.
 Over mead and over wood, 25 From house to house, from hill to hill, Till Contemplation had her fill.
 About his chequer'd sides I wind,
 And leave his brooks and meads behind,
 And groves and grottoes where I lay, 30 And vistas² shooting beams of day Wide and wider spreads the vale,
 As circles on a smooth canal.
 The mountains round, unhappy fate!
 Sooner or later, of all height, 35 Withdraw their summits from the skies,
 And lessen as the others rise
 Still the prospect wider spreads, Adds a thousand woods and meads;
 Still it widens, widens still,
 40 And sinks the newly-risen hill
 Now I gain the mountain's brow,
 What a landskip lies below!
 No clouds, no vapors intervene;
 But the gay, the open scene 45 Does the face of Nature show
 In all the hues of heaven's bow.
 And, swelling to embrace the light, Spreads around beneath the sight.
 Old castles on the cliffs arise, 50 Proudly tow'ring in the skies; Rushing from the woods, the spires Seem from hence ascending fires;
 Half his beams Apollo sheds

¹ The muse of painting² vistas, prospects

On the yellow mountain-heads, 55 Gilds the fleeces of the flocks,
 And glitters on the broken rocks.
 Below me trees unnumber'd rise, Beautiful in various dyes;
 The gloomy pine, the poplar blue, 60 The yellow beech, the sable yew,
 The slender fir, that taper grows,
 The sturdy oak with broad-spread boughs,
 And beyond the purple grove,
 Haunt of Phillis, queen of love!
 65 Gaudy as the op'ning dawn, Lies a long and level lawn,¹
 On which a dark hill, steep and high, Holds and charms the wand'ring eye Deep are his feet in Towy's flood, 70 His sides are cloth'd with waving wood,
 And ancient towers crown his brow,
 That cast an awful look below,
 Whose ragged walls the ivy creeps,
 And with her arms from falling keeps, 75 So both a safety from the wind On mutual dependence find.
 'Tis now the raven's bleak abode;
 'Tis now th' apartment of the toad;
 And there the fox securely feeds, 80 And there the poisonous adder breeds.
 Conceal'd in ruins, moss, and weeds;
 While, ever and anon, there falls Huge heaps of hoary moulder'd walls.
 Yet Time has seen, that lifts the low, 85 And level lays the lofty brow,
 Has seen this broken pile compleat,² Big with the vanity of state.
 But transient is the smile of Fate!
 A little rule, a little sway, 90 A sunbeam in a winter's day,
 Is all the proud and mighty have Between the cradle and the grave.
 And see the rivers how they run Thro' woods and meads, in shade and sun!
 95 Sometimes swift and sometimes slow, Wave succeeding wave, they go A various journey to the deep,
 Like human life to endless sleep.
 Thus is Nature's vesture wrought, 100 To instruct our wand'ring thought;
 Thus she dresses green and gay,
 To disperse our cares away.
 Ever charming, ever new,
 When will the landskip tire the view!
 105 The fountain's fall, the river's flow,
 The woody valleys warm and low;
 The windy summit, wild and high,
 Roughly rushing on the sky!
 The pleasant seat, the ruin'd tow'r,

- 110 The naked rock, the shady bow'r;
The town and village, dome and farm,
Each give each a double charm,
As pearls upon an Ethiop's arm
See on the mountain's southern side, 115 Where the prospect opens wide,
Where the ev'ning gilds the tide,
How close and small the hedges lie!
What streaks of meadows cross the eye!
A step, methinks, may pass the stream, 120 So little distant dangers seem,
So we mistake the Future's face, Ey'd thro' Hope's deluding glass,
As yon summits soft and fair,
Clad in colors of the air, 125 Which, to those who journey near,
Barren, brown, and rough appear;
Still we tread the same coarse way;
The present's still a cloudy day
O may I with myself agree, 130 And never covet what I see,
Content me with an humble shade,
My passions tam'd, my wishes laid;
For while our wishes wildly roll,
We banish quiet from the soul, 135 'Tis thus the busy heat the air,
And misers gather wealth and care
Now, ev'n now, my joys run high,
As on the mountain-turf I lie,
While the wanton Zephyr sings, 140 And in the vale perfumes his wings,
While the waters murmur deep,
While the shepherd charms¹ his sheep,
While the birds unbounded fly,
And with music fill the sky,
145 Now, ev'n now, my joys run high Be full, ye courts¹ be great who will:
Search for Peace with all your skill Open wide the lofty door, Seek her on the marble floor 150 In vain ye search, she is not there,
In vain ye search the domes of Care!
Grass and flowers Quiet treads,
On the meads and mountain-heads,
Along with Pleasure close ally'd, 155 Ever by each other's side,
And often, by the murm'ring rill, Hears the thrush, while all is still,
Within the groves of Orongar Hill

From BOOK I

- Ah, gentle shepherd, thine the lot to tend 400 Of all, that feel distress, the most assail'd,

¹ controls or calms by playing upon his pipe

- Feeble, defenceless: lenient be thy care:
But spread around thy tenderest diligence
In flow'ry spring-time, when the newdropt lamb,
Tottering with weakness by his mother's side, 405 Feels the fresh world about him, and each thorn,
Hillock, or furrow, trips his feeble feet Oh, guard his meek sweet innocence from all
Th' innumerable ills, that rush around his life,
Mark the quick kite, with beak and talons prone,
410 Circling the skies to snatch him from the plain;
Observe the lurking crows, beware the brake,
There the sly fox the careless minute waits,
Nor trust thy neighbor's dog, nor earth, nor sky.
Thy bosom to a thousand cares divide 415 Eurus oft sings his hail, the tardy fields Pay not their promised food; and oft the dam O'er her weak twins with empty udder mourns,
Or fails to guard, when the bold bird of prey Alights, and hops in many turns around, 420 And tires her also turning: to her aid Be nimble, and the weakest in thine arms Gently convey to the warm cote, and oft, Between the lark's note and the nightingale's,
His hungry bleating still with tepid milk:
425 In this soft office may thy children join,
And charitable habits learn in sport.
Nor yield him to himself, ere vernal airs Sprinkle thy little croft with daisy flowers.
Nor yet forget him: life has rising ills:
430 Various as ether¹ is the pastoral care.
Through slow experience, by a patient
breast,
The whole long lesson gradual is attained.
By precept after precept, oft received With deep attention: such as Nuceus sings 435 To the full vale near Soare's enamor'd brook,
While all is silence: sweet Hincklean swain!

¹ The substance supposed to fill the upper regions of space

Whom rude obscurity severely clasps:
The muse, howe'er, will deck thy simple cell

With purple violets and primrose flowers, 440 Well-pleased thy faithful lessons to re-pav.

JAMES THOMSON (1700-1748)

THE SEASONS

From WINTER
1725 1728

See, Winter comes to rule the varied
year,

Sullen and sad, with all his rising train—Vapors, and clouds, and storms. Be these my theme,

These, that exalt the soul to solemn thought

5 And heavenly musing. Welcome. kindred glooms!

Cogent¹ horrors, hail! With frequent foot,

Pleased have I, in my cheerful morn of
life,

When nursed by careless solitude I lived And sung of Nature with unceasing joy.

10 Pleased have I wandered through your rough domain,

Trod the pure virgin-snow, myself as pure;

Heard the winds roar, and the big torrent burst;

Or seen the deep-fermenting tempest brewed

In the grim evening-sky Thus passed the time,

15 Till through the lucid chambers of the south

Looked out the joyous Spring—looked out and smiled.

Then comes the father of the tempest
forth,

Wrapt in black glooms First, joyless rains obscure

Drive through the mingling skies with vapor foul,

75 Dash on the mountain's brow, and shake the woods

That grumbling wave below The unsightly plain

Lies a brown deluge; as the low-bent clouds

Pour flood on flood, yet unexhausted still Combine, and, deepening into night, shut up

¹ congenial

80 The day's fair face. The wanderers of
heaven,
Each to his home, retire; save those that love

To take their pastime in the troubled air, Or skimming flutter round the dimply pool.

The cattle from the untasted fields return 85 And ask, with meaning low, their wonted stalls,

Or ruminant in the contiguous shade Thither the household feathery people
crowd,

The crested cock, with all his female
train,

Pensive and dripping, while the cottagehind

90 Hangs o'er the enlivening blaze, and tales there

Recounts his simple frolic much he talks,

And much he laughs, nor reckes the storm that blows

Without, and rattles on his humble roof Wide o'er the brim, with many a torrent swelled,

95 And the mixed run of its banks o'er-spread,

At last the roused-up river pours along Resistless, roaring, dreadful, down it comes,

From the rude mountain and the mossy wild,

Tumbling through rocks abrupt, and sounding far,

100 Then o'er the sanded valley floating spreads,

Calm, sluggish, silent; till again, constrained

Between two meeting hills, it bursts a way

Where rocks and woods o'erhang the turbid stream;

There, gathering triple force, rapid and deep,

105 It boils, and wheels, and foams, and thunders through

Ah! little think the gay licentious
proud,

Whom pleasure, power, and affluence surround—

They, who their thoughtless hours in giddy mirth,

325 And wanton, often cruel, riot waste—Ah! little think they, while they dance along,

How many feel, this very moment, death
And all the sad variety of pain;

- How many sink in the devouring flood, 330 Or more devouring flame; how many bleed,
 By shameful variance betwixt man and
 man;
 How many pine in want, and dungeonglooms,
 Shut from the common air and common use
 Of their own limbs, how many drink the cup 335 Of baleful grief, or eat the bitter bread Of misery, sore pierced by wintry winds,
 How many shrink into the sordid hut
 Of cheerless poverty, how many shake
 With all the fiercer tortures of the mind.
 340 Unbounded passion, madness, guilt, remorse—Whence, tumbled headlong from the height of life,
 They furnish matter for the tragic muse, Even in the vale, where wisdom loves to dwell,
 With friendship, peace, and contemplation joined,
 345 How many, racked with honest passions, droop
 In deep retired distress, how many stand Around the death-bed of their dearest friends,
 And point the parting anguish! Thought 350 fond man
 Of these, and all the thousand nameless ills 350 That one incessant struggle render life.
 One scene of toil, of suffering, and of fate,
 Vice in his high career would stand appalled,
 And heedless rambling Impulse learn to think;
 The conscious heart of Charity would warm, 355 And her wide wish Benevolence dilate, The social tear would rise, the social sigh;
 And, into clear perfection, gradual
 bliss,
 Refining still the social passions work And here can I forget the generous band 360 Who, touched with human woe, redressive 516 searched
 Into the horrors of the gloomy jail!

¹ A committee appointed in 1729 to investigate the conditions of jails and prisons, who discovered that the wardenship of prisons were bought by men who were accustomed to exact heavy fees from prisoners on the penalty of severe punishment

Unpitied and unheard where misery moans,
 Where sickness pines, where thirst and hunger burn,
 And poor misfortune feels the lash of vice;
 365 While in the land of liberty—the land Whose every street and public meeting glow
 With open freedom—little tyrants raged, Snatched the lean morsel from the starving mouth,
 Tore from cold wintry limbs the tattered weed, 370 Even robbed them of the last of comforts, sleep,
 The free-born Briton to the dungeon chained
 Or, as the lust of cruelty prevailed, At pleasure marked him with inglorious stripes,
 And crushed out lives, by secret barbarous ways, 375 That for their country would have toiled or bled.
 O great design! if executed well,
 With patient care and wisdom-tempered zeal
 Ye sons of mercy! yet resume the search;
 Drag forth the legal monsters into light, 380 Wrench from their hands Oppression's iron rod,
 And bid the cruel feel the pains they give Much still untouched remains, in this rank age,
 Much is the patriot's weeding hand required.
 The toils of law—what dark insidious men 385 Have cumbrous added to perplex the truth
 And lengthen simple justice into trade—How glorious were the day that saw these broke,
 And every man within the reach of right!

From SUMMER
 1726 1727

Still let me pierce into the midnight depth
 Of yonder grove, of wildest largest growth,
 That, forming high in air a woodland
 quire,
 Nods o'er the mount beneath At every step,

- 520 Solemn and slow the shadows blacker
fall,
And all is awful listening gloom around.
These are the haunts of meditation,
these
The scenes where ancient bards the inspiring breath Ecstatic felt, and, from this world retired, 525 Conversed with angels and immortal forms,
On gracious errands bent—to save the fall
Of virtue struggling on the brink of vice;
In waking whispers and repeated dreams To hint pure thought, and warn the favored soul, 530 For future trials fated, to prepare.
To prompt the poet, who devoted gives His muse to better themes, to soothe the pangs
Of dying worth, and from the patriot's
breast 535 (Backward to mingle in detested war, But foremost when engaged) to turn the
death;
And numberless such offices of love,
Daily and nightly, zealous to perform.
540 Thus up the mount, in airy vision rapt, I stray, regardless whither, till the sound
Of a near fall of water every sense Wakes from the charm of thought swift-shrinking back, I check my steps and view the broken
scene.
550 Smooth to the shelving brink a copious flood Rolls fair and placid, where, collected
all
In one impetuous torrent, down the steep It thundering shoots, and shakes the country round
At first, an azure sheet, it rushes broad, 571 555 Then, whitening by degrees as prone it falls,
And from the loud-responding rocks
below
Dashed in a cloud of foam, it sends aloft
A hoary mist and forms a ceaseless 575 shower
Nor can the tortured wave here find repose;
600 But, raging still amid the shaggy rocks, Now flashes o'er the scattered fragments, now
Aslant the hollow channel rapid darts;
And, falling fast from gradual slope to slope,
With wild infracted course and lessened roar
605 It gains a safer bed, and steals at last Along the mazes of the quiet vale.
Invited from the cliff, to whose dark brow
He clings, the steep-ascending eagle soars
With upward pinions through the flood of day,
610 And, giving full his bosom to the blaze, Gains on the Sun; while all the tuneful
race,
Smit by afflictive noon, disordered droop Deep in the thicket, or, from bower to bower
Responsive, force an interrupted strain.
615 The stock-dove only through the forest coos, Mournfully hoarse, oft ceasing from his plaint,
Short interval of weary woe! again
The sad idea of his murdered mate, Struck from his side by savage fowler's quile, 620 Across his fancy comes, and then re-sounds
A louder song of sorrow through the grove
Beside the dewy border let me sit,
All in the freshness of the humid air,
There on that hollowed rock, grotesque and wild, 625 An ample chair moss-lined and over head
By flowering umbrage shaded, where the bee Strays diligent, and with the extracted balm
Of fragrant woodbine leads his little thigh
The Sun has lost his rage, his downward orb Shoots nothing now but animating warmth
And vital lustre; that with various ray, Lights up the clouds, those beauteous robes of heaven,
Incessant rolled into romantic shapes,
The dream of waking fancy! Broad
below,
Covered with ripening fruits, and swelling fast
Into the perfect year, the pregnant earth And all her tribes rejoice. Now the soft hour

1380 Of walking comes for him who lonely loves To seek the distant hills, and there converse

With nature, there to harmonize his heart,
And in pathetic song to breathe around The harmony to others. Social friends,

1385 Attuned to happy unison of soul—
To whose exulting eye a fairer world,
Of which the vulgar never had a glimpse, Displays its charms, whose minds are richly fraught

With philosophic stores, superior light, 1390 And in whose breast enthusiastic burns Virtue, the sons of interest deem romance—

Now called abroad, enjoy the falling day
• Now to the verdant portico of woods,
To nature's vast lyceum, forth they walk;

1395 By that kind school where no proud master reigns.

The full free converse of the friendly heart,

Improving and improved Now from the world,

Sacred to sweet retirement, lovers steal.
And pour their souls in transport, which the sire

1400 Of love approving hears, and calls it good

FROM AUTUMN
1730

950 But see the fading many-colored woods, Shade deepening over shade, the country round

Imbrown; a crowded umbrage, dusk and dun,

Of every hue from wan declining green To sooty dark. These now the lonesome muse,

955 Low-whispering, lead into their leaf strewn walks,

And give the season in its latest view Meantime, light shadowing all, a sober calm

Fleeces' unbounded ether, whose least wave

Stands tremulous, uncertain where to turn

960 The gentle current; while, illumined wide,
The dewy-skated clouds mumble the sun,
And through their lucid veil his softened force

Shed o'er the peaceful world Then is the time

For those whom wisdom and whom nature charm

965 To steal themselves from the degenerate
crowd,

And soar above this little scene of things—

To tread low-thoughted vice beneath their feet,

To soothe the throbbing passions into peace,

And woo lone Quiet in her silent walks.

970 Thus solitary, and in pensive guise, Oft let me wander o'er the russet mead,

And through the saddened grove, where scarce is heard

One dying strain to cheer the woodman's toll

Haply some widowed songster pours his
plaint

975 Far in faint warblings through the tawny¹ copse;

While congregated thrushes, linnets, larks,

And each wild throat whose artless strains so late

Swelled all the music of the swarming shades,

Robbed of their tuneful souls, now shivering sit

980 On the dead tree, a dull despondent flock,

With not a brightness waving o'er their plumes,

And naught save chattering discord in their note.

Oh, let not, aimed from some inhuman
eye,

The gun the music of the coming year 985 Destroy, and harmless, unsuspecting harm,

Lay the weak tribes, a miserable prey, In mingled murder fluttering on the ground¹

The pale descending year, yet pleasing
still,

A gentler mood inspires, for now the leaf

990 Incessant rustles from the mournful
grove,

Oft startling such as studious walk below,

And slowly circles through the waving air.

But, should a quicker breeze amid the boughs

Sob, o'er the sky the leafy deluge streams.

995 Till, choked and matted with the dreary
shower,

The forest-walks, at every rising gale, Roll wide the wither'd waste, and whistle bleak.

- Fled is the blasted verdure of the fields;
And, shrunk into their beds, the flowery
1000 Their sunny robes resign. Even what remained
Of bolder fruits falls from the naked
 tree;
And—woods, fields, gardens, orchards, all around—
The desolated prospect thrills the soul
 He comes! he comes! in every breeze
 the Power 1005 Of Philosophic Melancholy comes!
His near approach the sudden-starting tear,
The glowing cheek, the mild dejected air.
The softened feature, and the beating
 heart,
Pierced deep with many a virtuous pang.
 declare 1010 O'er all the soul his sacred influence breathes;
Inflames imagination, through the breast Infuses every tenderness, and far Beyond dim earth exalts the swelling
 thought.
Ten thousand thousand fleet ideas, such 1015 As never mingled with the vulgar dream.
'Trowd fast into the mind's creative eye
As fast the correspondent passions rise.
As varied, and as high—devotion raised To rapture, and divine astonishment; 1020 The love of nature unconfin'd, and, chief,
Of human race; the large ambitious wish To make them blest, the sigh for suffering worth Lost in obscurity, the noble scorn Of tyrant pride, the fearless great resolve.
1025 The wonder which the dying patriot
 drew,
Inspiring glory through remotest time.
The awakened throb for virtue and for fame;
The sympathies of love and friendship
 dear,
With all the social offspring of the heart 1030 Oh! bear me then to vast embowering shades.
To twilight groves, and visionary vales,
To weeping grottoes, and prophetic
 glooms;
Where angel forms athwart the solemn dusk, Tremendous, sweep, or seem to sweep
 along;
1035 And voices more than human, through the void
Deep-sounding, seize the enthusiastic ear
- Meanwhile the moon, Full-orbed and breaking through the scattered clouds, 1090 Shows her broad visage in the crimsoned east.
Turned to the sun direct, her spotted disk (Where mountains rise, umbrageous dales descend,
And caverns deep, as optic tube descends)
A smaller earth, gives all his blaze
 again.
1095 Void of its flame, and sheds a softer
 day
Now through the passing cloud she seems to stoop.
Now up the pure cerulean rides sublime Wide the pale deluge floats, and streaming mild O'er the skied mountain to the shadow'd vale, 1100 While rocks and floods reflect the quivering gleam,
The whole air whitens with a boundless tide
Of silver radiance trembling round the
 world.
- O Nature! all-sufficient! over all Enrich me with the knowledge of thy works,
Snatch me to heaven thy rolling wonders there,
1355 World beyond world, in infinite extent Profusely scattered o'er the blue immense.
Show me, their motions, periods, and their laws
Give me to scan, through the disclosing
 deep Light my blind way the mineral strata
 there,
1360 Thrust blooming thence the vegetable
 world.
O'er that the rising system, more complex,
Of animals; and, higher still, the mind,
The varied scene of quick-compounded
 thought,
And where the mixing passions endless shift;
1365 These ever open to my ravished eye—A search, the flight of time can ne'er exhaust!
But, if to that unequal—if the blood
In sluggish streams about my heart forbid
That best ambition—under closing shades 1370 Inglorious lay me by the lowly brook,

And whisper to my dreams. From thee begin,
Dwell all on thee, with thee conclude my song;
And let me never, never stray from thee!

A HYMN ON THE SEASONS

1730

These, as they change, Almighty Father!
these
Are but the varied God. The rolling year Is full of thee Forth in the pleasing
spring
Thy beauty walks, thy tenderness and love.
5 Wide flush the fields, the softening air is balm, Echo the mountains round, the forest smiles,
And every sense, and every heart, is joy Then comes thy glory in the summer-months,
With light and heat refulgent! Then thy sun 10 Shoots full perfection through the swelling year
And oft thy voice in dreadful thunder speaks,
And oft, at dawn, deep noon, or falling eve,
By brooks and groves, in hollow-whispering gales
Thy bounty shines in autumn unconfined, 15 And spreads a common feast for all that lives.
In winter awful thou! with clouds and storms
Around thee thrown, tempest o'er tempest rolled,
Majestic darkness! on the whirlwind's

Riding sublime, thou bidst the world adore.
20 And humblest nature with thy northern

Beneath the spacious temple of the

Oh! talk of him in solitary glooms, Where, o'er the rock, the scarcely-wating pine Fills the brown shade with a religious 45 And ye, whose bolder note is heard afar,

Who shake the astonished world, lift

The impetuous song, and say from whom you rage.
His praise, ye brooks, attune, ye trem-

And let me catch it as I muse along.
50 Ye headlong torrents, rapid and pro-

Ye softer floods, that lead the humid
Along the vale; and thou, majestic main,
A secret world of wonders in thyself, Sound his stupendous praise, whose 55 Or bids you roar or bids your roarings

fall
Soft roll your incense, herbs, and fruits, and flowers,
In mingled clouds to him, whose sun

As home he goes beneath the joyous moon.
Ye that keep watch in heaven, as earth asleep Unconscious lies, effuse¹ your mildest beams, Ye constellations! while your angels strike

While cloud to cloud returns the solemn hymn.
Bleat out afresh, ye hills, ye mossy rocks, Retain the sound, the broad responsive low, Ye valleys, raise; for the Great Shepherd reigns,

Ye, chief, for whom the whole creation smiles,
At once the head, the heart, the tongue of all, Crown the great hymn! In swarming cities vast, Assembled men, to the deep organ join

At solemn pauses through the swelling bass;
And, as each mingling flame increases each,

THE CASTLE OF INDOLENCE

1736-48 1748

From CANTO I

The Castle high! of Indolence, And its false luxury, alas!
Where for a little time alas!
We lived right jollily

O mortal man, who livest here by toil,
Do not complain of this thy hard estate,
That like an emmet² thou must ever moil

Is a sad sentence of an ancient date.³

³ "In the sweet of thy face shalt thou eat bread."—Genesis, 3: 10

- 5 And, certes, there is for it reason great;
For, though sometimes it makes thee weep and wail,
And curse thy stars, and early drudge and late,
Withouten that would come an heavier bale,
Loose life, unruly passions, and diseases pale.
- 10 In lowly dale, fast by a river's side, With woody hill o'er hill encompassed
round,
A most enchanting wizard did abide,
Than whom a fiend more fell is nowhere found
It was, I ween,¹ a lovely spot of
ground;
- 15 And there a season atween June and May,
Half pranked with spring, with summer half imbrowned,
A listless climate made, where, sooth to say,
No living wight could work, ne cared even for play.
- 20 Was nought around but images of rest Sleep-soothing groves, and quiet lawns between;
And flowery beds that slumbrous influence kest,²
From poppies breathed, and beds of pleasant green,
Where never yet was creeping creature
seen.
Meantime unnumbered glittering stream-lets played,
- 25 And hurled everywhere their waters
sheen;
That, as they bickered through the sunny glade,
Though restless still themselves, a hulling murmur made
- Joined to the prattle of the purling
rills,
Were heard the lowing herds along
the vale,
30 And flocks loud-bleating from the distant hills,
And vacant³ shepherds piping in the dale.
And now and then sweet Philomel would wail.
Or stock-doves plain amid the forest
deep,
- That drowsy rustled to the sighing
gale;
35 And still a coil the grasshopper did keep;
Yet all these sounds yblent⁴ melted all to sleep.
- Full in the passage of the vale, above,
A sable, silent, solemn forest stood, Where nought but shadowy forms were seen to move, 40 As Idless fancied in her dreaming mood.
And up the hills, on either side, a wood Of blackening pines, ay waving to and fro,
Sent forth a sleepy horror through the blood;
And where this valley winded out,
below,
45 The murmuring main was heard, and scarcely heard, to flow
- A pleasing land of drowsyhed it was.
Of dreams that wave before the halfshut eye,
And of gay castles in the clouds that pass,
For ever flushing round a summer sky.
50 There eke the soft delights, that witchingly Instil a wanton sweetness through the
breast,
And the calm pleasures always hovered nigh;
But whate'er smacked of noyance, or unrest,
Was far far off expelled from this delicious nest
- 55 The landskip such, inspiring perfect
ease,
Where Indolence (for so the wizard light)⁵
Close-hid his castle mid embowering
trees,
That half shut out the beams of Phoebus bright,
And made a kind of checkered day
and night
60 Meanwhile, unceasing at the massy gate,
Beneath a spacious palm, the wicked wight
Was placed, and, to his lute, of cruel fate
And labor harsh complained, lamenting man's estate

While o'er th' enfeebling lute his

And to the trembling chord these tempting verses sung:

"Behold! ye pilgrims of this earth,

A comely full-spread porter, awoln

210 His calm, broad, thoughtless aspect breathed repose,
And in sweet torpor he was plungèd his age

This boy he kept each band to disengage, Garters and buckles, tusk for him unfit,
But ill-becoming his grave personage, And which his portly paunch would not permit.
So this same limber page to all performèd it.
- Meantime the master-porter wide displayed Great store of caps, of slippers, and of gowns.
Wherewith he those who entered in arrayed, Loose as the breeze that plays along the downs,
And waves the summer woods when evening frowns
O fair undress, best dress! it checks

But every flowing limb in pleasure

And heightens ease with grace This Sir Porter sat him down, and turned to sleep again

- Thus easy robed, they to the fountain sped,
That in the middle of the court up threw
A stream, high-spouting from its liquid bed,
And falling back again in dizzily dew There each deep draughts, as deep he thirsted, drew,
It was a fountain of Nepenthe⁵ rare Whence, as Dan⁶ Homer sings,⁴ huge pleasance grew.

TELL ME, THOU SOUL OF HER I LOVE

Tell me, thou soul of her I love,
 Ah! tell me, whither art thou fled?
 To what delightful world above, Appointed for the happy dead?

5 Or dost thou flee at pleasure roam,
 And sometimes share thy lover's woe
 Where, void of thee, his cheerless home Can now, alas! no comfort know?

Oh! if thou hoverest round my walk, 10 While, under every well-known tree,
 I to thy fancied shadow talk,
 And every tear is full of thee—

Should then the weary eye of grief Beside some sympathetic stream 15 In slumber find a short relief, Oh, visit thou my soothing dream!

TO AMANDA

Come, dear Amanda, quit the town,
 And to the rural hamlets fly,
 Behold! the wintry storms are gone,
 A gentle radiance glads the sky

5 The birds awake, the flowers appear, Earth spreads a verdant couch for thee,
 'Tis joy and music all we hear,
 'Tis love and beauty all we see

Come, let us mark the gradual spring, 10 How peeps the bud, the blossom blow, Till Philomel begins to sing,
 And perfect May to swell the rose

Even so thy rising charms improve,
 As life's warm season grows more bright;

15 And, opening to the sighs of love, Thy beauties glow with full delight.

NIGHT THOUGHTS

1742

FROM NIGHT I. ON LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY

Tired nature's sweet restorer, balmy Sleep!
 He, like the world, his ready visit pays Where Fortune smiles; the wretched he forsakes, Swift on his downy pinion flies from woe, 5 And lights on lids unsullied with a tear.
 From short (as usual) and disturbed repose,
 I wake: how happy they who wake no more!
 Yet that were vain, if dreams infest the grave.
 I wake, emerging from a sea of dreams 10 Tumultuous, where my wrecked, desponding thought From wave to wave of fancied misery
 At random drove, her helm of reason lost;
 Though now restored, 'tis only change of pain,
 A bitter change! severer for severe.
 15 The day too short for my distress, and Night, Even in the zenith of her dark domain,
 Is sunshyne to the color of my fate.
 Night, sable goddess! from her ebon throne,
 In rayless majesty, now stretches forth 20 Her leaden scepter o'er a slumbering world.
 Silence how dead! and darkness how profound!
 Nor eye nor list'ning ear an object finds:
 Creation sleeps. 'Tis as the general pulse Of life stood still, and Nature made a pause, 25 An awful pause, prophetic of her end
 And let her prophecy be soon fulfilled!
 Fate, drop the curtain! I can lose no more.
 Silence and Darkness, solemn sisters, twins
 From ancient Night, who nurse the tender thought 30 To reason, and on reason build resolve (That column of true majesty in man), Assist me! I will thank you in the grave,
 The grave your kingdom; there this frame shall fall
 A victim sacred to your dreary shrine.

The bell strikes one: we take no note of time, 55 But from its loss. To give it, then, a tongue, Is wise in man. As if an angel spoke,
 I feel the solemn sound. If heard aright,
 It is the knell of my departed hours:
 Where are they? With the years beyond the flood.
 60 It is the signal that demands despatch;
 How much is to be done! my hopes and fears Start up alarmed, and o'er life's narrow verge Look down—on what? a fathomless abyss;
 A dread eternity; how surely mine!
 65 And can eternity belong to me.
 Poor pensioner on the bounties of an hour?
 How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
 How complicate, how wonderful, is man!
 How passing wonder He who made him such!
 70 Who centred in our make such strange extremes,
 From different natures marvellously mixed, Connection exquisite of distant worlds!
 Distinguished link in being's endless chain!
 Midway from nothing to the Deity!
 75 A beam ethereal, sullied, and absorpt!
 Though sullied and dishonored, still divine!
 Dim miniature of greatness absolute!
 An heir of glory! a frail child of dust!
 Helpless immortal! insect infinite!
 80 A worm! a god!—I tremble at myself,
 And in myself am lost! At home a stranger, Thought wanders up and down, surprised, aghast,
 And wondering at her own How reason reels!
 O, what a miracle to man is man!
 85 Triumphant distressed! What joy! what dread!
 Alternately transported and alarmed!
 What can preserve my life? or what destroy?
 An angel's arm can't snatch me from the grave;
 Legions of angels can't confine me there.
 The spritely lark's shrill matin wakes the morn.

Grief's sharpest thorn hard pressing on my breast,
 440 I strive, with wakeful melody, to cheer
 The sullen gloom, sweet Philomel! like
 thee,
 And call the stars to listen: every star
 Is deaf to mine, enamor'd of thy lay.
 Yet be not vain; there are, who thine excel, 445 And charm thro' distant ages wrapt in
 shade,
 'Pris'ner of darkness! to the silent hours,
 How often I repeat their rage divine 'To lull my griefs, and steal my heart from woe!
 I roll their raptures, but not catch their fire.
 450 Dark, tho' I not blind, like thee, Mæonides!
 Or, Milton! thee; ah could I reach your strain
 Or his, who made Mæonides our own.¹
 Man too he sung: immortal man I sing; Oft bursts my song beyond the bounds of life
 455 What, now, but immortality can please?
 O had he press'd his theme, pursu'd the track,
 Which opens out of darkness into day!
 O had he, mounted on his wing of fire, Soar'd where I sink, and sung immortal
 man!
 460 How had it blest mankind, and rescu'd me!

FROM NIGHT III NARCISSA

Then welcome, death! thy dread harbingers,
 Age and disease, disease, tho' long my guest;
 That plucks my nerves, those tender strings of life!
 490 Which, pluckt a little more, will toll the bell,
 That calls my few friends to my funeral;
 Where feeble nature drops, perhaps, a
 tear,
 While reason and religion, better taught.
 Congratulate the dead, and crown his tomb 495 With wreath triumphant. Death is victory;
 It binds in chains the raging ills of life
 Lust and ambition, wrath and avarice, Dragg'd at his chariot-wheel, applaud his power.
 That ills corrosive, cares importunate, 500 Are not immortal too, O death! is thine

¹ Pope, who translated the Odyssey and the Iliad of Homer.

Our day of dissolution!—name it right;
 'Tis our great pay-day; 'tis our harvest,
 rich
 And ripe: What tho' the sickle, sometimes keen,
 Just scars us as we reap the golden grain?
 505 More than thy balm, O Gilead! heals the wound
 Birth's feeble cry, and death's deep dismal groan,
 Are slender tributes low-taxt nature pays For mighty gain the gain of each, a
 life!
 But O! the last the former so transcends.
 510 Life dies, compar'd life lives beyond the grave
 And feel I, death! no joy from thought of thee,
 Death, the great counsellor, who man inspires
 With ev'ry nobler thought and fairer deed!
 Death, the deliverer, who rescues man!
 515 Death, the rewarder, who the rescu'd crowns!
 Death, that absolves my birth, a curse without it!
 Rich death, that realizes all my cares, Toils, virtues, hopes, without it a chimera!
 Death, of all pain the period, not of joy, 520 Joy's source, and subject, still subsist unhurt;
 One, in my soul, and one, in her great sire;
 Tho' the four winds were waiting for my dust
 Yes, and from winds, and waves, and central night,
 Tho' prison'd there, my dust too I reclaim, 525 (To dust when drop proud nature's proudest spheres.)
 And live entire Death is the crown of
 life.
 Were death denied, poor man would live
 in vain,
 Were death denied, to live would not be
 life;
 Were death denied, ev'n fools would wish to die.
 530 Death wounds to cure we fall, we rise, we reign!
 Spring from our fetters, fasten in the skies;
 Where blooming Eden withers in our sight:

¹ Genesis, 37: 25, Numbers, 32: 1-30

Death gives us more than was in Eden lost.
This king of terrors is the prince of peace.

535 When shall I die to vanity, pain, death?
When shall I die?—When shall I live for ever?

Darkness has more divinity for me;
It strikes thought inward, it drives back the soul

To settle on herself, our point supreme!
130 There lies our theatre! there sits our judge.

Darkness the curtain drops o'er life's dull scene;

'Tis the kind hand of Providence stretcht out

'Twixt man and vanity, 'tis reason's
reign,

And virtue's too; these tutelary shades 135 Are man's asylum from the tainted throng

Night is the good man's friend, and

It no less rescues virtue, than inspires

From NIGHT VI THE INFIDEL RECLAIMED

Our senses, as our reason, are divine.
But for the magic organ's powerful charm,

430 Earth were a rude, uncolor'd chaos still.
Objects are but th' occasion; ours th' exploit;

Ours is the cloth, the pencil, and the paint,

Which nature's admirable picture draws;
And beautifies creation's ample dome

435 Like Milton's Eve, when gazing on the lake,¹

Man makes the matchless image, man admires

Say then, shall man, his thoughts all sent abroad,

Superior wonders in himself forgot,
His admiration waste on objects round,

440 When heaven makes him the soul of all he sees

Absurd; not rare! so great, so mean, is
man

Nature, thy daughter, ever changing birth
Of thee the Great Immutable, to man

Lorenzo, to this heavenly Delphos haste;
And come back all-immortal; all divine:
Look nature through, 'tis revolution all;
All change; no death. Day follows night; and night

700 The dying day; stars rise, and set, and rise;

Earth takes th' example. See, the summer gay,

With her green chaplet, and ambrosial
flowers,

Droops into pallid autumn: winter gray, Horrid with frost, and turbulent with storm,

705 Blows autumn, and his golden fruits
away;

Then melts into the spring: soft spring, with breath

Favonian,¹ from warm chambers of the south,

Recalls the first. All, to re-flourish, fades;
As in a wheel, all sinks, to re-ascend.

From NIGHT IX. THE CONSOLATION

As when a traveller, a long day past,
In painful search of what he cannot find,
At night's approach, content with the next cot,

There ruminates awhile, his labor lost;
5 Then cheers his heart with what his fate affords,

And chants his sonnet to deceive the time,

Till the due season calls him to repose:
Thus I, long-travell'd in the ways of
men,

And dancing, with the rest, the giddy mare,

10 Where disappointment smiles at hope's career;

Warn'd by the languor of life's evening
ray,

At length have hous'd me in an humble shed;

Where, future wand'ring banish'd from my thought,

And waiting, patient, the sweet hour of rest,

15 I chase the moments with a serious song.
Song soothes our pains; and age has pains to soothe.

From CONJECTURES ON ORIGINAL

1759

But there are who write with vigor and success, to the world's delight and their own renown. These are the glorious fruits where genius prevails. The mind of a man of genius is a fertile and pleasant field, pleasant as Elysium, and fertile as Tempe; it enjoys a perpetual spring. Of that spring, originals are the fairest flowers; imitations are of quicker growth but fainter bloom. Imitations are of two kinds: one of nature, one of authors. The first we call originals, and confine the term imitation to the second. I shall not enter into the curious enquiry of what is or is not, strictly speaking, original, content with what all must allow, that some compositions are more so than others; and the more they are so, I say, the better. Originals are and ought to be great favorites, for they are great benefactors; they extend the republic of letters, and add a new province to its dominion. Imitators only give us a sort of duplicates of what we had, possibly much better, before, increasing the mere drug of books, while all that makes them valuable, knowledge and genius, are at a stand. The pen of an original writer, like Armida's wand, out of a barren waste calls a blooming spring. Out of that blooming spring, an imitator is a transplant of laurels, which sometimes die on removal, always languish in a foreign soil.

We read imitation with somewhat of his languor who listens to, a twice-told tale. Our spirits rouse at an original that is a perfect stranger, and all throng to learn what news from a foreign land. And though it comes like an Indian prince, adorned with feathers only, having little of weight, yet of our attention it will rob the more solid, if not equally new. Thus every telescope is lifted at a new-discovered star, it makes a hundred astronomers in a moment, and denies equal notice to the sun. But if an original, by being as excellent as new, adds admiration to surprise, then are we at the writer's mercy; on the strong wind of his imagination, we are snatched from Britain to Italy, from climate to climate, from pleasure to pleasure; we have no home, no thought, of our own till the magician drops his pen. And then falling down into ourselves, we awake to flat realities, lamenting the change,

But why are originals so few? Not because the writer's harvest is over, the great reapers of antiquity having left nothing to be gleaned after them, nor because the human mind's teeming time is past, or because it is incapable of putting forth unprecedented births; but because illustrious examples engross, prejudice, and intimidate. They engross our attention, and so prevent a due inspection of ourselves, they prejudice our judgment in favor of their abilities, and so lessen the sense of our own, and they intimidate us with the splendor of their renown, and thus under diffidence bury our strength. Nature's impossibilities and those of diffidence lie wide asunder. . . .

Had Milton never wrote, Pope had been less to blame. But when in Milton's genius, Homer, as it were, personally rose to forbid Britons doing him that ignoble wrong,¹ it is less pardonable, by that effeminate decoration, to put Achilles in petticoats a second time. How much nobler had it been, if his numbers had rolled on in full flow, through the various modulations of masculine melody, into those grandeur of solemn sound which are indispensably demanded by the native dignity of heroic song! How much nobler, if he had resisted the temptation of that Gothic demon,² which modern poesy tasting, became mortal! O how unlike the deathless, divine harmony of three great names (how justly joined!) of Milton, Greece, and Rome! His verse, but for this little speck of mortality in its extreme parts, as his hero had in his heel, like him, had been invulnerable and immortal.³ But unfortunately, that was undipt in Helicon, as this in Styx. Harmony as well as eloquence is essential to poesy; and a murder of his music is putting half Homer to death. Blank is a term of diminution, what we mean by blank verse is verse unfallen, uncurs'd; verse reclaimed, reenthroned in the true language of the gods, who never thundered, nor suffered their Homer to thunder, in rhyme. . . .

When such an ample area for renowned adventure in original attempts lies before

² rime

³ According to popular legend, Achilles, the hero of the Iliad, was plunged by his mother into the waters of Styx, and his whole body made invulnerable, except the heel by which he was held us, shall we be as mere leaden pipes, conveying to the present age small streams of excellence from its grand reservoir of antiquity, and those too, perhaps, muddled in the pass? Originals shine like comets; have no peer in their path; are rivaled by none, and the gaze of all. All other compositions (if they shine at all) shine in clusters, like the stars in the galaxy, where, like bad neighbors, all suffer from all, each particular being diminished and almost lost in the throng.

If thoughts of this nature prevailed, if ancients and moderns were no longer considered as masters and pupils, but as hard-matched rivals for renown, then moderns, by the longevity of their labors, might one day become ancients themselves. And old time, that best weigher of merits, to keep his balance even, might have the golden weight of an Augustan age¹ in both his scales; or rather our scale might descend, and that of antiquity (as a modern match for it strongly speaks) might kick the beam

While some affect² the sun, and some the shade,
Some flee the city, some the hermitage, Their aims as various as the roads they take In journeying through life; the task be mine
To paint the gloomy horrors of the tomb.
Th' appointed place of rendezvous, where all These travellers meet. Thy succors I implore, Eternal King! whose potent arm sustains
The keys of hell and death.—The Grave, dread thing!
Men shiver when thou'rt nam'd³ nature, appall'd, Shakes off her wonted firmness—Ah, how dark Thy long-extended realms, and rueful wastes!

¹ A period when literature is at the height of purity and refinement, so called because the reign of Augustus Caesar (31 B. C.-14 A. D.) was the golden age of Latin literature. The term is commonly applied in English literature to the time of Queen Anne (1702-14) because the writers of that period modeled their work upon that of the ancients.

Where nought but silence reigns, and night, dark night, Dark as was chaos, ere the infant sun
Was roll'd together, or had tried his beams Athwart the gloom profound.—The sickly taper
By glimmering through thy low-brow'd misty vaults, (Furr'd round with mouldy damps and ropy slime) Lets fall a supernumerary horror,
And only serves to make thy night more irksome.
Well do I know thee by thy trusty yew,¹ Cheerless, unsocial plant! that loves to dwell Midst skulls and coffins, epitaphs and worms.
Where light-heel'd ghosts and visionary shades, Beneath the wan cold moon (as fame reports) Embodied, thick, perform their mystic rounds
No other merriment, dull tree! is thine.
See yonder hallow'd fane;—the pious work
Of names once fam'd, now dubious or forgot,
And buried midst the wreck of things which were;
There lie interr'd the more illustrious dead.
The wind is up: hark! how it howls! Methinks Till now I never heard a sound so dreary:
Doors creak, and windows clap, and night's foul bird, Rook'd in the spire, screams loud. the gloomy aisles, Black-plaster'd, and hung round with shreds of 'scutcheons
And tatter'd coats of arms, send back the sound Laden with heavier airs, from the low vaults,
The mansions of the dead.—Rous'd from their slumbers,
In grim array the grisly spectres rise,
Grin horrible, and, obstinately sullen.
Pass and repass, hush'd as the foot of night.
Again the screech-owl shrieks: ungracious sound!

¹ The yew is a common tree in graveyards.

- I'll hear no more; it makes one's blood run chill.
- 45 Quite round the pile, a row of reverend elms, (Coeval near with that) all ragged
show,
Long lash'd by the rude winds. Some rift half down Their branchless trunks, others so thin a-top,
That scarce two crows could lodge in the same tree.
- 50 Strange things, the neighbors say, have happen'd here:
Wild shrieks have issued from the hollow tombs.
Dead men have come again, and walk'd about;
And the great bell has toll'd, unring, untouch'd.
(Such tales their cheer, at wake or gossipping,¹
- 55 When it draws near the witching time of night)
Oft in the lone church yard at night
I've seen,
By glimpse of moonshine chequering through the trees,
The school-boy, with his satchel in his
hand,
Whistling aloud to bear his courage
up,
- 60 And lightly tripping o'er the long flat
stones,
(With nettles skirted, and with moss o'ergrown,)
That tell in homely phrase who he below.
Sudden he starts, and hears, or thinks he hears,
The sound of something purring at his heels;
- 65 Full fast he flies, and dares not look behind him,
Till out of breath he overtakes his fellows;
Who gather round, and wonder at the tale
Of horrid apparition, tall and ghastly.
That walks at dead of night, or takes his stand
- 70 O'er some new-open'd grave; and (strange to tell!)
Evanishes at crowing of the cock.
The new-made widow, too, I've sometimes 'spied,
Sad sight! slow moving o'er the prostrate dead.
- Lastless, she crawls along in doleful black,
75 Whilst bursts of sorrow gush from either
eye,
Fast falling down her now untasted cheek:
Prone on the lowly grave of the dear
man
She drops; whilst busy, meddling memory,
In barbarous succession musters up 80 The past endearments of their softer hours,
Tenacious of its theme Still, still she thinks
She sees him, and, indulging the fond
thought,
Clings yet more closely to the senseless
turf,
Nor heeds the passenger who looks that
way.
- 85 Invidious grave!—how dost thou rend in sunder Whom love has knit, and sympathy made one!
A tie more stubborn far than nature's
band.
Friendship! mysterious cement of the soul,
Sweetener of life, and solder of society!
90 I owe thee much thou hast deserved from me,
Far, far beyond what I can ever pay Oft have I proved the labors of thy love.
And the warm efforts of the gentle
heart,
Anxious to please—Oh! when my friend and I 95 In some thick wood have wander'd heedless on,
Hid from the vulgar eye, and sat us
down
Upon the sloping cowslip-cover'd bank, Where the pure limpid stream has slid
along
In grateful errors! through the underwood,
- 100 Sweet murmuring,—methought the shrill-tongued thrush
Mended his song of love, the sooty

His faithfulness stands bound to see it

When the dread trumpet sounds, the

Not unattentive to the call, shall wake:

' number, count

And every joint possess its proper place,
 With a new elegance of form, unknown To its first state. Nor shall the conscious soul 755 Mistake its partner; but amidst the
 crowd,
 Singling its other half, into its arms Shall rush, with all the impatience of a
 man
 That's new come home, who having long

 760 In pain to see the whole. Thrice happy

 Nor time, nor death, shall ever part them

 'Tis but a night, a long and moonless
 night;
 We make the grave our bed, and then are gone.
 Thus, at the shut of even, the weary bird
 765 Leaves the wide air, and in some lonely

 Cowers down, and dozes till the dawn of

 Then elaps his well fledg'd wings and bears away.

And all in sight doth rise a birchen tree, Which learning near her little dome did stowe,
 Whilom a twig of small regard to see,
 Tho' now so wide its waving branches flow.
 And work the simple vassals mickle²
 woe,
 For not a wind might curl the leaves that blew, 25 But their limbs shudder'd, and their pulse beat low;
 And as they look'd they found their horror grew.
 And shap'd it into rods, and tingled at the view

So have I seen (who has not, may conceive)
 A lifeless phantom near a garden placed,
 30 So doth it wanton birds of peace be-reave
 Of sport, of song, of pleasure, of repast;
 They start, they stare, they wheel,
 they look aghast,
 Sad servitude! such comfortless annoy May no bold Briton's riper age e'er taste!
 35 Ne superstition clog his dance of joy, Ne vision empty, vain, his native bliss destroy.

Near to this dome is found a patch so
 green,
 On which the tribe their gambols do display.
 And at the door imprisoning board is
 seen, 40 Lest weakly wights of smaller size should stray;
 Eager, perdie,³ to bask in sunny day!
 The noises intermixed, which thence resound.

Do learning's little tenement betray;
Where sits the dame, disguised in look profound,
45 And eyes her fairy throng, and turns her wheel around.

Her cap, far whiter than the driven
snow,
Emblem right meet of decency does yield:
Her apron, dyed in grain, as blue, I trow,
As is the harebell that adorns the field;
50 And in her hand, for scepter, she does wield Tway birchen sprays, with anxious fear entwined,
With dark distrust, and sad repentance filled;
And steadfast hate, and sharp afflic-tion joined,
And fury uncontrolled, and chastisement unkind

55 Few have but kenn'd, in semblance meet portray'd,
The childish faces, of old Aeol's train.
Libs, Notus, Auster these in frowns array'd,
How then would fare on earth, or sky,
or main,
Were the stern god to give his slaves
the rein?
60 And were not she rebellious breasts to quell,
And were not she her statutes to maintain,
The cot no more, I ween, were deem'd the cell
Where comely peace of mind, and decent order dwell

A russet stole was o'er her shoulders thrown;
65 A russet kirtle fenced the nipping air;
'Twas simple russet, but it was her own,
'Twas her own country bred the flock so fair!
'Twas her own labor did the fleece prepare;
And, sooth to say, her pupils ranged around, 70 Through rions awe, did term it passing rare:
For they in gaping wonderment abound,
And think, no doubt, she been the greatest wight on ground.

Albeit ne¹ flatt'ry did corrupt her
truth,
Ne¹ pompous title did debauch her
ear;
75 Goody, good-woman, gossip,² n'aunt, forsooth,
Or dame, the sole additions³ she did hear;
Yet these she challeng'd, these she held right dear:
Ne would esteem him act as mought

Who should not honor'd eld with these revere:
80 For never title yet so mean could prove,
But there was eke a mind which did that title love.

One ancient hen she took delight to feed,
The plodding pattern of the busy dame;
Which, ever and anon, impelled by need, 85 Into her school, begirt with chickens,
came;
Such favor did her past deportment
claim;
And, if neglect had lavished on the ground Fragment of bread, she would collect the same,
For well she knew, and quaintly could expound, 90 What sin it were to waste the smallest crumb she found.

Herbs, too, she knew, and well of each could speak,
That in her garden sipped the silvery dew;
Where no vain flower disclosed a gaudy streak,
But herbs for use and physic, not a few,
95 Of gray renown, within those borders grew:
The tufted basil, pun-provoking thyme, Fresh balm, and marigold of cheerful hue:
The lowly gill, that never dares to climb;
And more I fain would sing, disdaining here to rhyme.

From PART I
 1757

From Heaven my strains begin; from Heaven descends
 100 The flame of genius to the chosen breast,
 And beauty with poetic wonder join'd,
 And inspiration Ere the rising sun Shone o'er the deep, or 'mid the vault of
 night
 The moon her silver lamp suspended; ere 105 The vales with springs were water'd, or with groves
 Of oak or pine the ancient hills were crown'd,
 Then the Great Spirit, whom his works
 adore,
 Within his own deep essence view'd the
 forms,
 The forms eternal of created things.
 The radiant sun; the moon's nocturnal lamp, 110 The mountains and the streams; the ample stores
 Of earth, of heaven, of nature. From the first,
 On that full scene his love divine he fix'd,
 His admiration; till, in time complete,
 What he admir'd and lov'd, his vital
 power 115 Unfolded into being. Hence the breath
 Of life informing each organic frame; Hence the green earth, and wild-resounding waves,
 Hence light and shade, alternate,
 warmth and cold;
 And bright autumnal skies, and vernal
 showers,
 120 And all the fair variety of things.
 But not alike to every mortal eye Is this great scene unveil'd. For while the claims Of social life to different labors urge

The active powers of man, with wisest care
 125 Hath Nature on the multitude of minds Impress'd a various bias; and to each Deereed its province in the common toil.
 To some she taught the fabric of the sphere,
 The changeful moon, the circuit of the stars,
 130 The golden zones of heaven: to some she gave
 To search the story of eternal thought,
 Of space and time, of fate's unbroken chain,
 And will's quick movement: others by the hand
 She led o'er vales and mountains, to explore 135 What healing virtue dwells in every vein Of herbs or trees But some to nobler

 To these the Sire Omnipotent unfolds, 140 In fuller aspects and with fairer lights, This picture of the world Through every part
 They trace the lofty sketches of his

 In earth or air, the meadow's flowery nown'd Through fabled Egypt, at the genial touch

 Of morning, from its inmost frame sent

 To certain attributes which matter claims.
 155 Adapt the finer organs of the mind:
 So the glad impulse of those kindred powers (Of form, of color's cheerful pomp, of
 sound Melodious, or of motion aptly sped)

Detains the enliven'd sense; till soon
 the soul
 Feels the deep concord, and assents through all 160 Her functions. Then the charm by fate prepar'd Diffuseth its enchantment. Fancy dreams.
 Rapt into high discourse with prophets old,
 And wandering through Elysium, Fancy
 dreams
 Of sacred fountains, of o'ershadowing
 groves, 165 Whose walks with godlike harmony re-
 sound:
 Fountains, which Homer visits, happy
 groves,
 Where Milton dwell: the intellectual
 power,
 On the mind's throne, suspends his graver cares,
 And smiles the passions, to divine repose,
 170 Persuaded yield: and love and joy alone Are waking, love and joy, such as await An angel's meditation. O! attend.
 Whoe'er thou art whom these delights can touch;

 430 Where native order reigns, with every part
 In health, and every function well perform'd?
 Thus then at first was Beauty sent from Heaven,
 The lovely mistress of Truth and Good
 In this dark world, for Truth and Good

TO THE EVENING STAR

Tonight retired, the queen of heaven²
 With young Endymion stays;
 And now to Hesper it is given Awhile to rule the vacant sky, 5 Till she shall to her lamp supply
 A stream of brighter rays
 O Hesper, while the starry throng
 With awe thy path surrounds,
 Oh, listen to my suppliant song, 10 If haply now the vocal sphere
 Can suffer thy delighted ear
 To stoop to mortal sounds.
 So may the bridegroom's genial strain Thee still invoke to shine, 15 So may the bride's unmarried train To Hymen chaunt their flattering vow.
 Still that his lucky torch may glow
 With lustre pure as thine Far other vows must I prefer 20 To thy indulgent power Alas! but now I paid my tear
 On fair Olympia's³ virgin tomb,
 And lo, from thence, in quest I roam Of Philomela's bower.

25 Propitious send thy golden ray,
 Thou purest light above!
 Let no false flame seduce to stray Where gulf or steep he hid for harm;
 But lead where music's healing charm 30 May soothe afflicted love.

To them, by many a grateful song
 In happier seasons vow'd,
 These lawns,¹ Olympia's haunts, belong:
 Oft by yon silver stream we walk'd, 35 Or fix'd,² while Philomela talk'd, Beneath yon copses stood.

Nor seldom, where the beechen boughs
 That roofless tower invade,
 We came, while her enchanting Muse 40 The radiant moon above us held:
 Till, by a clamorous owl compell'd
 She fled the solemn shade.

But hark! I hear her liquid tone!
 Now Hesper guide my feet!
 45 Down the red marl³ with moss o'ergrown, Through yon wild thicket next the plain,
 Whose hawthorns choke the winding lane
 Which leads to her retreat.

See the green space on either hand 50 Enlarged it spreads around:
 See, in the midst she takes her stand,
 Where one old oak his awful shade Extends o'er half the level mead, Enclosed in woods profound.

55 Hark! how through many a melting note
 She now prolongs her lays:
 How sweetly down the void they float!
 The breeze their magic path attends;
 The stars shine out, the forest bends; 60 The wakeful heifers graze.

Whoe'er thou art whom chance may bring To this sequester'd spot,
 If then the plaintive Siren sing,
 Oh softly tread beneath her bower 65 And think of Heaven's disposing power, Of man's uncertain lot.

Oh think; o'er all this mortal stage
 What mournful scenes arise:
 What ruin waits on kingly rage;
 70 How often virtue dwells with woe;
 How many griefs from knowledge flow;
 How swiftly pleasure flies!

 Bear witness to thy pensive airs,
 And pity Nature's common cares,

WILLIAM COLLINS (1721-1759)

A SONG FROM SHAKESPEAR'S CYMBELYNSUNG BY GUIDERUS AND ARVIRAGUS OVER FIDELI, SUPPOS'D TO BE DEAD¹

1744

To fair Fidele's grassy tomb Soft maids and village hinds² shall bring
Each op'ning sweet, of earliest bloom,
And rife all the breathing spring.

⁵ No wailing ghost shall dare appear,
To vex with shrieks this quiet grove.
But shepherd lads assemble here,
And melting virgins own their love.

No wither'd witch shall here be seen, ¹⁰ No goblins lead their nightly crew:
The female fays shall haunt the green,
And dress thy grave with pearly dew.

The redbreast oft at ev'ning hours Shall kindly lend his little aid, ¹⁵ With hoary moss, and gather'd flow'rs,
To deck the ground where thou art laid.

When howling winds, and beating rain,
In tempests shake the sylvan cell,
Or midst the chace on ev'ry plain, ²⁰ The tender thought on thee shall dwell.

Each lonely scene shall thee restore,
For thee the tear be duly shed:
Belov'd, till life could charm no more;
And mourn'd, till Pity's self be dead.

ODE TO SIMPLICITY

O thou by Nature taught To breathe her genuine thought,
In numbers warmly pure, and sweetly strong:

Who first, on mountains wild,
⁵ In Fancy, loveliest child, Thy babe or Pleasure's, nurs'd the pow'rs of song!³

Thou who with hermit heart
Disdain'st the wealth of art,

¹ Cymbeline, IV. 2, 215-229, furnished the inspiration for this song. The brothers there mourn for their sister Imogen, who is disguised as Fidele, and who they think is dead.

² rustics; peasants

And gauds,¹ and pageant weeds, and trailing pall,

¹⁰ But com'st a decent² maid
In Attic robe array'd, O chaste, unboastful nymph, to thee I call!

By all the honey'd store
On Hybla's thymy³ shore, ¹⁵ By all her blooms, and mingled murmurs
dear.

By her⁴ whose lovelorn woe
In ev'ning musings slow Sooth'd sweetly sad Electra's poet's⁵
ear:

By old Cephissus deep,
²⁰ Who spread his wavy sweep In warbled wand'rings round thy green retreat,⁶

On whose enamell'd side
When holy Freedom died,⁷ No equal haunt allur'd thy future feet.

²⁵ O sister meek of Truth,
To my admiring youth
Thy sober aid and native charms infuse!
The flow'rs that sweetest breathe,
Tho' Beauty cull'd the wreath, ³⁰ Still ask thy hand to range their order'd hues.

While Rome could none esteem
But virtue's⁸ patriot theme,
You lov'd her hills, and led her laureate
band:

But staid to sing alone
³⁵ To one distinguish'd throne,⁹ And turned thy face, and fled her alter'd land.

No more, in hall or bow'r,
The passions own thy pow'r;
Love, only love, her forceless numbers mean:¹⁰

Nor olive more, nor vine, Shall gain thy feet to bless the servile
scene.

of medieval Italy.

Tho' taste, tho' genius bless
To some divine excess, 45 Faints the cold work till thou inspire the whole,
What each, what all supply,
May court, may charm our eye, Thou, only thou, canst raise the meeting
soul!

Of these let others ask,
50 To aid some mighty task;
I only seek to find my temp'rate vale
Where oft my reed¹ might sound To maids and shepherds round, And all thy sons, O Nature, learn my tale.

ODE ON THE POETICAL CHARACTER

STROPHE

As once, if not with light regard²
I read aright that gifted bard³ (Him whose school above the rest His loveliest Elfin Queen has blest), 5 One, only one, unrivall'd fair⁴ Might hope the magic girdle wear,
At solemn turney hung on high,
The wish of each love-darting eye,
Lo! to each other nymph in turn applied, 10 As if, in air unseen, some hov'ring
hand,
Some chaste and angel friend to virgin
fame,
With whisper'd spell had burst the starting band,
It left unblest her loath'd, dishonor'd
side.
Happier hopeless fair, if never 15 Her baffled hand with vain endeavor Had touch'd that fatal zone to her denied!
Young Fancy⁵ thus, to me divinest
name,
To whom, prepar'd and bath'd in heav'n,
The cest⁶ of amplest pow'r is giv'n.
20 To few the godlike gift assigns,
To gird their blest, prophetic loins,
And gaze her visions wild, and feel unmix'd her flame!

ODE WRITTEN IN THE BEGINNING
OF THE YEAR 1746
1746 1746

How sleep the brave who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold, Returns to deck their hallow'd mold, 5 She there shall dress a sweeter sod Than Fancy's feet have ever trod

By fair hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung.
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray, 10 To bless the turf that wraps their clay,
And Freedom shall awhile repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there!

ODE TO EVENING
1746

If ought of oaten stop,³ or pastoral song, May hope, chaste Eve, to sooth thy modest ear.
Like thy own solemn springs,
Thy springs and dving gales, 5 O nymph reserv'd, while now the brighthair'd sun
Sits in yon western tent, whose cloudy skirts,
With brede⁴ ethereal wove,
O'erhang his wavy bed

Now air is hush'd, save where the weak-ey'd bat.
10 With short shrill shriek, fits by on

Or where the beetle winds

THE PASSIONS
 AN ODE FOR MUSIC
 1746

When Music, heav'nly maid, was young,
 While yet in early Greece she sung,
 The Passions oft, to hear her shell,¹ Throng'd around her magic cell, 5 Exulting, trembling, raging, fainting, Possess'd beyond the Muse's painting,
 By turns they felt the glowing mind Disturb'd, delighted, rais'd, refin'd Till once, 'tis said, when all were fir'd, 10 Fill'd with fury, rapt, inspir'd,
 From the supporting mytles round
 They snatch'd her instruments of sound;
 And as they oft had heard apart
 Sweet lessons of her forceful art, 15 Each, for madness rul'd the hour,
 Would prove his own expressive pow'r

First Fear his hand, its skill to try, Amid the chords bewilder'd laid,
 And back recoil'd, he knew not why, 20 Ex'n at the sound himself had made

Next Anger rush'd, his eyes, on fire,
 In lightnings own'd his secret stings,
 In one rude clash he struck the lyre,
 And swept with hurried hand the strings.

25 With woful measures wan Despair
 Low sullen sounds his grief beguil'd;
 A solemn, strange, and mingled air,
 'Twas sad by fits, by starts 'twas wild

But thou, O Hope, with eyes so fair, 30 What was thy delightful measure?
 Still it whisper'd promis'd pleasure,
 And bad the lovely scenes at distance hail!
 Still would her touch the strain prolong,
 And from the rocks, the woods, the
 vale, 35 She call'd on Echo still thro' all the song;
 And where her sweetest theme she chose,

¹lyre (The first lyre is said to have been made from a tortoise shell)

A soft responsive voice was heard at ev'ry close,
 And Hope enchanted smil'd, and wav'd her golden hair

And longer had she sung,—but with a frown 40 Revenge impatient rose;
 He threw his blood-stain'd sword in thunder down
 And with a with'ring look
 The war-denouncing trumpet took,
 And blew a blast so loud and dread, 45 Were ne'er prophetic sounds so full of
 woe.

And ever and anon he beat The doubling drum with furious
 heat;
 And tho' sometimes, each dreary pause
 between,
 Dejected Pity, at his side, 50 Her soul-subduing voice apply'd, Yet still he kept his wild unalter'd mien,
 While each strain'd ball of sight seem'd bursting from his head.

Thy numbers, Jealousy, to nought were
 fix'd,
 Sad proof of thy distressful state; 55 Of diff'ring themes the veering song was mix'd,
 And now it courted Love, now raving call'd on Hate

With eyes uprais'd, as one inspir'd, Pale Melancholy sate retir'd,
 And from her wild sequester'd seat, 60 In notes by distance made more sweet, Pour'd thro' the mellow horn her pensive soul:

And, dashing soft from rocks around,
 Bubbling runnels join'd the sound; Thro' glades and glooms the mingled measure stole, 65 Or o'er some haunted stream with fond delay
 Round an holy calm diffusing, Love of peace and lonely musing,
 In hollow murmurs died away.

But O how alter'd was its sprightlier tone, 70 When Cheerfulness, a nymph of healthiest hue,
 Her bow across her shoulder flung,
 Her buskins gemm'd with morning dew,

²announcing

Blew an inspiring air, that dale and thicket rung,
The hunter's call to faun and dryad known!

75 The oak-crown'd sisters,¹ and their chaste-ey'd queen,² Satyrs, and sylvan boys, were seen, Peeping from forth their alleys green,
Brown Exercise rejoic'd to hear,
And Sport leapt up, and seiz'd his beechen spear.

80 Last came Joy's ecstatic trial.

He, with viny crown advancing,
First to the lively pipe his hand addrest;
But soon he saw the brisk awak'ning viol,

Whose sweet entrancing voice he lov'd
the best

85 They would have thought, who heard the strain,
They saw in Tempe's vale her native maids,

Amidst the festal sounding shades,
To some unwearied minstrel dancing, While, as his flying fingers kiss'd the
strings,

90 Love fram'd with Mirth a gay fantastic round;

Loose were her tresses seen, her zone³ unbound,

And he, amidst his frolic play,
As if he would the charming air repay, Shook thousand odors from his dewy wings.

95 O Music, sphere-descended maid, Friend of Pleasure, Wisdom's aid,
Why, goddess, why, to us deny'd, Lay'st thou thy ancient lyre aside?

As in that lov'd Athenian bow'r 100 You learn'd an all-commanding pow'r, Thy mimic soul, O nymph endear'd,
Can well recall what then it heard Where is thy native simple heart, Devote to Virtue, Fancy, Art?

105 Arise as in that elder time.
Warm, energetic, chaste, sublime!
Thy wonders, in that godlike age, Fill thy recording sister's page—
'Tis said, and I believe the tale.

110 Thy humblest reed could more prevail,
Had more of strength, diviner rage,
Than all which charms this laggard age, Ev'n all at once together found,
Cæcilia's mingled world of sound.

115 O bid our vain endeavors cease, Revive the just designs of Greece,
Return in all thy simple state,
Confirm the tales her sons relate!

ODE ON THE DEATH OF MR. THOMSON

1748

In yonder grave a druid lies,
Where slowly winds the stealing wave.
The year's best sweets shall duteous rise To deck its poet's sylvan grave

5 In yon deep bed of whisp'ring reeds
His airy harp¹ shall now be laid,
That he whose heart in sorrow bleeds
May love thro' life the soothing shade.

Then maids and youths shall linger here, 10 And while its sounds at distance swell, Shall sadly seem in Pity's ear
To hear the Woodland Pilgrim's knell

Remembrance oft shall haunt the shore When Thames in summer wreaths is
drest,

15 And oft suspend the dashing oar
To bid his gentle spirit rest

And oft as Ease and Health retire
To breezy lawn, or forest deep,
The friend shall view yon whit'ning spire,

20 And mid the varied landscape weep

But thou who own'st that earthly bed, Ah, what will ev'ry dirge avail,
Or tears which Love and Pity shed,
That mourn beneath the gliding sail?

25 Yet lives there one whose heedless eye Shall scorn thy pale shrine glimm'ring near?
With him, sweet bard, may Fancy die,
And Joy desert the blooming year!

But thou, lorn stream, whose sullen tide 30 No sedge-crown'd sisters now attend, Now waft me from the green hill's side Whose cold turf hides the buried
friend.

And see, the fairy valleys fade;
Dun night has veil'd the solemn view

AN ODE ON THE POPULAR SUPERSTITIONS OF THE HIGHLANDS OF SCOTLAND

CONSIDERED AS THE SUBJECT OF POETRY
1749 1788

H—,¹ thou return'st from Thames, whose naiads long Have seen thee ling'ring, with a fond delay,
'Mid those soft friends, whose hearts,
some future day,
Shall melt, perhaps, to hear thy tragic
song

5 Go, not unmindful of that cordial youth²

Whom, long-endeared, thou leav'st by Lavan's side;
Together let us wish him lasting truth,
And joy untainted, with his destined bride

Go! nor regardless, while these numbers boast

10 My short-liv'd bliss, forget my social
name,
But think far off how, on the Southern coast,
I met thy friendship with an equal flame!

Fresh to that soil thou turn'st, whose ev'ry vale Shall prompt the poet, and his song demand.

15 To thee thy copious subjects ne'er shall fail;

Thou need'st but take the pencil to thy hand,
And paint what all believe who own thy genial land.³

There must thou wake perforce thy Doric⁴ quill;

'Tis Fancy's land to which thou sett'st thy feet,

20 Where still, 'tis said, the fairy people meet

Beneath each birken shade on mead or hill.

There each trim lass that skims the milky store

To the swart tribes⁵ their creamy bowl allots;

By night they sip it round the cottage
door,

25 While airy minstrels warble jocund notes.

There ev'ry herd, by sad experience, knows

How, wing'd with fate, their elf-shot arrows fly;

When the sick ewe her summer food
foregoes,

Or, stretch'd on earth, the heart-smit heifers lie

30 Such airy beings awe th' untutor'd swain:

Nor thou, thou learn'd, his homelier thoughts neglect;

Let thy sweet Muse the rural faith sus-tain:

effect,

That add new conquests to her boundless
reign,

35 And fill, with double force, her heart-commanding strain

On whose bleak rocks, which brave the Fair Nature's daughter, Virtue, yet abides.

Go, just as they, their blameless manners trace!
Then to my ear transmit some gentle
song
- 160 Of those whose lives are yet sincere and plain,
Their bounded walks the rugged cliffs
along,
And all their prospect but the wintry main.
With sparing temp'rance, at the needful
time,
They drain the sainted spring, or hunger-prest,
- 165 Along th' Atlantic rock undreading

And of its eggs despoil the solan's¹

Thus blest in primal innocence they live,
Suffic'd and happy with that frugal

Which tasteful toil² and hourly danger

And with their terrors drest the magic

Before the Scot afflicted and aghast,
The shadowy kings of Banquo's fated line Thro' the dark cave in gleamy pageant
past.

ODE ON THE SPRING

1742 1748

Lo! where the rosy-bosom'd Hours, Fair Venus' train, appear, Disclose⁴ the long-expecting⁵ flowers,
And wake the purple⁶ year!
5 The Attic warbler⁷ pours her throat, Responsive to the cuckoo's note,
The untaught harmony of spring
While, whisp'ring pleasure as they fly,
'ool Zephyrs thro' the clear blue sky 10 Their gather'd fragrance fling

Where'er the oak's thick branches stretch
A broader browner shade, Where'er the rude and moss-grown beech O'er-canopies the glade, 15 Beside some water's rushy brink With me the Muse shall sit, and think (At ease reclin'd in rustic state)
How vain the ardor of the crowd,
How low, how little are the proud, 20 How indigent the great!

Still is the toiling hand of Care;
The panting herds repose;
Yet hark, how thro' the peopled air
The busy murmur glows!
25 The insect-youth are on the wing, Eager to taste the honied spring,

And float amid the liquid noon;
Some lightly o'er the current skim,
Some show their gayly-gilded trim 30 Quick-glancing to the sun

To Contemplation's sober eye
Such is the race of man:
And they that creep, and they that fly,
Shall end where they began.
35 Alike the busy and the gay
But flutter thro' life's little day,
In Fortune's varying colors drest:
Brush'd by the hand of rough Mischance,
Or chill'd by Age, their airy dance 40 They leave, in dust to rest.

Methinks I hear, in accents low,
The sportive kind reply:
Poor moralist! and what art thou?
A solitary fly!
45 Thy joys no glittering female meets,
No hive hast thou of hoarded sweets,
No painted plumage to display
On hasty wings thy youth is flown;
Thy sun is set, thy spring is gone—50 We frolic while 'tis May.

ODE ON A DISTANT PROSPECT OF ETON COLLEGE

1742 1747

Ye distant spires, ye antique towers,
That crown the wat'ry glade,
Where grateful Science still adores
Her Henry's holy shade;¹
5 And ye, that from the stately brow
Of Windsor's heights th' expanse below
Of grove, of lawn, of mead survey, Whose turf, whose shade, whose flowers among Wanders the hoary Thames along 10 His silver-winding way.

Ah, happy hills! ah, pleasing shade!
Ah, fields belov'd in vain!
Where once my careless childhood stray'd,
A stranger yet to pain!
15 I feel the gales that from ye blow
A momentary bliss bestow.
As waving fresh their gladsome wing,
My weary soul they seem to soothe,
And, redolent of joy and youth, 20 To breathe a second spring.

Sav, father Thames, for thou hast seen Full many a sprightly race,

¹ Eton College was founded by Henry VI in 1440

Disporting on thy margent green,
 The paths of pleasure trace;
 25 Who foremost now delight to cleave,
 With pliant arm, thy glassy wave?
 The captive linnet which enthrall?
 What idle progeny succeed
 To chase the rolling circle's speed, 30 Or urge the flying ball?

While some, on earnest business bent,
 Their murmur'ing labors ply
 'Gainst graver hours that bring constraint
 To sweeten liberty, 35 Some bold adventurers disdain
 The limits of their little reign.
 And unknown regions dare descry,
 Still as they run they look behind,
 They hear a voice in every wind, 40 And snatch a fearful joy

Gave hope is theirs by fancy fed, Less pleasing when possess'd.
 The tear forgot as soon as shed,
 The sunshine of the breast, 45 Theirs buxom health, of rosy hue, Wild wit, invention ever-new,
 And lively cheer, of vigor born;
 The thoughtless day, the easy night,
 The spirits pure, the slumbers light, 50 That fly th' approach of morn

Alas! regardless of their doom
 The little victims play;
 No sense have they of ills to come,
 Nor care beyond today.
 55 Yet see, how all around 'em wait
 The ministers of human Fate,
 And black Misfortune's baleful train!
 Ah, show them where in ambush stand,
 To seize their prey, the murth'rous band!
 60 Ah, tell them they are men!

These shall the fury Passions tear,
 The vultures of the mind Disdainful Anger, pallid Fear,
 And Shame that sculks behind;
 65 Or pining Love shall waste their youth,
 Or Jealousy, with rankling tooth,
 That only gnaws the secret heart;
 And Envy wan, and faded Care,
 Grim-visag'd comfortless Despair, 70 And Sorrow's piercing dart.

Ambition this shall tempt to rise,
 Then whirl the wretch from high,
 To bitter Scorn a sacrifice,
 And grinning Infamy
 75 The stings of Falsehood those shall try. 20

And hard Unkindness' alter'd eye,
 That mocks the tear it forc'd to flow;
 And keen Remorse with blood defil'd,
 And moody Madness laughing wild 80 Amid severest woe

Lo! in the vale of years beneath
 A ghastly troop are seen,
 The painful family of Death,
 More hideous than their queen 85 Thus racks the joints, thus fires the veins;
 That every laboring sinew strains,
 Those in the deeper vitals rage,
 Lo! Poverty to fill the band,
 That numbs the soul with icy hand, 90 And slow-consuming Age.

To each his suff'rings all are men.
 'Condemn'd alike to groan,
 The tender for another's pain,
 Th' unfeeling for his own 95 Yet, ah! why should they know their fate?
 Since sorrow never comes too late,
 And happiness too swiftly flies,
 Thought would destroy their paradise
 No more,—where ignorance is bliss,

HYMN TO ADVERSITY

1742

1745

Daughter of Jove, relentless power, Thou tamer of the human breast,
 Whose iron scourge and tort'ring hour
 The bad affright, afflict the best!
 5 Bound in thy adamant chain,
 The proud are taught to taste of pain,
 And purple tyrants vainly groan With pangs unfelt before, unpitied and
 alone.

When first thy sire to send on earth 10 Virtue, his darling child, design'd,
 To thee he gave the heav'nly birth,
 And bade to form her infant mind Stern, rugged nurse! thy rigid lore
 With patience many a year she bore; 15 What sorrow was, thou bad'st her
 know,
 And from her own she learn'd to melt at others' woe

Scar'd at thy frown terrific, fly Self-pleasing Folly's idle brood, Wild Laughter, Noise, and thoughtless
 Joy,
 And leave us leisure to be good.

Light they disperae, and with them go
The summer friend, the flattering foe,
By vain Prosperity receiv'd, To her they vow their truth, and are again believ'd

25 Wisdom in sable garb array'd, Immers'd in rapt'rous thought profound,
And Melancholy, silent maid, With leaden eye that loves the
ground,
Still on thy solemn steps attend.
30 Warm Charity, the gen'ral friend,
With Justice, to herself severe,
And Pity, dropping soft the sadly-pleasing tear

Oh! gently on thy suppliant's head, Dread goddess, lay thy chast'ning
hand!

35 Not in thy Gorgon¹ terrors clad,
Not circled with the vengeful band² (As by the impious thou art seen).
With thund'ring voice, and threat'ning
men,
With screaming Horror's fun'ral cry.
40 Despair, and fell Disease, and ghastly Poverty

Thy form benign, O goddess, wear, Thy milder influence impart, Thy philosophic train be there To soften, not to wound, my heart

45 The gen'rous spark extinct revive, Teach me to love, and to forgive, Exact my own defects to scan, What others are to feel, and know myself a man.

ELEGY WRITTEN IN A COUNTRY CHURCH YARD
1742-50 1751

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day;
The lowing herd winds slowly o'er the lea,
The ploughman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness and
to me

5 Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,
And all the air a solemn stillness holds,

Save where the beetle wheels his droning
flight,
And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds;

Save that from yonder ivy-mantled tow'r, 10 The moping owl does to the moon complain
Of such as, wand'ring near her secret bow'r,
Molest her ancient solitary reign

Beneath those rugged elms, that yewtree's shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a mould'ring heap, 15 Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
The rude¹ forefathers of the hamlet
sleep.

The breezy call of incense-breathing
Morn,
The swallow twitt'ring from the straw-built shed,
The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing horn, 20 No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.

For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
Or busy housewife ply her evening
care;
No children run to hup their sire's return,
Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.

How jocund did they drive their team

How bow'd the woods beneath their

And give to rapture all thy trembling strings!

From Helicon's harmonious springs
A thousand rills their mazy progress take;

⁵ The laughing flowers that round them
blow,

Drink life and fragrance as they flow.
Now the rich stream of music winds
along.

Deep, majestic, smooth, and strong, Thro' verdant vales, and Ceres' golden
reign:

¹⁰ Now rolling down the steep amain, Headlong, impetuous, see it pour,
The rocks and nodding groves rebellow

FROM VICISSITUDE!
1754 1775

Now the golden Morn aloft

Waves her dew-bespangled wing.

With vermeil cheek and whisper soft

She wooes the tardy Spring,

5 Till April starts, and calls around The sleeping fragrance from the ground,
And lightly o'er the living scene

Scatters his freshest, tenderest green.

New-born flocks, in rustic dance,

10 Frisking ply their feeble feet.

Forgetful of their wintry trance

The birds his presence greet

But chief, the sky-lark warbles high

His trembling thrilling ecstasy,

15 And, lessening from the dazzled sight, Melts into air and liquid light

Rise, my soul! on wings of fire,

Rise the rapt'rous choir among!

Thyrsis, when we parted, swore Ere the spring he would return—
 Ah! what means yon violet flower?
 And the buds that deck the thorn?

1761 1768

Uprose the King of Men with speed,
And saddled straight his coal-black steed, Down the yawning steep he rode,
That leads to Hela's drear abode.

His shaggy throat he open'd wide, While from his jaws, with carnage fill'd, Foam and human gore distill'd, Hoarse he bays with hideous din, 10 Eyes that glow, and fangs that grin,
And long pursues with fruitless yell,
The Father of the powerful spell Onward still his way he takes (The groaning earth beneath him shakes), 15 Till full before his fearless eyes
The portals mine of hell arise Right against the eastern gate,¹
By the moss-grown pile he sate,
Where long of yore to sleep was laid

Facing to the northern clime, Thrice he trac'd the Runic³ rhyme;
Thrice pronounce'd, in accents dread,
The thrilling verse that wakes the dead,

Slowly breath'd a sullen sound

To break the quiet of the tomb?
Who thus afflicts my troubled sprite,

THE TRIUMPHS OF OWEN

A FRAGMENT

1764 1768

Owen's praise demands my song, Owen swift, and Owen strong.
 Fairest flower of Roderic's stem, Gwyneth's shield, and Britain's gem.
 5 He nor heaps his brooded stores, Nor on all profusely pours;
 Lord of every regal art,
 Liberal hand, and open heart.
 Big with hosts of mighty name, 10 Squadrons three against him came;
 This the force of Eirin hiding.
 Side by side as proudly riding,
 On her shadow long and gay Lochlin plows the wat'ry way;
 15 There the Norman sails afar Catch the winds and join the war:
 Black and huge along they sweep,
 Burthens of the angry deep.

Dauntless on his native sands 20 The dragon-son¹ of Mona stands, In glitt'ring arms and glory drest,
 High he rears his ruby crest.
 There the thund'ring strokes begin,
 There the press, and there the din;
 25 Talymalfra's rocky shore Echoing to the battle's roar.
 Clink'd by the torrent-tide of blood, Backward Meinau rolls his flood;
 While, heap'd his master's feet around, 30 Prostrate warriors gnaw the ground Where his glowing eye-balls turn, Thousand banners round him burn:
 Where he points his purple spear, Hasty, hasty rout is there, 35 Marking with indignant eye Fear to stop, and shame to fly.
 There confusion, terror's child,

¹As a descendant of Cadwallader, a famous British king, Owen wore the device of a red dragon

Conflict fierce, and ruin wild, Agony, that pants for breath, 40 Despair and honorable death.

THE DEATH OF HOEL

AN ODE, SELECTED FROM THE GODODIN
 1764 1775

Had I but the torrent's might,
 With headlong rage and wild affright
 Upon Deira's squadron's hurl'd
 To rush, and sweep them from the world!
 5 Too, too secure in youthful pride,
 By them, my friend, my Hoel, died, Great Cian's son: of Madoc old
 He ask'd no heaps of hoarded gold.
 Alone in nature's wealth array'd 10 He ask'd and had the lovely maid

To Cattraeth's vale in glitt'ring row Thrice two hundred warriors go Every warrior's manly neck Chains of regal honor deck, 15 Wreath'd in many a golden link From the golden cup they drink Nectar that the bees produce,¹
 Or the grape's ecstatic juice Flush'd with mirth and hope they burn 20 But none from Cattraeth's vale return.
 Save Aeron brave, and Conan strong.
 (Bursting through the bloody throne)
 And I, the meanest of them all,
 That live to weep and sing their fall

CARADOC

1764 1775

Have ye seen the tusky boar,
 Or the bull, with sullen roar,
 On surrounding foes advance?
 So Caradoc bore his lance.

CONAN

1764 1775

Conan's name, my lay, rehearse, Build to him the lofty verse, Sacred tribute of the bard,
 Verse, the hero's sole reward 5 As the flame's devouring force,
 As the whirlwind in its course;
 As the thunder's fiery stroke, Glancing on the shiver'd oak:
 Did the sword of Conan mow 10 The crimson harvest of the foe.

SEPT. 17

Journey to Geneva. The road runs over a mountain, which gives you the first taste of the Alps, in its magnificent rudeness, and steep precipices. Set out from Echelles on horseback to see the Grande Chartreuse, the way to it up a vast mountain, in many places the road not two yards broad, on one side the rock hanging over you, and on the other side a monstrous precipice. In the bottom runs a torrent, called Les Guiers morts, that works its way among the rocks with a mighty noise, and frequent falls. You here meet with all the beauties so savage and horrid a place can present you with; rocks of various and uncouth figures, cascades pouring down from an immense height out of hanging groves of pine trees, and the solemn sound of the stream that roars below, all concur to form one of the most poetical scenes imaginable.

From GRAY'S LETTERS 1735 71 1814 84

To MRS. DOROTHY GRAY

LYONS, Oct. 13, N 8 1739.

It is now almost five weeks since I left Dijon, one of the gayest and most agreeable little cities of France, for Lyons, its reverse in all these particulars. It is the second in the kingdom in bigness and rank, the streets excessively narrow and nasty; the houses immensely high and large (that, for instance where we are lodged, has twenty-five rooms on a floor, and that for five stories); it swarms with inhabitants like Paris itself, but chiefly a mercantile people, too much given up to commerce, to think of their own, much less of a stranger's diversions. We have no acquaintance in the town, but such English as happen to be passing through here, in their way to Italy and the south, which at present happen to be near thirty in number. It is a fortnight since we set out from hence upon a little excursion to Geneva. We took the longest road, which lies through Savoy, on purpose to see a famous monastery, called the grand Chartreuse, and had no reason to think our time lost. After having travelled seven days very slow (for we did not change horses, it being impossible for a chaise to go post¹ in these roads) we arrived at a rapidly, like one relaying letters, messages, etc little village, among the mountains of Savoy, called Echelles; from thence we proceeded on horses, who are used to the way, to the mountain of the Chartreuse. It is six miles to the top, the road runs winding up it, commonly not six feet broad, on one hand is the rock, with woods of pine-trees hanging over head, on the other, a monstrous precipice, almost perpendicular, at the bottom of which rolls a torrent, that sometimes tumbling among the fragments of stone that have fallen from on high, and sometimes precipitating itself down vast descents with a noise like thunder, which is still made greater by the echo from the mountains on each side, concurs to form one of the most solemn, the most romantic, and the most astonishing scenes I ever beheld. Add to this the strange views made by the crags and cliffs on the other hand, the cascades that in many places throw themselves from the very summit down into the vale, and the river below; and many other particulars impossible to describe; you will conclude we had no occasion to repent our pains. This place St. Bruno chose to retire to, and upon its very top founded the aforesaid convent, which is the superior of the whole order. When we came there, the two fathers, who are commissioned to entertain strangers (for the rest must neither speak one to another, nor to any one else), received us very kindly; and set before us a repast of dried fish, eggs, butter, and fruits, all excellent in their kind, and extremely neat. They pressed us to spend the night there, and to stay some days with them; but this we could not do, so they led us about their house, which is, you must think, like a little city; for there are 100 fathers, besides 300 servants, that make their clothes, grind their corn, press their wine, and do everything among themselves. The whole is quiet, orderly, and simple, nothing of finery, but the wonderful decency, and the strange situation, more than supply the place of it. In the evening we descended by the same way, passing through many clouds that were then forming themselves on the mountain's side. Next day we continued our journey by Chamberry, which, though the chief city of the Dutchy, and residence of the King of Sardinia, when he comes into this part of his dominions, makes but a very mean and insignificant appearance; we lay at Aix, once famous for its hot baths, and the next night at Annecy; the day after, by noon, we got to Geneva. I have not time to say anything about it, nor of our solitary journey back again.

TO RICHARD WEST

TURIN, Nov 16, N. S. 1739.

After eight days' journey through Greenland, we arrived at Turin. You approach it by a handsome avenue of nine miles long, and quite strait. The entrance is guarded by certain vigilant dragons, called Douâniers,¹ who mumbled us for some time. The city is not large, as being a place of strength, and consequently confined within its fortifications; it has many beauties and some faults, among the first are streets all laid out by the line, regular uniform buildings, fine walks that surround the whole, and in general a good lively clean appearance. But the houses are of brick plastered, which is apt to want repairing, the windows of oiled paper, which is apt to be torn, and everything very slight, which is apt to tumble down. There is an excellent opera, but it is only in the carnival, balls every night, but only in the carnival, masquerades too, but only in the carnival. This carnival lasts only from Christmas to Lent, one half of the remaining part of the year is passed in remembering the last, the other in expecting the future carnival. We cannot well subsist upon such slender diet, no more than upon an execrable Italian comedy, and a puppet-show, called Rappresentazione d'un anima dannata,² which, I think, are all the present diversions of the place; except the Marquise de Cavallac's Conversation, where one goes to see people play at ombre and taroc, a game with seventy-two cards all painted with suns and moons and devils and monks. Mr. Walpole has been at court, the family are at present at a country palace, called La Venerie. The palace here in town is the very quintessence of gilding and looking-glass; inlaid floors, carved panels, and painting, wherever they could stick a brush. I own I have not, as yet, anywhere met with those grand and simple works of art that are to amaze one, and whose sight one is to be the better for; but those of Nature have astonished me beyond expression. In our little journey up to the Grande Chartreuse, I do not remember to have gone ten paces without an exclamation, that there was no restraining: not a precipice, not a torrent, not a cliff, but is pregnant with religion and poetry. There are certain scenes that would awe an atheist into belief, without the help of other argument. One need not have a very fantastic imagination to see spirits there at noon-day. You have Death perpetually before your eyes, only so far removed as to compose the mind without frightening it. I am well persuaded St Bruno was a man of no common genius to choose such a situation for his retirement, and perhaps should have been a disciple of his, had I been born in his time. You may believe Abelard and Heloise were not forgot upon this occasion. If I do not mistake, I saw you too every now and then at a distance along the trees, il me semble, que j'ai vu ce chien de visage là quelque part.¹ You seemed to call to me from the other side of the precipice, but the noise of the river below was so great, that I really could not distinguish what you said, it seemed to have a cadence like verse. In your next you will be so good to let me know what it was. The week we have since passed among the Alps has not equalled the single day upon that mountain, because the winter was rather too far advanced, and the weather a little foggy. However, it did not want its beauties, the savage rudeness of the view is inconceivable without seeing it. I reckoned in one day thirteen cascades, the least of which was, I dare say, one hundred feet in height. I had Livy in the chaise with me, and beheld his "Nives cælo propè immixta, tecta informia imposita rupibus, pecora jumentaque torrida frigore, homines intonsi and inculti, animæ inanimæ omnia rigentia gelu, omnia confragosa, præruptaque"² The creatures that inhabit them are, in all respects, below humanity, and most of them, especially women, have the tumidum guttur,³ which they call goscia. Mont Cenis, I confess, carries the permission mountains have of being frightful rather too far, and its horrors were ac-accompanied with too much danger to give cus too, for the first time; and wished

TO HORACE WALPOLE

[1760]

I am so charmed with the two specimens of Erse poetry,² that I cannot help giving you the trouble to enquire a little farther about them, and should wish to see a few lines of the original, that I may form some slight idea of the language, the measures, and the rhythm

Is there anything known of the author or authors, and of what antiquity are they supposed to be? Is there any more to be had of equal beauty, or at all approaching to it? I have been often told that the poem called Hardicanute (which I always admired and still admire) was the work of somebody that lived a few years ago This I do not at all believe, though it has evidently been retouched in places by some modern hand but however, I am authorized by this report to ask whether the two poems in question are certainly antique and genuine I make this enquiry in quality of an antiquary, and am not otherwise concerned about it for, if I were sure that any one now living in Scotland had written them to divert himself, and laugh at the credulity of the world, I would undertake a journey into the Highlands only for the pleasure of seeing him.

(because it is merely description), but yet full of nature and noble wild imagination. Five bards pass the night at the castle of a chief (himself a principal bard); each goes out in his turn to observe the face of things, and returns with an extempore picture of the changes he has seen; it is an October night (the harvest-month of the Highlands). This is the whole plan; yet there is a contrivance, and a preparation of ideas, that you would not expect The oddest thing is, that every one of them sees ghosts (more or less). The idea that struck and surprised me most, is the following One of them (describing a storm of wind and rain) says—

(Ghosts ride on the tempest tonight
 Sweet is their voice between the gusts of wind, Their songs are of other worlds'

Did you never observe (while rocking winds are piping loud¹) that pause, as the gust is recollecting itself, and rising upon the ear in a shrill and plaintive note, like the swell of an Æolian harp? I do assure you there is nothing in the world so like the voice of a spirit. Thomson had an ear sometimes he was not deaf to this, and has described it gloriously, but given it another different turn, and of more horror I cannot repeat the lines: it is in his "Winter."² There is another very fine picture in one of them It describes the breaking of the clouds after the storm before it is settled into a calm, and when the moon is seen by short intervals.

The waves are tumbling on the lake,
 And lash the rocky sides,
 The boat is brim-full in the cove,
 The oars on the rocking tide
 Had sits a maid beneath a cliff, And eyes the rolling stream.
 Her Lover promised to come,
 She saw his boat (when it was evening) on the lake:
 Are these his organs in the oak?
 Is this his broken boat on the shore?³

TO RICHARD STONEHEWER

LONDON, June 29, 1760

I have received another Scotch packet with a third specimen, inferior in kind

¹ Some sunny hills and rivulets flowing beside woods, and scenes more worthy the abode of man — Livy, History of Rome, 21. 37.
² Specimens of the Ossianic poems, which Macpherson declared he had collected in the Scottish Highlands, and had translated from the Gaelic or Erse language

² See II 67-71, 149-52, 175-201.

³ These lines were published in a note to Macpherson's Croms

clergyman in the Highlands. He means to publish a collection he has of these specimens of antiquity, but what plagues me is, I cannot come at any certainty on that head. I was so struck, so *extasie*¹ with their infinite beauty, that I writ into Scotland to make a thousand enquiries. The letters I have in return are ill wrote, ill reasoned, unsatisfactory, calculated (one would imagine) to deceive one, and yet not cunning enough to do it cleverly. In short, the whole external evidence would make one believe these fragments (for so he calls them, though nothing can be more entire) counterfeit, but the internal is so strong on the other side, that I am resolved to believe them genuine, spite of the devil and the kirk. It is impossible to convince me that they were invented by the same man that writes me these letters. On the other hand, it is almost as hard to suppose, if they are original, that he should be able to translate them so admirably. What can one do? Since Stonehewer went, I have received another of a very different and inferior kind (being merely descriptive), much more modern than the former (he says), yet very old too. This too in its way is extremely fine. In short, this man is the very dæmon of poetry, or he has lighted on a treasure hid for ages. The Welch poets are also coming to light. I have seen a discourse in MS about them (by one Mr Evans, a clergyman) with specimens of their writings. This is in Latin, and though it don't approach the other, there are fine scraps among it

TO THE REVEREND WILLIAM MASON

PEMBROKE HALL, August 7, 1760

The Eise fragments have been published five weeks ago in Scotland, though I had them not (by a mistake) till the other day. As you tell me new things do not reach you soon at Aston, I inclose what I can, the rest shall follow, when you tell me whether you have not got the pamphlet already. I send the two which I had before, for Mr. Wood, because he has not the affectation of not admiring. I continue to think them genuine, though my reasons for believing the contrary are rather stronger than ever: but I will have them antique, for I never knew a Scotchman of my own time that could read, much less write, poetry; and such poetry too! I have one enraptured

(from Mr Macpherson) which he has not printed: it is mere description, but excellent, too, in its kind. If you are good, and will learn to admire, I will transcribe it.

As to their authenticity, I have made many enquiries, and have lately procured a letter from Mr David Hume (the historian), which is more satisfactory than anything I have yet met with on that subject. He says—

“(certain it is that these poems are in everybody's mouth in the Highlands, have been handed down from father to son, and are of an age beyond all memory and tradition. Adam Smith, the celebrated professor in Glasgow, told me that the piper of the Argyllshire Militia repeated to him all of those which Mr Macpherson had translated, and many more of equal beauty. Major Mackay (Lord Rae's brother) told me that he remembers them perfectly well, as likewise did the Laird of Macfarlane (the greatest antiquarian we have in this country), and who insists strongly on the historical truth as well as the poetical beauty of these productions. I could add the Laird and Lady Macleod, with many more, that live in different parts of the Highlands, very remote from each other, and could only be acquainted with what had become (in a manner) national works. There is a country surgeon in Lochaber who has by heart the entire epic poem¹ mentioned by Mr Macpherson in his preface, and, as he is old, is perhaps the only person living that knows it all, and has never committed it to writing, we are in the more haste to recover a monument which will certainly be regarded as a curiosity in the republic of letters: we have, therefore, set about a subscription of a guinea or two guineas apiece, in order to enable Mr Macpherson to undertake a mission into the Highlands to recover this poem, and other fragments of antiquity.”

He adds, too, that the names of Fingal, Ossian, Oscar, etc. are still given in the Highlands to large mastiffs, as we give to ours the names of Cæsar, Pompey, Hector, etc.

keep their distance. He is one of Lucretius' gods, supremely blessed in the contemplation of his own felicity, and what has he to do with worshippers? This, mind, is the first reason why I did not come to York: the second is, that I do not love confinement, and probably by next summer may be permitted to touch whom, and where, and with what I think fit, without giving you any offence: the third and last, and not the least perhaps, is, that the finances were at so low an ebb that I could not exactly do what I wished, but was obliged to come the shortest road to town and recruit them. I do not justly know what your taste in reasons may be, since you altered your condition, but there is the ingenious, the petulant, and the dull, for you any one would have done, for in my conscience I do not believe you care a halfpenny for any reasons at present, so God bless ye both, and give ye all ye wish, when ye are restored to the use of your wishes.

I am returned from Scotland charmed with my expedition, it is of the Highlands I speak, the Lowlands are worth seeing once, but the mountains are ecstatic, and ought to be visited in pilgrimage once a year. None but those monstrous creatures of God know how to join so much beauty with so much horror. A fig for your poets, painters, gardeners, and clergymen, that have not been among them: their imagination can be made of nothing but howling-greens, flowering shrubs, horse-ponds, Fleet ditches, shell grottoes, and Chinese rails.¹ Then I had so so beautiful an autumn, Italy could hardly produce a nobler scene, and this so sweetly contrasted with that perfection of nastiness, and total want of accommodation, that Scotland only can supply. Oh, you would have blessed yourself. I shall certainly go again, what a pity it is I cannot draw, nor describe, nor ride on horse-back.

Stonehewer is the busiest creature upon earth except Mr. Fraser, they stand pretty tight, for all his Royal Highness. Have you read (oh no, I had forgot) Dr. Lowth's pamphlet against your uncle the Bishop? Oh, how he works him. I hear he will soon be on the same bench. Today Mr. Hurd came to see me, but we had not a word of that matter, he is grown pure and plump, just of the proper breadth for a celebrated town-preacher. There was Dr. Balguy too, he says Mrs. Mason is very handsome, so you are his friend forever. Lord Newnham, I hear, has ill health of late, it is a nervous case, so have a care. How do your eyes do?

Adieu, my respects to the bride. I would kiss her, but you stand by and pretend it is not the fashion, though I know they do so at Hull—I am ever yours,
T. G.

From JOURNAL IN THE LAKES

1769

Sept. 30, 1769. On the ascent of the hill above Appleby the thick hanging wood and the long reaches of the Eden (rapid, clear, and full as ever) winding below with views of the castle and town, gave much employment to the mirror, but the sun was wanting and the sky overcast. In the afternoon walked up the Beacon-hill a mile to the top, saw Whinfield and Lowther Parks, and through an opening in the bosom of that cluster of mountains, which the Doctor well remembers, the lake of Ullswater, with the craggy tops of a hundred nameless hills.

October 3. Wind at S. E., a heavenly day. Rose at 7, and walked out under the conduct of my landlord to Borrodale. The grass was covered with a hoar frost, which soon melted, and exhaled in a thin bluish smoke. Crossed the meadows obliquely, catching a diversity of views among the hills over the lake and islands, and changing prospect at every ten paces, left Cockshut and Castlehill (which we formerly mounted) behind me, and drew near the foot of Walla-crag, whose bare and rocky brow, cut perpendicularly down above 400 feet, as I guess, awfully overlooks the way, our path here tends to the left, and the ground gently rising, and covered with a glade of scattering trees and bushes on the very margin of the water, opens both ways the most delicious view, that my eyes ever beheld. Behind you are the magnificent heights of Walla-crag, opposite lie the thick hanging woods of Lord Egremont, and Newland valley, with green and smiling fields embosomed in the dark cliffs; to the left the jaws of Borrodale, with that turbulent chaos of mountain behind mountain, rolled in confusion; beneath you, and stretching far away to the right, the shining purity of the Lake, just ruffled by the breeze, enough to shew it is alive, reflecting rocks, woods, fields, and inverted tops of mountains, with the white buildings of Keswick, Crosthwait church, and Skiddaw for a background at a distance. Oh! Doctor! I never wished more for you; and pray think, how the glass played its part in such a spot, which is called Carf-close-reeds; I choose to set down these barbarous names, that any body may enquire on the place, and easily find the particular station, that I mean. This scene continues to Borrow-gate, and a little farther, passing a brook called Barrow-beck, we entered Borrodale. The crags, named Lodoor-banks, now begin to impend terribly over your way; and more terribly, when you hear, that three years since an immense mass of rock tumbled at once from the brow, and barred all access to the dale (for this is the only road) till they could work their way through it. Luckily no one was passing at the time of this fall; but down the side of the mountain, and far into the lake he dispersed the huge fragments of this ruin in all shapes and in all directions. Something farther we turned aside into a copse, ascending a little in front of Lodoor waterfall, the height appears to be about 200 feet, the quantity of water not great, though (these days excepted) it had rained daily in the hills for nearly two months before; but then the stream was nobly broken, leaping from rock to rock, and foaming with fury. On one side a towering crag, that spired up to equal, if not overtop, the neighboring cliffs (this lay all in shade and darkness) on the other hand a rounder broader projecting hill shagged with wood and illumined by the sun, which glanced sideways on the upper part of the cataract. The force of the water wearing a deep channel in the ground hurries away to join the lake. We descended again, and passed the stream over a rude bridge. Soon after we came under Gowder crag, a hill more formidable to the eye and to the apprehension than that of Lodoor; the rocks a-top, deep-cloven perpendicularly by the rains, hanging loose and nodding forwards, seem just starting from their base in shivers; the whole way down, and the road on both sides is strewn with piles of the fragments strangely thrown across each other, and of a dreadful bulk. The place reminds one of those passes in the Alps, where the guides tell you to move on with speed, and say nothing, lest the agitation of the air should loosen the snows above, and bring down a mass, that would overwhelm a caravan. I took their counsel here and hastened on in silence. . . . Walked leisurely home the way we came, but saw a new landscape: the features indeed were the same in part, but many new ones were disclosed by the midday sun, and the tints were entirely changed. Take notice this was the best or perhaps the only day for going up Skiddaw, but I thought it better employed: it was perfectly serene, and hot as midsummer.

In the evening walked alone down to the Lake by the side of Crow-Park after sunset and saw the solemn coloring of night draw on, the last gleam of sunshine fading away on the hill-tops, the deep serene of the waters, and the long shadows of the mountains thrown across them, till they nearly touched the hithermost shore. At distance heard the murmur of many waterfalls not audible in the day-time. Wished for the moon, but she was dark to me and silent, hid in her vacant interlunar cave.

October 8 Past by the little chapel of Wiborn, out of which the Sunday congregation were then issuing. Past a beck near Dunmailraise and entered Westmoreland a second time, now begun to see Helm-crag distinguished from its rugged neighbors not so much by its height, as by the strange broken outline of its top, like some gigantic building demolished, and the stones that composed it flung across each other in wild confusion. Just beyond it opens one of the sweetest landscapes that art ever attempted to imitate. The bosom of the mountains spreading here into a broad basin discovers in the midst (Grasmere-water, its margin is hollowed into small bays with bold eminences: some of them rocks, some of soft turf that half conceal and vary the figure of the little lake they command. From the shore a low promontory pushes itself far into the water, and on it stands a white village with the parish-church rising in the midst of it, hanging enclosures, corn-fields, and meadows green as an emerald, with their trees and hedges, and cattle fill up the whole space from the edge of the water. Just opposite to you is a large farm-house at the bottom of a steep smooth lawn embosomed in old woods, which climb half way up the mountain's side, and discover above them a broken line of crags, that crown the scene. Not a single red tile, no flaming gentleman's house, or garden walls break in upon the repose of this little unsuspected paradise, but all is peace, rusticity, and happy poverty in its neatest, most becoming attire

Whose grotto stands upon the topmost rock
Of Teneriff, 'mid the tempestuous night,
On which, in calmest mediation held, 10 Thou hear'st with howling winds the beating rain
And drifting hail descend, or if the skies Unclouded shine, and thro' the blue serene
Pale Cynthia rolls her silver-axled ear, Whence gazing stedfast on the spangled vault 10 Raptur'd thou sitt'st, while murmurs indistinct
Of distant billows sooth thy pensive
ear
With hoarse and hollow sounds, secure, self-blest,
There oft thou listen'st to the wild uproar
Of fleets encount'ring, that in whispers
low 15 Ascends the rocky summit, where thou dwell'st Remote from man, conversing with the spheres'
O lead me, queen sublime, to solemn
glooms
Congenial with my soul, to cheerless
shades,
To ruin'd seats, to twilight cells and bow'rs, 20 Where thoughtful Melancholy loves to muse.
Her fav'rite midnight haunts The laughing scenes
Of purple Spring, where all the wanton
train
Of Smiles and Graces seem to lead the dance

In sportive round, while from their hand they show'r 25 Ambrosial blooms and flow'rs, no longer
charm,
Tempe, no more I court thy balmy
breeze,
Adieu green vales! ye broder'd meads, adieu!
Beneath yon ruined abbey's moss-grown piles
Oft let me sit, at twilight hour of eve, 30 Where through some western window the pale moon
Pours her long-levelled rule of streaming light,
While sullen, sacred silence reigns around Save the lone screech-owl's note, who builds his bow'r Amid the mould'ring caverns dark and damp, 35 Or the calm breeze that rustles in the leaves
Of flaunting ivy, that with mantle greer invests some wasted tow'r Or let me tread
Its neighb'ring walk of pines, where mused of old
The cloistered brothers through the gloomy void 40 That far extends beneath their ample arch
As on I pace, religious horror wraps My soul in dread repose. But when the
world
Is clad in midnight's raven-coloured robe,
'Mid hollow charnel let me watch the flame
45 Of taper dim, shedding a livid glare O'er the wan heaps, while airy voices talk
Along the glimm'ring walls, or ghostly shape,
At distance seen, invites with beck'ning
hand
My lonesome steps through the far winding vaults.
50 Nor undelightful is the solemn noon Of night, when, haply wakeful, from my couch
I start: lo, all is motionless around!
Roars not the rushing wind, the son of men
And every beast in mute oblivion lie; 55 All Nature's hushed in silence and in
sleep
O then how fearful is it to reflect That through the still globe's awful solitude

No being wakes but me! till stealing
sleep
My drooping temples bathes in opiate
dew.

- 60 Nor then let dreams, of wanton folly
born,
My senses lead through flow'ry paths of joy
But let the sacred genius of the night
Such mystic visions send as Spenser saw¹ When through bewild'ring Fancy's magic
maze, 65 To the fell house of Busyrane, he led Th' unshaken Britomart; or Milton knew,
When in abstracted thought he first conceived
All heav'n in tumult, and the seraphim Come tow'ring, arm'd in adamant and gold.²

- Thro' Pope's soft song tho' all the Graces breathe,
And happiest art adorn his Attic³ page; 155 Yet does my mind with sweeter transport glow,
As at the root of mossy trunk reclin'd.
In magic Spenser's wildly-warbled song⁴
I see deserted Lina wander wide Thro' wasteful solitudes, and lurid heaths, 160 Weary, forlorn, than when the fated fair
Upon the bosom bright of silver Thames Launches in all the lustre of brocade.
Amid the splendors of the laughing Sun⁵
The gay description falls upon the sense.
165 And coldly strikes the mind with feeble bliss

THE CRUSADE
1777

Bound for holy Palestine, Nimble we brush'd the level brine,
All in azure steel array'd;
O'er the wave our weapons play'd, 5 And made the dancing billows glow, High upon the trophied prow,
Many a warrior-minstrel swung His sounding harp, and boldly sung
"Syrian virgins, wail and weep, 10 English Richard plows the deep!"
Tremble, watchmen, as ye spy
From distant towers, with anxious eye,
The radiant range of shield and lance Down Damascus' hills advance 15 From Sion's turrets as afar Ye ken the march of Europe's war!
Saladin, thou paynim king,
From Albion's isle revenge we bring!
On Acon's spiry citadel, 20 Though to the gale thy banners swell, Pictur'd with the silver moon,
England shall end thy glory soon!
In vain, to break our firm array,
Thy brazen drums hoarse discord bray 25 Those sounds our rising fury fan English Richard in the van,
On to victory we go,
A vaunting infidel the foe!"
Blondel led the tuneful band, 30 And swept the wire with glowing hand Cyprus, from her rocky mound.
And Crete, with piny verdure crown'd,
Far along the smiling main Echoed the prophetic strain.
35 Soon we kiss'd the sacred earth
That gave a murder'd Saviour birth; Then, with ardor fresh endu'd,
Thus the solemn song renew'd:—
"Lo, the toilsome voyage past, 40 Heaven's favor'd hills appear at last!
Object of our holy vow,
We tread the Tyrian valleys now
From Carmel's almond-shaded steep
We feel the cheering fragrance creep:
45 O'er Engaddi's shrubs of balm

¹ swarms of beetles

Waves the date-empurpled palm;
See Lebanon's aspiring head Wide his immortal umbrage spread!
Hail Calvary, thou mountain hoar, 50 Wet with our Redeemer's gore!
Ye trampled tombs, ye fanes forlorn, Ye stones, by tears of pilgrims worn;
Your ravish'd honors to restore,
Fearless we climb this hostile shore!
55 And thou, the sepulchre of God!
By mocking pagans rudely trod,
Bereft of every awful rite,
And quench'd thy lamps that beam'd so bright;
For thee, from Britain's distant coast, 60 Lo, Richard leads his faithful host!
Aloft in his heroic hand,
Blazing, like the beacon's brand, O'er the far-affrighted fields,
Resistless Kaliburn he wields 65 Proud Saracen, pollute no more
The shrines by martyrs built of yore From each wild mountain's trackless crown
In vain thy gloomy castles frown
Thy battering engines, huge and high, 70 In vain our steel-clad steeds defy;
And, rolling in terrific state,
On giant-wheels harsh thunders grate When eve has hush'd the buzzing camp,
Amid the moonlight vapors damp, 75 Thy necromantic forms, in vain, Haunt us on the tented plain:
We bid those spectre-shapes avoant, Ashtaroath, and Termagaunt!
With many a demon, pale of hue, 80 Doom'd to drink the bitter dew That drops from Macon's sooty tree,
'Mid the dread grove of ebony
Nor magic charms, nor fends of hell,
The Christian's holy courage quell.
85 Salem, in ancient majesty Arise, and lift thee to the sky!
Soon on thy battlements divine Shall wave the badge of Constantine Ye Barons, to the sun unfold 90 Our Cross with crimson wove and gold!"

 Or here those kings in solemn state were crown'd.
 Studious to trace thy wondrous origine,
 We muse on many an ancient tale

ON KING ARTHUR'S ROUND TABLE AT WINCHESTER

Where Venta's Norman castle still uprears
 Its rafter'd hall, that o'er the grassy foss,
 And scatter'd flinty fragments clad in moss,
 On yonder steep in naked state appears,
 5 High-hung remains, the pride of warlike years, Old Arthur's board on the capacious
 round
 Some British pen has sketch'd the names renown'd,
 In marks obscure, of his immortal peers Though join'd by magic skill, with many a rhyme, 10 The Druid frame, unhonor'd, falls a prey
 To the slow vengeance of the wizard

 And fade the British characters away; Yet Spenser's page, that chants in verse sublime
 Those chiefs, shall live, unconscious of decay.

From OBSERVATIONS ON THE FAIRY QUEEN OF SPENSER
1754

It is absurd to think of judging either Ariosto or Spenser by precepts which they did not attend to. We who live in the days of writing by rule are apt to try every composition by those laws which we have been taught to think the sole criterion of excellence. Critical taste is universally diffused, and we require the same order and design which every modern performance is expected to have, in poems where they never were regarded or intended. Spenser, and the same may be said of Ariosto, did not live in an age of planning. His poetry is the careless exuberance of a warm imagination and a strong sensibility. It was his business to engage the fancy, and to interest the attention by bold and striking images, in the formation and the disposition of which, little labor or art was applied.
The various and the marvellous were the chief sources of delight. Hence we find our author ransacking alike the regions of reality and romance, of truth and fiction, to find the proper decoration and furniture for his fairy structure. Born in such an age, Spenser wrote rapidly from his own feelings, which at the same time were naturally noble. Exactness¹ in his poem would have been like the cornice which a painter introduced in the grotto of Calypso. Spenser's beauties are like the flowers in Paradise,

Which not nice Art
In beds and curious knots, but Nature boon Pour'd forth profuse, on hill, and dale, and plain.
Both where the morning sun first warmly smote
The open field, or where the unperc'd shade Imbrown'd the noon-tide bowers.

—Paradise Lost, 4, 241

If The Fairy Queen be destitute of that arrangement and economy which epic severity requires, yet we scarcely regret the loss of these while their place is so amply supplied by something which more powerfully attracts us, something which engages the affections, the feelings of the heart, rather than the cold approbation of the head. If there be any poem whose graces please because they are situated beyond the reach of art, and where the force and faculties of creative imagination delight because they are unassisted and unrestrained by those of deliberate judgment, it is this. In reading Spenser, if the critic is not satisfied, yet the reader is transported. (I, 15-16.)

I cannot dismiss this section without a wish that this neglected author [Chaucer], whom Spenser proposed as the pattern of his style, and to whom he is indebted for many noble inventions, should be more universally studied. This is at least what one might expect in an age of research and curiosity. Chaucer is regarded rather as an old, than as a good, poet. We look upon his poems as venerable relics, not as beautiful compositions, as pieces better calculated to gratify the antiquarian than the critic.
He abounds not only in strokes of humor, which is commonly supposed to be his sole talent, but of pathos and sublimity not unworthy a more refined age. His old manners, his romantic arguments, his wildness of painting,¹ his simplicity and antiquity of expression, transport us into some fairy region, and are all highly pleasing to the imagination. It is true that his uncouth² and unfamiliar language disgusts and deters many readers, but the principal reason of his being so little known and so seldom taken into hand, is the convenient opportunity of reading him with pleasure and facility in modern imitations. For when translation, and such, imitations from Chaucer may be justly called, at length becomes substituted as the means of attaining a knowledge of any difficult and ancient author, the original not only begins to be neglected and excluded as less easy, but also despised as less ornamental and elegant. Thus the public taste becomes imperceptibly vitiated, while the genuine model is superseded, and gradually gives way to the establishment of a more specious but false resemblance. Thus, too many readers, happy to find the readiest accommodation for their indolence and their illiteracy, think themselves sufficient masters of Homer from Pope's translation; and thus, by an indiscreet comparison, Pope's translation is commonly preferred to the Grecian text, in proportion as the former is

¹ conformity to set rules (The eighteenth century was devoted to "exactness" in form and style of writing)

¹ Chaucer's descriptions are noted for their naturality and truth rather than for their wildness; and although he was fond of the medieval romances, his material is largely realistic

² This judgment is due to ignorance of Middle English. Chaucer's language is in no sense uncouth

furnished with more frequent and shining metaphors, more lively descriptions, and in general appears to be more full and florid, more elaborate and various (I, 196-198)

Mechanical critics will perhaps be disgusted at the liberties I have taken in introducing so many anecdotes of ancient chivalry. But my subject required frequent proofs of this sort. Nor could I be persuaded that such enquiries were, in other respects, either useless or ridiculous; as they tended, at least, to illustrate an institution of no frivolous or indifferent nature. Chivalry is commonly looked upon as a barbarous sport or extravagant amusement of the dark ages. It had, however, no small influence on the manners, policies, and constitutions of ancient times, and served many public and important purposes. It was the school of fortitude, honor, and affability. Its exercises, like the Grecian games, habituated the youth to fatigue and enterprise, and inspired the noblest sentiments of heroism. It taught gallantry and civility to a savage and ignorant people, and humanized the native ferocity of the Northern nations. It conduced to refine the manners of the combatants by exciting an emulation in the devices and accoutrements, the splendor and parade, of their tilts and tournaments; while its magnificent festivals, thronged with noble dames and courteous knights, produced the first efforts of wit and fancy.

I am still further to hope that, together with other specimens of obsolete literature in general hinted at before, the many references I have made in particular to romances, the necessary appendage of ancient chivalry, will also plead their pardon. For however monstrous and unnatural these compositions may appear to this age of reason and refinement, they merit more attention than the world is willing to bestow. They preserve many curious historical facts, and throw considerable light on the nature of the feudal system. They are the pictures of ancient usages and customs; and represent the manners, genius, and character of our ancestors. Above all, such are their terrible Graces of magic and enchantment, so magnificently marvellous are their fictions and fables, that they contribute, in a wonderful degree, to rouse and invigorate all the powers of imagination; to store the fancy with those sublime and alarming images which poetry best delights to display. (II, 266-268)

JOSEPH WARTON (1722-1800)

THE ENTHUSIAST OR THE LOVER OF NATURE 1740 1744

Ye green-rob'd Dryads, oft at dusky eve
By wondering shepherds seen, to forests brown,
To unfrequented meads, and pathless wilds, Lead me from gardens deck'd with art's vain pomp Can gilt alcoves, can marble-mimic gods, Patteries embroider'd, obelisks, and urns,
Of high relief, can the long, spreading lake,
Or vista lessening to the sight, can stow,
With all her Attic lanes, such raptures raise,
As the thrush-haunted copse, where lightly leaps
The fearful fawn the rustling leaves along,
And the brisk squirrel sports from bough to bough, While from an hollow oak, whose naked roots O'erhang a pensive rill, the busy bees Hum drowsy lullabies? The hards of old, Fair Nature's friends, sought such retreats, to charm Sweet Echo with their songs, oft too they met,
In summer evenings, near sequester'd bowers,
Or mountain-nymph, or Muse, and eager learnt
The moral strains she taught to mend mankind
As in a secret grove, Algeria stole With patient Numa, and in silent night Whisper'd him sacred laws, he list'ning sat.
Rapt with her virtuous voice, old Tiber lean'd Attentive on his urn, and hush'd his waves Rich in her weeping country's spoils, Versailles

- May boast a thousand fountains, that can cast
The tortur'd waters to the distant Heav'ns;
Yet let me choose some pine-topt precipice 30 Abrupt and shaggy, whence a foamy stream,
Like Anio, tumbling roars, or some bleak heath,
Where straggling stands the mournful juniper,
Or yew-tree scath'd, while in clear prospect round,
From the grove's bosom spires emerge.
and smoke 15 In blush wreaths ascends, ripe harvest
wave,
Low lonely cottages, and ruin'd tops Of Gothic battlements appear, and
streams
Beneath the sun-beams twinkle — The shrill lark,
That wakes the woodman to his early task, 40 Or love-sick Philomel, whose luscious lays Soothe the lone night-wanderers, the moaning dove
Pitied by list'ning milk-maid, far excel
The deep-mouth'd viol, the soul-lulling lute,
And battle-breathing trumpet. Artful
sounds!
45 That please not like the choughs of
air,
When first they hail th' approach of laughing May Can Kent design like Nature? Mark where Thames Plenty and pleasure pours through Lincoln's meads,
Can the great artist, though with taste supreme 50 Endu'd, one beauty to this Eden add?
Though he, by rules unfetter'd, boldly scorns Formality and method, round and square Disdaining, plans irregularly great Creative Titian, can thy vivid strokes, 55 Or thine, O graceful Raphael, dare to vie
With the rich tints that paint the breathing mead?
The thousand-color'd tulip, violet's
bell
Snow-clad and meek, the vermil-tinctur'd
rose,
And golden crocus? — Yet with these the maid,
60 Phillis or Phoebe, at a feast or wake Her jetty locks enamels, fairer she,
In innocence and homespun vestments dress'd,
Than if cerulean sapphires at her ears Shone pendant, or a precious diamond-cross 65 Heav'd gently on her panting bosom white.
Yon shepherd idly stretch'd on the rude rock, List'ning to dashing waves, and sea-mew's clang
High-lovering o'er his head, who views beneath
The dolphin dancing o'er the level brine, 70 Feels more true bliss than the proud admiral.
Amid his vessels bright with burnish'd gold
And silken streamers, though his lordly nod
Ten thousand war-worn mariners revere
And great Aeneas gaz'd with more de-
light 75 On the rough mountain shagg'd with horrid shades, (Where cloud-compelling Jove, as fancy dream'd, Descending, shook his direful ægis black) Than if he enter'd the high Capitol On golden columns rear'd, a conquer'd
world
80 Exhausted, to enrich its stately head More pleas'd he slept in poor Evander's cot
On shaggy skins, lull'd by sweet nightingales,
Than if a Nero, in an age refin'd, Beneath a gorgeous canopy had plac'd 85 His royal guest, and bade his minstrels
sound
Soft slumb'rous airs, to sooth his rest Happy the first of men, ere yet confin'd
To smoky cities, who in sheltering
groves,
Warm caves, and deep-sunk vallies liv'd and lov'd, 90 By cares unwounded, what the sun and
showers,
And genial earth untillag'd, could produce,
They gather'd grateful, or the acorn brown
Or blushing berry; by the liquid lapse

- Of murm'ring waters call'd to slake their thirst, 95 Or with fair nymphs their sun-brown limbs to bathe,
With nymphs who fondly clasp'd their 130
fav'rite youths,
Unaw'd by shame, beneath the beechen
shade,
Nor wiles, nor artificial coyness knew Then doors and walls were not, the melting maid 100 Nor frown of parents fear'd, nor husband's threats,
Nor had cur'd gold their tender hearts 145 allur'd
Then beauty was not venal. Injur'd
Love,
O! whither, god of raptures, art thou fled?
While Avarice waves his golden wand
around,
105 Abhorr'd magician, and his costly cup Prepares with baneful drugs, t' enchant the souls
Of each low-thoughted fair to wed for gain
In Earth's first infancy (as sung the bard
Who strongly painted what he boldly
thought), 110 Though the fierce north oft smote with 145 iron whip
Their shiv'ring limbs, though oft the bristly boar
Or hungry lion, 'woke them with their howls,
And scar'd them from their moss-grown caves, to rove 115 Houseless and cold in dark tempestuous nights,
Yet were not myriads in embattl'd fields Swept off at once, nor had the raging seas O'erwhelm'd the found'ring bark and shrieking crew,
In vain the glassy ocean smil'd to tempt 120 The jolly sailor, unsuspecting harm, For Commerce ne'er had spread her swelling sails,
Nor had the wond'ring Nereids ever heard
The dashing oar then famine, want, and pain,
Sunk to the grave their fainting limbs;
but us,
125 Diseaseful dainties, riot, and excess,
And feverish luxury destroy In brakes Or marshes wild unknowingly they 160 cropp'd
- Herbs of malignant juice, to realms remote While we for powerful poisons madly roam,
From every noxious herb collecting
death.
What though unknown to those primeval sires
The well-arch'd dome, peopled with breathing forms
By fair Italia's skilful hand, unknown
The shapely column, and the crumbling busts 145 Of awful ancestors in long descent?
Yet why should man, mistaken, deem it nobler
To dwell in palaces, and high-roof'd halls,
Than in God's forests, architect supreme!
Say, is the Persian garpet, than the field's 150 Or meadow's mantle gay, more richly wov'n,
Or softer to the votaries of ease Than bladed grass, perfum'd with dew-dropt flow'rs?
O taste corrupt! that luxury and pomp,
In specious names of polish'd manners veil'd, 145 Should proudly banish Nature's simple charms!
All beauteous Nature! by thy boundless charms
Oppress'd, O where shall I begin thy praise,
Where turn th' ecstasie eye, how ease
my breast
That pants with wild astonishment and
love!
150 Dark forests, and the op'ning lawn, re-fresh'd
With ever-gushing brooks, hill, meadow,
dale,
The balmy bean-field, the gay-clover'd close,
So sweetly interchang'd, the lowing ox,
The playful lamb, the distant waterfall 155 Now faintly heard, now swelling with the breeze,
The sound of pastoral reed from hazel-
bower,
The choral birds, the neighing steed, that snuffs
His dappled mate, stung with intense desire,
The ripen'd orchard when the ruddy orbs 160 Betwixt the green leaves blush, the azure skies,

- The cheerful Sun that through Earth's vitals pours Delight and health, and heat; all, all conspire
To raise, to sooth, to harmonize the
mind,
To lift on wings of praise, to the great
Sire
165 Of being and of beauty, at whose nod Creation started from the gloomy vault Of dreary Chaos, while the griesly king Murmur'd to feel his boisterous power confin'd
What are the lays of artful Addison, 170 Coldly correct, to Shakespear's war-blings wild?
Whom on the winding Avon's willow'd banks Fair Fancy found, and bore the smiling babe
To a close cavern (still the shepherds
show
The sacred place, whence with religious awe 175 They hear, returning from the field at eve,
Strange whisp'rings of sweet music through the air)
Here, as with honey gather'd from the rock,
She fed the little prattler, and with songs
Oft sooth'd his wand'ring ears, with deep
delight 180 On her soft lap he sat, and caught the sounds
Oft near some crowded city would I walk, Listening the far-off noises, rattling cars,
Loud shouts of joy, sad shrieks of sorrow, knells
Full slowly tolling, instruments of trade, 185 Striking mine ears with one deep-swelling hum.
Or wand'ring near the sea, attend the sounds
Of hollow winds, and ever-beating waves Ev'n when wild tempests swallow up the plains,
And Boreas' blasts, big hail, and rains combine 190 To shake the groves and mountains, would I sit,
Pensively musing on the outrageous crimes
That wake Heaven's vengeance: at such solemn hours.
- Demons and goblins through the dark air shriek, While Hecat, with her black-brow'd sisters nine,
195 Rides o'er the Earth, and scatters woes and death.
Then too, they say, in drear Egyptian wilds
The lion and the tiger prowl for prey With roarings loud! the list'ning traveller Starts fear struck, while the hollow echoing vaults
200 Of pyramids increase the deathful
sounds.
But let me never fail in cloudless
nights,
When silent Cynthia in her silver car Through the blue conclave slides, when shine the hills,
Twinkle the streams, and woods look tipp'd with gold, 205 To seek some level mead, and there invoke Old Midnight's sister, Contemplation sage, (Queen of the rugged brow and stern-fist eye)
To lift my soul above this little Earth, This folly-fetter'd world to purge my ears, 210 That I may hear the rolling planets'
song,
And tuneful turning spheres if this be barr'd,
The little Fays that dance in neighboring dales,
Sipping the night-dew, while they laugh and love.
Shall charm me with aerial notes.—As thus 215 I wander musing, lo, what awful forms Yonder appear! sharp-ey'd Philosophy Clad in dun robes, an eagle on his wrist,
First meets my eye, next, virgin Solitude Serene, who blushes at each gazer's
sight,
220 Then Wisdom's hoary head, with crutch in hand,
Trembling, and bent with age, last Virtue's self Smiling, in white array'd, who with her leads Sweet Innocence, that prattles by her
side,
A naked boy!—Harass'd with fear I stop, 225 I gaze, when Virtue thus—"Who'er
thou art,

- Mortal, by whom I deign to be beheld In these my midnight-walks; depart,
 and say,
 That henceforth I and my immortal
 train Forsake Britannia's isle, who fondly stoops 230 To Vice, her favorite paramour.'—She spoke,
 And as she turn'd, her round and rosy neck
 Her flowing train, and long ambrosial hair,
 Breathing rich odors, I enamor'd view O who will bear me then to western climes, 235 (Since Virtue leaves our wretched land) to fields
 Yet unpolluted with Iberian swords
 The isles of Innocence, from mortal view Deeply retir'd, beneath a plantane's
 shade,
 Where Happiness and Quest sit enthron'd, 240 With simple Indian swains, that I may hunt
 The boar and tiger through savannahs¹
 wild,
 Through fragrant deserts, and through citron groves?
 There, fed on dates and herbs, would I despise
 The far-fetch'd cates of luxury, and hoards
 245 Of narrow-hearted avarice; nor heed
 The distant din of the tumultuous world So when rude whirlwinds rouse the roaring main,
 Beneath fair Thetis sits, in coral caves, Serenely gay, nor sinking sailor's cries 250 Disturb her sportive nymphs, who round her form
 The light fantastic dance, or for her hair
 Weave rosy crowns, or with according lutes
 Grace the soft warbles of her honied voice

ODE TO FANCY
 1746

- O parent of each lovely Muse,
 Thy spirit o'er my soul diffuse,
 O'er all my artless songs preside,
 My footsteps to thy temple guide, 5 To offer at thy turf-built shrine,

¹ tropical grasslands containing scattered trees

- In golden cups no costly wine.
 No murder'd fating of the flock,
 But flowers and honey from the rock.
 O nymph with loosely-flowing hair, 10 With buskin'd² leg, and bosom bare, Thy waist with myrtle-girdle bound,
 Thy brews with Indian feathers crown'd,
 Waving in thy snowy hand
 An all-commanding magic wand, 15 Of pow'r to bid fresh gardens blow,
 'Mid cheerless Lapland's barren snow, Whose rapid wings thy flight convey Thro' air, and over earth and sea, While the vast various landscape lies 20 'conspicuous to thy piercing eyes.
 O lover of the desert, hail!
 Say, in what deep and pathless vale,
 Or on what hoary mountain's side,
 'Mid fall of waters, you reside, 25 'Mid broken rocks, a rugged scene.
 With green and grassy dales between.
 'Mid forests dark of aged oak,
 Ne'er echoing with the woodman's stroke,
 Where never human art appear'd.
 30 Nor ev'n one straw-roof'd cot was reared.
 Where Nature seems to sit alone,
 Majestic on a craggy throne,
 Tell me the path, sweet wand'rer, tell.
 To thy unknown sequest' red cell, 35 Where woodbines cluster round the
 door,
 Where shells and moss o'erlay the floor,
 And on whose top an hawthorn blows,
 Amid whose thickly-woven boughs
 Some nightingale still builds her nest, 40 Each evening warbling thee to rest.
 Then lay me by the haunted stream, Rapt in some wild, poetic dream.
 In converse while methinks I rove
 With Spenser through a fairy grove; 45 Till, suddenly awak'd, I hear Strange whisper'd music in my ear,
 And my glad soul in bliss is drown'd
 By the sweetly-soothing sound!
 Me, goddess, by thy right hand lead 50 Sometimes through the yellow mead, Where Joy and white-rob'd Peace resort.
 And Venus keeps her festive court, Where Mirth and Youth each evening
 meet,
 And lightly trip with nimble feet, 55 Nodding their hly-crowned heads, Where Laughter, rose-hipp'd Hebe, leads;
 Where Echo walks steep hills among,
 List'ning to the shepherd's song.
 Yet not these flowery fields of joy 60 Can long my pensive mind employ, Haste, Fancy, from the scenes of folly, clad in a buskin, or half-boot

To meet the matron Melancholy, Goddess of the tearful eye,
 That loves to fold her arms, and sigh;
 65 Let us with silent footsteps go To charnels and the house of woe,
 To Gothic churches, vaults, and tombs, Where each sad night some virgin comes.
 With throbbing breast, and faded cheek, 70 Her promis'd bridegroom's urn to seek,
 Or to some abbey's mould'ring tow'rs,
 Where, to avoid cold wintry show'rs,
 The naked beggar shivering lies,
 While whistling tempests round her
 rise,
 75 And trembles lest the tottering wall Should on her sleeping infants fall.
 Now let us louder strike the lyre,
 For my heart glows with martial fire,
 I feel, I feel, with sudden heat,
 My big tumultuous bosom beat, 80 The trumpet's clangours pierce my
 ear,
 A thousand widows' shrieks I hear,
 Hush me another horse, I cry.
 Lo! the base Gallic squadrons fly, 85 Whence is this rage?—what spirit, say
 To battle hurries me away?
 'Tis Fancy, in her fiery car, Transports me to the thickest war.
 There whirls me o'er the hills of slain, 90 Where Tumult and Destruction reign; Where mad with pain, the wounded
 steed
 Tramples the dying and the dead,
 Where giant Terror stalks around,
 With sullen joy surveys the ground, 95 And, pointing to th' ensanguin'd field, Shakes his dreadful gorgon shield!
 O guide me from this horrid scene,
 To high-arch'd walks and alleys green,
 Which lovely Laura seeks to shun 100 The fervors of the mid-day sun;
 The pangs of absence, O remove!
 For thou canst place me near my love,
 Canst fold in visionary bliss,
 And let me think I steal a kiss, 105 While her ruby lips dispense Luscious nectar's quintessence!
 When young-eyed Spring profusely throws
 From her green lap the pink and rose,
 When the soft turtle of the dale 110 To Summer tells her tender tale, When Autumn cooling caverns seeks,
 And stains with wine his jolly cheeks;
 When Winter, like poor pilgrim old, Shakes his silver beard with cold;
 115 At every season let my ear

Thy solemn whispers, Fancy, hear.
 O warm, enthusiastic maid,
 Without thy powerful, vital aid,
 That breathes an energy divine, 120 That gives a soul to every line, Ne'er may I strive with lips profane
 To utter an unhallow'd strain, Nor dare to touch the sacred string, Save when with smiles thou bid'st me sing.
 125 O hear our prayer, O hither come From thy lamented Shakespear's tomb,
 On which thou lov'st to sit at eve, Musing o'er thy darling's grave;
 O queen of numbers, once again 130 Animate some chosen swain,
 Who, fill'd with unexhausted fire,
 May boldly smite the sounding lyre,
 Who with some new unequal'd song,
 May rise above the rhyming throng, 135 O'er all our list'ning passions reign, O'erwhelm our souls with joy and pain,
 With terror shake, and pity move,
 Rouse with revenge, or melt with love.
 O deign t' attend his evening walk, 140 With him in groves and grottos talk, Teach him to scorn with frigid art Feebly to touch th' unraptur'd heart;
 Like lightning, let his mighty verse
 The bosom's inmost foldings pierce; 145 With native beauties win applause Beyond cold critics' studied laws;
 O let each Muse's fame increase,
 O bid Britannia rival Greece.

From ESSAY ON THE GENIUS AND WRITINGS OF POPE
 1756-82

Thus have I endeavored to give a critical account, with freedom, but it is hoped with impartiality, of each of Pope's works; by which review it will appear, 5 that the largest portion of them is of the didactic, moral, and satyric kind, and consequently, not of the most poetic species of poetry; whence it is manifest, that good sense and judgment were his characteristic excellencies, rather than fancy and invention: not that the author of The Rape of the Lock, and Eloisa, can be thought to want imagination; but because his imagination was not his predominant 15 talent, because he indulged it not, and because he gave not so many proofs of this talent as of the other. This turn of mind led him to admire French models; he studied Boileau attentively; formed himself upon him, as Milton formed himself upon the Grecian and Italian sons of Fancy. He stuck to describing modern manners, but those manners, because they are familiar, uniform, and polished, are, in their very nature, unfit for any lofty effort of the Muse. He gradually became one of the most correct, even, and exact poets that ever wrote, polishing his pieces with a care and assiduity, that no business or avocation ever interrupted; so that if he does not frequently ravish and transport his reader, yet he does not disgust him with unexpected inequalities, and absurd improprieties. Whatever poetical enthusiasm he actually possessed, he withheld and stifled. The perusal of him affects not our minds with such strong emotions as we feel from Homer and Milton, so that no man of a true poetical spirit, is master of himself while he reads them. Hence, he is a writer fit for universal perusal, adapted to all ages and stations; for the old and for the young, the man of business and the scholar. He who would think The Faery Queen, Palamon and Arcite, The Tempest or Comus, childish and romantic, might relish Pope. Surely, it is no narrow and niggardly encomium, to say he is the great Poet of Reason, the first of ethical authors in verse. And this species of writing is, after all, the surest road to an extensive reputation. It lies more level to the general capacities of men, than the higher flights of more genuine poetry. We all remember when even a Churchill was more in vogue than a Gray. He that treats of fashionable follies and the topics of the day, that describes present persons and recent events, finds many readers, whose understandings and whose passions he gratifies. The name of Chesterfield on one hand, and of Walpole on the other, failed not to make a poem bought up and talked of. And it cannot be doubted that the Odes of Horace which celebrated, and the Satires which ridiculed, well-known and real characters at Rome, were more frequently cited, than the Æneid and the Georgic of Virgil.

Where then, according to the question proposed at the beginning of this Essay, shall we with justice be authorized to place our admired Pope? Not, assuredly, in the same rank with Spenser, Shakespeare, and Milton; however justly we may applaud the Eloisa and Rape of the Lock; but, considering the correctness, elegance, and utility of his works, the weight of sentiment, and the knowledge of man they contain, we may venture to assign him a place, next to Milton, and just above Dryden. Yet, to bring our minds steadily to make this decision, we must forget, for a moment, the divine Music Ode of Dryden; and may, perhaps, then be compelled to confess, that though Dryden be the greater genius, yet Pope is the better artist.

The preference here given to Pope above other modern English poets, it must be remembered, is founded on the excellencies of his works in general, and taken all together, for there are parts and passages in other modern authors, in Young and in Thomson, for instance, equal to any of Pope; and he has written nothing in a strain so truly sublime, as The Bard of Gray.

JAMES MACPHERSON (1738-1796)

CARTHON. A POEM

1760

A tale of the times of old! The deeds of days of other years!

The murmur of thy streams, O Lora! brings back the memory of the past. The sound of thy woods, Garmallar, is lovely in mine ear. Dost thou not behold, Malvina, a rock with its head of heath? Three aged pines bend from its face, green is the narrow plain at its feet, there the flower of the mountain grows, and shakes its white head in the breeze. The thistle is there alone, shedding its aged beard. Two stones, half sunk in the ground, shew their heads of moss. The deer of the mountain avoids the place, for he beholds a dim ghost standing there. The mighty lie, O Malvina! in the narrow plain of the rock.

A tale of the times of old! the deeds of days of other years!

Who comes from the land of strangers, with his thousands around him? the sun-beam pours its bright stream before him. His hair meets the wind of his hills. His face is settled from war. He is calm as the evening beam that looks from the cloud of the west, on Cona's silent vale. Who is it but Comhal's son, the king of mighty deeds? He beholds his hills with joy, he bids a thousand voices rise. "Ye have fled over your fields, ye sons of the distant land! The king of the world sits in his hall, and hears of his people's flight. He lifts his red eye of pride; he takes his father's sword. Ye have fled over your fields, sons of the distant land!"

Such were the words of the bards, when they came to Selma's halls. A thousand lights from the stranger's land rose in the midst of the people. The feast is spread around; the night passed away in joy. "Where is the noble Clessámmor?" said the fair-haired Fingal. "Where is the brother of Morna, in the hour of my joy?" Sullen and dark he passes his days in the vale of echoing Lora; but, behold, he comes from the hill, like a steed in his strength, who finds his companions in the breeze, and tosses his bright mane in the wind. Blest be the soul of Clessámmor, why so long from Selma?"

"Returns the chief," said Clessámmor, "in the midst of his fame? Such was the renown of Comhal in the battles of his youth. Often did we pass over Carun to the land of the strangers; our swords returned, not unstained with blood; nor did the kings of the world rejoice. Why do I remember the times of our war? My hair is mixed with gray. My hand forgets to bend the bow. I lift a lighter spear. O that my joy would return, as when I first beheld the maid, the white-bosomed daughter of the strangers, Moina, with the dark-blue eyes!"

"Tell," said the mighty Fingal, "the tale of thy youthful days. Sorrow, like a cloud on the sun, shades the soul of Clessámmor. Mournful are thy thoughts, alone, on the banks of the roaring Lora. Let us hear the sorrow of thy youth, and the darkness of thy days!"

"It was in the days of peace," replied the great Clessámmor, "I came in my bounding ship, to Balclutha's walls of towers. The winds had roared behind my sails, and Clutha's streams received my dark-bosomed ship. Three days I remained in Reuthámir's halls, and saw his daughter, that beam of light. The joy of the shell went round, and the aged hero gave the fair. Her breasts were like foam on the wave, and her eyes like stars of light: her hair was dark as the raven's wing; her soul was generous and mild. My love for Moina was great; my heart poured forth in joy."

"The son of a stranger came; a chief who loved the white-bosomed Moina. His words were mighty in the hall, he often half-unsheathed his sword. 'Where,' said he, 'is the mighty Comhal, the restless wanderer of the heath? Comes he, with his host, to Balclutha, since Clessámmor is so bold?' 'My soul,' I replied, 'O warrior! burns in a light of its own. I stand without fear in the midst of thousands, though the valiant are distant far. Stranger! thy words are mighty, for Clessámmor is alone. But my sword trembles by my side, and longs to glitter in my hand. Speak no more of Comhal, son of the winding Clutha!'

"The strength of his pride arose. We fought, he fell beneath my sword. The banks of Clutha heard his fall, a thousand spears glittered around. I fought, the strangers prevailed. I plunged into the stream of Clutha. My white sails rose over the waves, and I bounded on the dark-blue sea. Moina came to the shore, and rolled the red eye of her tears. Her loose hair flew on the wind, and I heard her mournful, distant cries. Often did I turn my ship, but the winds of the East prevailed. Nor Clutha ever since have I seen, nor Moina of the dark-brown hair. She fell in Balclutha, for I have seen her ghost. I knew her as she came through the dusky night, along the murmur of Lora: she was like the new moon, seen through the gathered mist when the sky pours down its flaky snow, and the world is silent and dark."

"Raise, ye bards," said the mighty Fingal, "the praise of unhappy Moina. Call her ghost, with your songs, to our hills, that she may rest with the fair of Morven, the sunbeams of other days, the delight of heroes of old. I have seen the walls of Balclutha, but they were desolate. The fire had resounded in the halls, and the voice of the people is heard no more. The stream of Clutha was removed from its place, by the fall of the walls. The thistle shook there its lonely head; the moss whistled to the wind. The fox looked out from the windows, the rank grass of the wall waved round its head. Desolate is the dwelling of Moina, silence is in the house of her fathers. Raise the song of mourning, O bards! over the land of strangers. They have but fallen before us: for one day we must fall. Why dost thou build the hall, son of the winged days? Thou lookest from thy towers to-day; yet a few years, and the blast of the desert comes; it howls in thy empty court, and whistles round thy half-worn shield. And let the blast of the desert come! we shall be renowned in our day! The mark of my arm shall be in battle; my name in the song of bards. Raise the song, send round the shell: let joy be heard in my hall. When thou, sun of heaven, shalt fail! if thou shalt fail, thou mighty light! if thy brightness is for a season, like Fingal, our fame shall survive thy beams!"

Such was the song of Fingal, in the day of his joy. His thousand bards leaned forward from their seats, to hear the voice of the king. It was like the music of harps on the gale of the spring. Lovely were thy thoughts, O Fingal! why had not Ossian the strength of thy soul? But thou standest alone, my father! who can equal the king of Selma?

The night passed away in song, morning returned in joy. The mountains shewed their gray heads; the blue face of ocean smiled. The white wave is seen tumbling round the distant rock, a mist rose, slowly, from the lake. It came in the figure of an aged man along the silent plain. Its large limbs did not move in steps; for a ghost supported it in mid-air. It came towards Selma's hall, and dissolved in a shower of blood.

The king alone beheld the sight; he foresaw the death of the people. He came in silence to his hall; and took his father's spear. The mail rattled on his breast. The heroes rose around. They looked in silence on each other, marking the eyes of Fingal. They saw battle in his face: the death of armies on his spear. A thousand shields at once are placed on their arms, they drew a thousand swords. The hall of Selma brightened around. The clang of arms ascends. The gray dogs howl in their place. No word is among the mighty chiefs. Each marked the eyes of the king, and half-assumed his spear.

"Sons of Morven," begun the king, "this is no time to fill the shell. The battle darkens near us; death hovers over the land. Some ghost, the friend of Fingal, has forewarned us of the foe. The sons of the stranger come from the darkly-rolling sea. For, from the water, came the sign of Morven's gloomy danger. Let each assume his heavy spear, each gird on his father's sword. Let the dark helmet rise on every head, the mail pour its lightning from every side. The battle gathers like a storm; soon shall ye hear the roar of death."

The hero moved on before his host, like a cloud before a ridge of green fire, when it pours on the sky of night, and mariners foresee a storm. On Cona's rising heath they stood the white-bosomed maids beheld them above like a grove, they foresaw the death of the youth, and looked towards the sea with fear. The white wave deceived them for distant sails, the tear is on their cheek! The sun rose on the sea, and we beheld a distant fleet. Like the mist of ocean they came, and poured their youth upon the coast. The chief was among them, like the stag in the midst of the herd. His shield is studded with gold, stately strode the king of spears. He moved toward Selma, his thousands moved behind.

"Go, with a song of peace," said Fingal. "go, Ulin, to the king of swords. Tell him that we are mighty in war, that the ghosts of our foes are many. But renowned are they who have feasted in my halls; they show the arms of my fathers in a foreign land, the sons of the strangers wonder, and bless the friends of Morven's race: for our names have been heard afar. The kings of the world shook in the midst of their host."

Ulin went with his song. Fingal rested on his spear. He saw the mighty foe in his armor: he blest the stranger's son. "How stately art thou, son of the sea!" said the king of woody Morven. "Thy sword is a beam of fire by thy side, thy spear is a pine that defies the storm. The varied face of the moon is not broader than thy shield. Ruddy is thy face of youth! soft the ringlets of thy hair! But this tree may fall, and his memory be forgot! The daughter of the stranger will be sad, looking to the rolling sea: the children will say, 'We see a ship, perhaps it is the king of Balclutha.' The tear starts from their mother's eye. Her thoughts are of him who sleeps in Morven!"

Such were the words of the king, when Ulin came to the mighty Carthon, he threw down the spear before him, he raised the song of peace. "Come to the feast of Fingal, Carthon, from the rolling sea! partake of the feast of the king, or lift the spear of war! The ghosts of our foes are many, but renowned are the friends of Morven! Behold that field, O Carthon! many a green hill rises there, with mossy stones and rustling grass: these are the tombs of Fingal's foes, the sons of the rolling sea!"

"Dost thou speak to the weak in arms!" said Carthon, "bard of the woody Morven? Is my face pale for fear, son of the peaceful song? Whv, then, dost thou think to darken my soul with the tales of those who fell? My arm has fought in battle, my renown is known afar. Go to the feeble in arms, bid them yield to Fingal. Have not I seen the fallen Balclutha? And shall I feast with Comhal's son? Comhal, who threw his fire in the midst of my father's hall? I was young, and knew not the cause, why the virgins wept. The columns of smoke pleased mine eye, when they rose above my walls! I often looked back with gladness when my friends fled along the hill. But when the years of my youth came on, I beheld the moss of my fallen walls. My sigh arose with the morning, and my tears descended with night. 'Shall I not fight,' I said to my soul, 'against the children of my foes?' And I will fight, O bard! I feel the strength of my soul."

His people gathered round the hero, and drew at once their shining swords. He stands in the midst, like a pillar of fire, the tear half-starting from his eye; for he thought of the fallen Balclutha. The crowded pride of his soul arose. Sidelong he looked up to the hill, where our heroes shone in arms, the spear trembled in his hand. Bending forward, he seemed to threaten the king.

"Shall I," said Fingal to his soul, "meet, at once, the youth? Shall I stop him, in the midst of his course, before his fame shall arise? But the bard, hereafter, may say, when he sees the tomb of Carthon, Fingal took his thousands to battle, before the noble Carthon fell. No bard of the times to come! thou shalt not lessen Fingal's fame. My heroes will fight the youth, and Fingal behold the war. If he overcomes, I rush, in my strength, like the roaring stream of Cona. Who, of my chiefs will meet the son of the rolling sea? Many are his warriors on the coast, and strong is his ashen spear!"

Cathul rose, in his strength, the son of the mighty Lormar: three hundred youths attend the chief, the race of his native streams. Feeble was his arm against Carthon: he fell, and his heroes fled. Connal resumed the battle, but he broke his heavy spear: he lay bound on the field: Carthon pursued his people.

"Clessámmor!" said the king of Morven, "where is the spear of thy strength? Wilt thou behold Connal bound; thy friend, at the stream of Lora? Rise, in the light of thy steel, companion of valiant Comhal! Let the youth of Balclutha feel the strength of Morven's race!" He rose in the strength of his steel, shaking his grizzled locks. He fitted the steel to his side; he rushed, in the pride of valor.

Carthon stood on a rock; he saw the hero rushing on. He loved the dreadful joy of his face: his strength, in the locks of age! "Shall I lift that spear," he said, "that never strikes, but once, a foe? Or shall I, with the words of peace, preserve the warrior's life? Stately are his steps of age! lovely the remnant of his years! Perhaps it is the husband of Moira; the father of ear-borne Carthon. Often have I heard that he dwelt at the echoing stream of Lora."

Such were his words, when Clessámmor came, and lifted high his spear. The youth received it on his shield, and spoke the words of peace. "Warrior of the aged locks! Is there no youth to lift the spear? Hast thou no son to raise the shield before his father to meet the arm of youth? Is the spouse of thy love no more? or weeps she over the tombs of thy sons? Art thou of the kings of men? What will be the fame of my sword should'st thou fall?"

"It will be great, thou son of pride!" begun the tall Clessámmor. "I have been renowned in battle; but I never told my name to a foe.¹ Yield to me, son of the wave, then shalt thou know, that the mark of my sword is in many a field." "I never yielded, king of spears!" replied the noble pride of Carthon: "I have also fought in war, I behold my future fame. Despise me not, thou chief of men! my arm, my spear is strong. Retire among thy friends; let younger heroes fight." "Why dost thou wound my soul?" replied Clessámmor, with a tear. "Age does not tremble on my hand; I still can lift the sword. Shall I fly in Fingal's sight: in the sight of him I love? Son of the sea! I never fled: exalt thy pointed spear!"

They fought like two contending winds,

¹ "To tell one's name to an enemy was reckoned, in those days of heroism, a manifest evasion of fighting him: for if it was once known that friendship subsisted of old between the ancestors of the combatants, the battle immediately ceased, and the ancient amity of their forefathers was renewed. 'A man who tells his name to his enemy,' was of old an ignominious term for a coward."—Macpherson that strive to roll the wave. Carthon bade his spear to err; he still thought that the foe was the spouse of Moína. He broke Clessámmor's beamy spear in twain: he seized his shining sword. But as Carthon was binding the chief, the chief drew the dagger of his fathers. He saw the foe's uncovered side, and opened there a wound.

Fingal saw Clessámmor low: he moved in the sound of his steel. The host stood silent in his presence, they turned their eyes to the king. He came like the sullen noise of a storm before the winds arise: the hunter hears it in the vale, and retires to the cave of the rock. Carthon stood in his place: the blood is rushing down his side: he saw the coming down of the king, his hopes of fame arose; but pale was his cheek: his hair flew loose, his helmet shook on high: the force of Carthon failed; but his soul was strong.

Fingal beheld the hero's blood; he stopt the uplifted spear. "Yield, king of swords!" said Comhal's son. "I behold thy blood. Thou hast been mighty in battle, and thy fame shall never fade." "Art thou the king so far renowned?" replied the car-borne Carthon. "Art thou that light of death, that frightens the kings of the world? But why should Carthon ask? for he is like the stream of his hills, strong as a river in his course, swift as the eagle of heaven. O that I had fought with the king, that my fame might be great in song! that the hunter, beholding my tomb, might say he fought with the mighty Fingal. But Carthon dies unknown; he has poured out his force on the weak."

"But thou shalt not die unknown," replied the king of woody Morven: "my bards are many, O Carthon! Their songs descend to future times. The children of years to come shall hear the fame of Carthon, when they sit round the burning oak, and the night is spent in songs of old. The hunter, sitting in the heath, shall hear the rustling blast, and, raising his eyes, behold the rock where Carthon fell. He shall turn to his son, and shew the place where the mighty fought; 'There the king of Balclutha fought, like the strength of a thousand streams.'"

Joy rose in Carthon's face: he lifted his heavy eyes. He gave his sword to Fingal, to be within his hall, that the memory of Balclutha's king might remain in Morven. The battle ceased along the field, the bard had sung the song of peace. The chiefs gathered round the falling Carthon; they heard his words with sighs. Silent they leaned on their spears, while Balclutha's hero spoke. His hair sighed in the wind, and his voice was sad and low.

"King of Morven," Carthon said, "I fall in the midst of my course. A foreign tomb receives, in youth, the last of Reuthámir's race. Darkness dwells in Balclutha: the shadows of grief in Crathmo. But raise my remembrance on the banks of Lora, where my fathers dwelt. Perhaps the husband of Moína will mourn over his fallen Carthon." His words reached the heart of Clessámmor: he fell in silence on his son. The host stood darkened around: no voice is on the plain. Night came: the moon, from the east, looked on the mournful field, but still they stood, like a silent grove that lifts its head on Gormal, when the loud winds are laid, and dark autumn is on the plain.

Three days they mourned above Carthon; on the fourth his father died. In the narrow plain of the rock they lie; a dim ghost defends their tomb. There lovely Moína is often seen, when the sun-beam darts on the rock, and all around is dark. There she is seen, Malvina! but not like the daughters of the hill. Her robes are from the stranger's land, and she is still alone!

Fingal was sad for Carthon; he commanded his bards to mark the day when shadowy autumn returned. And often did they mark the day, and sing the hero's praise. "Who comes so dark from ocean's roar, like autumn's shadowy cloud? Death is trembling in his hand! his eyes are flames of fire! Who roars along dark Lora's heath? Who but Carthon, king of swords! The people fall! see how he strides, like the sullen ghost of Morven! But there he lies, a goodly oak which sudden blasts overturned! When shalt thou rise, Balclutha's joy? When, Carthon, shalt thou arise? Who comes so dark from ocean's roar, like autumn's shadowy cloud?" Such were the words of the bards, in the day of their mourning: Ossian often joined their voice, and added to their song. My soul has been mournful for Carthon; he fell in the days of his youth: and thou, O Clessámmor! where is thy dwelling in the wind? Has the youth forgot his wound? Flies he, on clouds, with thee? I feel the sun, O Malvina! leave me to my rest. Perhaps they may come to my dreams; I think I hear a feeble voice! The beam of heaven delights to shine on the grave of Carthon I feel it warm around!

O thou that rollest above, round as the shield of my father! Whence are thy beams, O sun! thy everlasting light? Thou comest forth, in thy awful beauty, the stars hide themselves in the sky; the moon, cold and pale, sinks in the western wave; but thou thyself movest alone Who can be a companion of thy course? The oaks of the mountains fall the mountains themselves decay with years; the ocean shrinks and grows again the moon herself is lost in heaven, but thou art for ever the same, rejoicing in the brightness of thy course When the world is dark with tempests, when thunder rolls and lightning flies, thou lookest in thy beauty from the clouds, and laughest at the storm But to Ossian, thou lookest in vain, for he beholds thy beams no more, whether thy yellow hair flows on the eastern clouds, or thou tremblest at the gates of the west But thou art, perhaps, like me, for a season, thy years will have an end Thou shalt sleep in thy clouds, careless of the voice of the morning Exult then, O sun, in the strength of thy youth! Age is dark and unlovely, it is like the glimmering light of the moon, when it shines through broken clouds, and the mist is on the hills, the blast of the north is on the plain, the traveller shrinks in the midst of his journey

OINA MORUL A POEM
1760

As flies the unconstant sun, over Larmion's grassy hill, so pass the tales of old along my soul by night! When bards are removed to their place, when harps are hung in Selma's hall, then comes a voice to Ossian, and awakes his soul! It is the voice of years that are gone! they roll before me with all their deeds! I seize the tales as they pass, and pour them forth in song Nor a troubled stream is the song of the king, it is like the rising of music from Lutha of the strings. Lutha of many strings, not silent are thy streamy rocks, when the white hands of Malvina move upon the harp! Light of the shadowy thoughts, that fly across my soul, daughter of Toscar of helmets, wilt thou not hear the song? We call back, maid of Lutha, the years that have rolled away!

It was in the days of the king, while yet my locks were young, that I marked Con-cathlin on high, from ocean's nightly wave. My course was towards the isle of Fuarfed, woody dweller of seas! Fingal had sent me to the aid of Mal-orchol, king of Fuarfed wild: for war was around him, and our fathers had met at the feast.

In Col-coiled, I bound my sails, I sent my sword to Mal-orchol of shells.¹ He knew the signal of Albion, and his joy arose. He came from his own high hall, and seized my hand in grief. "Why comes the race of heroes to a falling king? Ton-thormod of many spears is the chief of wavy Sar-dronlo He saw, and loved my daughter, white-bosomed Oina-morul He sought, I denied the maid, for our fathers had been foes. He came with battle to Fuarfed, my people are rolled away. Why comes the race of heroes to a falling king?"

"I come not," I said, "to look, like a boy, on the strife Fingal remembers Mal-orchol, and his hall for strangers From his waves, the warrior descended on thy woody isle Thou wert no cloud before him Thy feast was spread with songs For this my sword shall rise, and thy foes perhaps may fall Our friends are not forgot in their danger, though distant is our land."

"Descendant of the daring Trenmor, thy words are like the voice of Cruth-loda, when he speaks from his parting cloud, strong dweller of the sky! Many have rejoiced at my feast, but they all have forgot Mal-orchol. I have looked towards all the winds; but no white sails were seen. But steel resounds in my hall; and not the joyful shells Come to my dwelling, race of heroes! dark-skirted night is near Hear the voice of songs, from the maid of Fuarfed wild."

We went. On the harp arose the white hands of Oina-morul. She waked her own sad tale, from every trembling string. I stood in silence; for bright in her locks was the daughter of many isles! Her eyes were two stars, looking forward through a rushing shower The mariner marks them on high, and blesses the lovely beams. With morning we rushed to battle, to Tormul's resounding stream the foe moved to the sound of Ton-thormod's bossy shield From wing to wing the strife was mixed. I met Ton-thormod in fight. Wide flew his broken steel I seized the king in war. I gave his hand, bound fast with thongs, to Mal-orchol, the giver of shells Joy rose at the feast of Fuarfed, for the foe had failed. Ton-thormod turned his face away, from Oina-morul of isles!

"Son of Fingal," begun Mal-orchol, "not forgot shalt thou pass from me A light shall dwell in thy ship, Oina-morul of slow-rolling eyes. She shall kindle gladness along thy mighty soul Nor unheeded shall the maid move in Selma, through the dwellings of kings!"

In the hall I lay in night Mine eyes were half-closed in sleep Soft music came to mine ear it was like the rising breeze, that whirls, at first, the thistle's beard, then flies, dark-shadowy, over the grass It was the maid of Fuarfed wild! she raised the nightly song, she knew that my soul was a stream, that flowed at pleasant sounds "Who looks," she said, "from his rock on ocean's closing mist? His long locks, like the raven's wing, are wandering on the blast Stately are his steps in grief! The tears are in his eyes! His manly breast is heaving over his bursting soul! Retire, I am distant far, a wanderer in lands unknown Though the race of kings are around me, yet my soul is dark Why have our fathers been foes, Ton-thormod, love of maids!"

"Soft voice of the streamy isle," I said, "why dost thou mourn by night? The race of daring Trenmor are not the dark in soul Thou shalt not wander by streams unknown, blue-eyed Oina-morul! Within this bosom is a voice, it comes not to other ears. It bids Ossian hear the hapless, in their hour of woe Retire, soft singer by night! Ton-thormod shall not mourn on his rock!"

With morning I loosed the king. I gave the long-haired maid Mal-orchol heard my words in the midst of his echoing halls. "King of Fuarfed wild, why should Ton-thormod mourn? He is of the race of heroes, and a flame in war. Your fathers have been foes, but now their dim ghosts rejoice in death. They stretch their hands of mist to the same shell in Loda Forget their rage, ye warriors! It was the cloud of other years."

Such were the deeds of Ossian, while yet his locks were young, though loveliness, with a robe of beams, clothed the daughter of many isles. We call back, maid of Lutha, the years that have rolled away!

From FINGAL: AN ANCIENT EPIC POEM
1762

Cuthullin sat by Tura's wall, by the tree of the rustling sound His spear leaned against the rock His shield lay on the grass by his side. Amid his thoughts of mighty Cairbar, a hero slain by the chief in war, the scout of ocean comes, Moran the son of Fithil!

"Arise," says the youth, "Cuthullin, arise. I see the ships of the north! Manv, chief of men, are the foe Manv the heroes of the sea-borne Swaran!" "Moian!" replied the blue-eyed chief, "thou ever tremblest, son of Fithil! Thy fears have increased the foe. It is Fingal, king of deserts, with aid to green Erin of streams" "I beheld their chief," says Moran, "tall as a glittering rock His spear is a blasted pine His shield the rising moon! He sat on the shore, like a cloud of mist on the silent hill! Many, chief of heroes! I said, many are our hands of war. Well art thou named, the mighty man, but many mighty men are seen from Tura's windy walls!"

"He spoke, like a wave on a rock. 'Who in this land appears like me? Heroes stand not in my presence: they fall to earth from my hand. Who can meet Swaran in fight? Who but Fingal, king of Selma of storms? Once we wrestled on Malmor, our heels overturned the woods. Rocks fell from their place; rivulets, changing their course, fled murmuring from our side Three days we renewed the strife; heroes stood at a distance and trembled. On the fourth, Fingal says that the king of the ocean fell! but Swaran says he stood! Let dark Cuthullin yield to him, that is strong as the storms of his land!'"

"No!" replied the blue-eyed chief, "I never yield to mortal man! Dark Cuthullin shall be great or dead! Go, son of Fithil, take my spear. Strike the sounding shield of Semo It hangs at Tura's rustling gate. The sound of peace is not its voice! My heroes shall hear and obey" He went He struck the bossy shield. The hills, the rocks reply. The sound spreads along the wood: deer start by the lake of roes. Curach leaps from the sounding rock; and Connal of the bloody spear! Crugal's breast of snow beats high. The son of Favi leaves the dark-brown hind. It is the shield of war, said Ronnar! the spear of Cuthullin, said Lugar! Son of the sea, put on thy arms! Calmar, lift thy sounding steel! Puno! dreadful hero, arise! Cairbar, from thy red tree of Cromla! Bend thy knee, O Eth! descend from the streams of Lena. Ca-olt, stretch thy side as thou movest along the whistling heath of Mora: thy side that is white as the foam of the troubled sea, when the dark winds pour it on rocky Cuthon

Now I behold the chiefs, in the pride of their former deeds! Their souls are kindled at the battles of old, at the actions of other times. Their eyes are flames of fire. They roll in search of the foes of the land. Their mighty hands are on their swords. Lightning pours from their sides of steel. They come like streams from the mountains; each rushes roaring from the hill. Bright are the chiefs of battle, in the armor of their fathers. Gloomy and dark their heroes follow, like the gathering of the rainy clouds behind the red meteors of heaven. The sounds of crashing arms ascend. The gray dogs howl between. Unequal bursts the song of battle. Rocking Cromla echoes round. On Lena's dusky heath they stand, like mist that shades the hills of autumn: when broken and dark it settles high, and lifts its head to heaven!

"Hail," said Cuthullin, "sons of the narrow vales! hail, hunters of the deer! Another sport is drawing near. It is like the dark rolling of that wave on the coast! Or shall we fight, ye sons of war! or yield green Erin to Lochlin? O Connal! speak, thou first of men! thou breaker of the shields! thou hast often fought with Lochlin: wilt thou lift thy father's spear?"

"Cuthullin!" calm the chief replied, "the spear of Connal is keen. It delights to shine in battle, to mix with the blood of thousands. But though my hand is bent on fight, my heart is for the peace of Erin. Behold, thou first in Cormac's war, the sable fleet of Swaran. His masts are many on our coast, like reeds in the lake of Lego. His ships are forests clothed with mists, when the trees yield by turns to the squally wind. Many are his chiefs in battle. Connal is for peace! Fingal would shun his arm, the first of mortal men! Fingal, who scatters the mighty, as stormy winds the heath, when streams roar through echoing Cona and night settles with all her clouds on the hill!"

"Fly, thou man of peace," said Calmar, "fly," said the son of Matha, "go, Connal, to thy silent hills, where the spear never brightens in war! Pursue the dark-brown deer of Cromla: stop with thine arrows the bounding roes of Lena. But, blue-eyed son of Semo, Cuthullin, ruler of the field, scatter thou the sons of Lochlin! roar through the ranks of their pride. Let no vessel of the kingdom of snow bound on the dark-rolling waves of Inis-tore. Rise, ye dark winds of Erin, rise! roar, whirlwinds of Lara of hinds! Amid the tempest let me die, torn, in a cloud, by angry ghosts of men, amid the tempest let Calmar die, if ever chase was sport to him, so much as the battle of shields!"

"Calmar!" Connal slow replied, "I never fled, young son of Matha! I was swift with my friends in fight, but small is the fame of Connal! The battle was won in my presence, the valiant overcame! But, son of Semo, hear my voice, regard the ancient throne of Cormac. Give wealth and half the land for peace, till Fingal shall arrive on our coast. Or, if war be thy choice, I lift the sword and spear. My joy shall be in the midst of thousands, my soul shall lighten through the gloom of the fight!"

"To me," Cuthullin replies, "pleasant is the noise of arms! pleasant as the thunder of heaven, before the shower of spring! But gather all the shining tribes, that I may view the sons of war! Let them pass along the heath, bright as the sunshine before a storm, when the west wind collects the clouds, and Morven echoes over all her oaks! But where are my friends in battle? the supporters of my arm in danger? Where art thou, white-bosomed Cathba? Where is that cloud in war, Duchomar? Hast thou left me, O Fergus! in the day of the storm? Fergus, first in our joy at the feast! son of Rossa! arm of death! comest thou like a roe from Malmor? like a hart from thy echoing hills? Hail, thou son of Rossa! what shades the soul of war?"

"Four stones," replied the chief, "rise on the grave of Cathba. These hands have laid in earth Duchomar, that cloud in war! Cathba, son of Torman! thou wert a sunbeam in Erin And thou, O vahant Duchômar! a mist of the marshy Lano, when it moves on the plains of autumn, bearing the death of thousands along Morna! fairest of maids! calm is thy sleep in the cave of the rock! Thou hast fallen in darkness, like a star that shoots across the desert, when the traveller is alone, and mourns the transient beam!"

"Say," said Semo's blue-eyed son, "say how fell the chiefs of Erin Fell they by the sons of Lochlin, striving in the battle of heroes? Or what confines the strong in arms to the dark and narrow house?"

"Câthba," replied the hero, "fell by the sword of Duchômar at the oak of the noisy streams Duchômar came to Tura's cave, he spoke to the lovely Morna 'Morna, fairest among women, lovely daughter of strong-armed Cormac! Why in the circle of stones? in the cave of the rock alone? The stream murmurs along The old tree groans in the wind The lake is troubled before thee, dark are the clouds of the sky! But thou art snow on the heath, thy hair is the mist of Cromla, when it curls on the hill, when it shines to the beam of the west! Thy breasts are two smooth rocks seen from Branno of streams Thy arms, like two white pillars in the halls of the great Fingal.'

"From whence," the fair-haired maid replied, "from whence, Duchômar, most gloomy of men? Dark are thy brows and terrible! Red are thy rolling eyes! Does Swaran appear on the sea? What of the foe, Duchômar?"—"From the hill I return, O Morna, from the hill of the dark-brown hinds Three have I slain with my bended yew Three with my long-bounding dogs of the chase Lovely daughter of Cormac, I love thee as my soul! I have slain one stately deer for thee High was his branchy head, and fleet his feet of wind"—"Duchômar!" calm the maid replied, "I love thee not, thou gloomy man! hard is thy heart of rock; dark is thy terrible brow But Câthba, young son of Torman, thou art the love of Morna Thou art a sunbeam, in the day of the gloomy storm Sawest thou the son of Torman, lovely on the hill of his hinds? Here the daughter of Cormac waits the coming of Câthba!"

"Long shall Morna wait," Duchômar said, "long shall Morna wait for Câthba! Behold this sword unsheathed! Here wanders the blood of Câthba. Long shall Morna wait He fell by the stream of Branno! On Cromla I will raise his tomb, daughter of blue-shielded Cormac! Turn on Duchômar thine eyes, his arm is strong as a storm"—"Is the son of Torman fallen?" said the wildly-bursting voice of the maid. "Is he fallen on his echoing hills, the youth with the breast of snow? the first in the chase of hinds? the foe of the strangers of ocean? Thou art dark to me, Duchômar, cruel is thine arm to Morna! Give me that sword, my foe! I love the wandering blood of Câthba!"

"He gave the sword to her tears. She pierced his manly breast! He fell, like the bank of a mountain-stream, and stretching forth his hand, he spoke 'Daughter of blue-shielded Cormac! Thou hast slain me in youth! The sword is cold in my breast! Morna, I feel it cold Give me to Morna the maid Duchômar was the dream of her night! She will raise my tomb, the hunter shall raise my fame But draw the sword from my breast Morna, the steel is cold!' She came, in all her tears, she came, she drew the sword from his breast He pierced her white side! He spread her fair locks on the ground! Her bursting blood sounds from her side Her white arm is stained with red Rolling in death she lay The cave re-echoed to her sighs"

"Peace," said Cuthullin, "to the souls of the heroes! their deeds were great in fight Let them ride around me on clouds Let them shew their features of war My soul shall then be firm in danger, mine arm like the thunder of heaven! But be thou on a moonbeam, O Morna! near the window of my rest, when my thoughts are of peace; when the din of arms is past Gather the strength of the tribes! Move to the wars of Erin! Attend the car of my battles! Rejoice in the noise of my course! Place three spears by my side. follow the bounding of my steeds! that my soul may be strong in my friends, when battle darkens round the beams of my steel!"

As rushes a stream of foam from the dark shady deep of Cromla, when the thunder is travelling above, and dark-brown night sits on half the hill, through the breaches of the tempest look forth the dim faces of ghosts So fierce, so vast, so terrible, rushed on the sons of Ern. The chief, like a whale of ocean, whom all his billows pursue, poured valor forth as a stream, rolling his might along the shore. The sons of Lochlin heard the noise, as the sound of a winter-storm. Swaran struck his bossy shield: he called the son of Arno, "What murmur rolls along the hill, like the gathering flies of the eve? The sons of Ern descend, or rustling winds roar in the distant wood! Such is the noise of Gormal, before the white tops of my waves arise. O son of Arno! ascend the hill; view the dark face of the heath!"

He went. He, trembling, swift returned. His eyes rolled wildly round. His heart beat high against his side. His words were faltering, broken, slow. "Arise, son of ocean, arise, chief of the dark-brown shields! I see the dark, the mountain-stream of battle! the deep-moving strength of the sons of Ern! The car of war comes on, like the flame of death! the rapid car of Cuthullin, the noble son of Semo! It bends behind like a wave near a rock, like the sun-streaked mist of the heath. Its sides are embossed with stones, and sparkle like the sea round the boat of night. Of polished yew is its beam, its seat of the smoothest bone. The sides are replenished with spears, the bottom is the footstool of heroes! Before the right side of the car is seen the snorting horse! the high-maned, broad-breasted, proud, wide-leaping, strong steed of the hill. Loud and resounding is his hoof, the spreading of his mane above is like a stream of smoke on a ridge of rocks. Bright are the sides of the steed! his name is Sulin-Sifadda.

"Before the left side of the car is seen the snorting horse! The thin-maned, high-headed, strong-hoofed, fleet, bounding son of the hill his name is Dusronnal, among the stormy sons of the sword! A thousand thongs bind the car on high. Hard polished bits shine in a wreath of foam. Thin thongs, bright studded with gems, bend on the stately necks of the steeds. The steeds that, like wreaths of mist, fly over the streamy vale! The wildness of deer is in their course, the strength of eagles descending on the prey. Their noise is like the blast of winter, on the sides of the snow-headed Gormal.

"Within the car is seen the chief; the strong-armed son of the sword. The hero's name is Cuthullin, son of Semo, king of shells.¹ His red cheek is like my polished yew. The look of his blue-rolling eye is wide, beneath the dark arch of his brow. His hair flies from his head like a flame, as bending forward he wields the spear. Fly, king of ocean, fly! He comes like a storm along the streamy vale!"

"When did I fly?" replied the king. "When fled Swaran from the battle of spears? When did I shrink from danger, chief of the little soul? I met the storm of Gormal, when the foam of my waves beat high. I met the storm of the clouds, shall Swaran fly from a hero? Were Fingal himself before me, my soul should not darken with fear. Arise to battle, my thousands! pour round me like the echoing main. Gather round the bright steel of your king; strong as the rocks of my land, that meet the storm with joy, and stretch their dark pines to the wind!"

Like autumn's dark storms pouring from two echoing hills, towards each other approached the heroes. Like two deep streams from high rocks meeting, mixing, roaring on the plain; loud, rough, and dark in battle meet Lochlin and Inis-fail. Chief mixes his strokes with chief, and man with man; steel, clanging, sounds on steel. Helmets are cleft on high. Blood bursts and smokes around. Strings murmur on the polished yews. Darts rush along the sky. Spears fall like the circles of light, which gild the face of night. As the noise of the troubled ocean, when roll the waves on high, as the last peal of thunder in heaven, such is the din of war! Though Cormac's hundred bards were there to give the fight to song; feeble was the voice of a hundred bards to send the deaths to future times! For many were the deaths of heroes; wide poured the blood of the brave!

Mourn, ye sons of song, mourn the death of the noble Sithálin. Let the sighs of Fiōna rise, on the lone plains of her lovely Ardan. They fell, like two hinds of the desert, by the hands of the mighty Swaran; when, in the midst of thousands, he roared, like the shrill spirit of a storm. He sits dim on the clouds of the north, and enjoys the death of the mariner. Nor slept thy hand by thy side, chief of the isle of mist! many were the deaths of thine arm, Cuthullin, thou son of Semo! His sword was like the beam of heaven when it pierces the sons of the vale; when the people are blasted and fall, and all the hills are burning around. Dusronnal snorted over the bodies of heroes. Sifadda bathed his hoof in blood. The battle lay behind them, as groves overturned on the desert of Cromla; when the blast has passed the heath, laden with the spirits of night!

Weep on the rocks of roaring winds, O maid of Inistore! Bend thy fair head over the waves, thou lovelier than the ghost of the hills, when it moves in a sunbeam, at noon, over the silence of Morven! He is fallen! thy youth is low! pale beneath the sword of Cuthullin! No more shall valor raise thy love to match the blood of kings. Trenar, graceful Trenar died, O maid of Inistore! His gray dogs are howling at home! they see his passing ghost. His bow is in the hall unstrung. No sound is in the hall of his hinds!

As roll a thousand waves to the rocks, so Swaran's host came on. As meet a rock a thousand waves, so Erin met Swaran of spears. Death raises all his voices around, and mixes with the sounds of shields. Each hero is a pillar of darkness: the sword a beam of fire in his hand. The field echoes from wing to wing, as a hundred hammers that rise, by turns, on the red son of the furnace. Who are these on Lena's heath, these so gloomy and dark? Who are these like two clouds, and their swords like lightning above them? The little hills are troubled around, the rocks tremble with all their moss. Who is it but Ocean's son and the car-borne chief of Erin? Many are the anxious eyes of their friends, as they see them dim on the heath. But night conceals the chiefs in clouds, and ends the dreadful fight!

It was on Cromla's shaggy side that Dorglas had placed the deer; the early fortune of the chase, before the heroes left the hill. A hundred youths collect the heath; ten warriors wake the fire, three hundred choose the polished stones. The feast is smoking wide! Cuthullin, chief of Erin's war, resumed his mighty soul. He stood upon his beamy spear, and spoke to the son of songs, to Carril of other times, the gray-haired son of Kinfena. "Is this feast spread for me alone and the king of Lochlin on Erin's shore, far from the deer of his hills, and sounding halls of his feasts? Rise, Carril of other times; carry my words to Swaran. Tell him from the roaring of waters, that Cuthullin gives his feast. Here let him listen to the sound of my groves, amidst the clouds of night, for cold and bleak the blustering winds rush over the foam of his seas. Here let him praise the trembling harp, and hear the songs of heroes!"

Old Carril went, with softest voice. He called the king of dark-brown shields! "Rise from the skins of thy chase, rise, Swaran, king of groves! Cuthullin gives the joy of shells. Partake the feast of Erin's blue-eyed chief!" He answered like the sullen sound of Cromla before a storm. "Though all thy daughters, Inis-fail! should stretch their arms of snow; should raise the heavings of their breasts, and softly roll their eyes of love, yet, fixed as Lochlin's thousand rocks, here Swaran should remain, till morn, with the young beams of the east, shall light me to the death of Cuthullin. Pleasant to my ear is Lochlin's wind! It rushes over my seas! It speaks aloft in all my shrouds, and brings my green forests to my mind the green forests of Gormal, which often echoed to my winds, when my spear was red in the chase of the boar. Let dark Cuthullin yield to me the ancient throne of Cormac, or Erin's torrents shall show from their hills the red foam of the blood of his pride!"

"Sad is the sound of Swaran's voice," said Carril of other times! "Sad to himself alone," said the blue-eyed son of Semo. "But, Carril, raise the voice on high, tell the deeds of other times. Send thou the night away in song, and give the joy of grief. For many heroes and maids of love, have moved on Inis-fail, and lovely are the songs of woe that are heard in Albion's rocks, when the noise of the chase is past, and the streams of Coma answer to the voice of Ossian."

"In other days," Carril replied, "came the sons of Ocean to Erin, a thousand vessels bounded on waves to Ullin's lovely plains. The sons of Inis-fail arose to meet the race of dark-brown shields. Cairbar, first of men, was there, and Grudar, stately youth! Long had they strove for the spotted bull, that lowed on Golbun's echoing heath. Each claimed him as his own. Death was often at the point of their steel! Side by side the heroes fought; the strangers of Ocean fled. Whose name was fairer on the hill, than the name of Cairbar and Grudar! But ah! why ever lowed the bull, on Golbun's echoing heath. They saw him leaping like snow. The wrath of the chiefs returned!

"On Lubar's grassy banks they fought; Grudar fell in his blood Fierce Cairbar came to the vale, where Brassolis, fairest of his sisters, all alone, raised the song of grief She sung of the actions of Grudar, the youth of her secret soul! She mourned him in the field of blood, but still she hoped for his return Her white bosom is seen from her robe, as the moon from the clouds of night, when its edge heaves white on the view, from the darkness which covers its orb Her voice was softer than the harp to raise the song of grief Her soul was fixed on Grudar The secret look of her eye was his 'When shalt thou come in thine arms, thou mighty in the war?'

"Take, Brassolis,' Cairbar came and said, 'take, Brassolis, this shield of blood Fix it on high within my hall, the armor of my foe!' Her soft heart beat against her side Distracted, pale, she flew She found her youth in all his blood, she died on Cromla's heath Here rests their dust, 'Cuthullin! these lonely vews sprung from their tombs, and shade them from the storm Fair was Brassolis on the plain! Stately was Grudar on the hill! The bard shall preserve their names, and send them down to future times!'

"Pleasant is thy voice, O Carril," said the blue-eyed chief of Erin "Pleasant are the words of other times! They are like the calm shower of spring, when the sun looks on the field, and the light cloud flies over the hills O strike the harp in praise of my love, the lonely sunbeam of Dunseath! Strike the harp in the praise of Briagela, she that I left in the isle of mist, the spouse of Semo's son! Dost thou raise thy fair face from the rock to find the sails of Cuthullin? The sea is rolling distant far, its white foam deceives thee for my sails Retire, for it is night, my love, the dark winds sing in thy hair Retire to the halls of my feasts, think of the times that are past I will not return till the storm of war is ceased O Connal! speak of war and arms, and send her from my mind Lovely with her flowing hair is the white-bosomed daughter of Sorgan!"

Connal, slow to speak, replied, "Guard against the race of Ocean. Send thy troop of night abroad, and watch the strength of Swaran Cuthullin! I am for peace till the race of Selma come, till Fingal come, the first of men, and beam, like the sun, on our fields!" The hero struck the shield of alarms, the warriors of the night moved on! The rest lay in the heath of the deer, and slept beneath the dusky wind The ghosts of the lately dead were near,¹ and swam on the gloomy clouds. And far distant, in the dark silence of Lena, the feeble voices of death were faintly heard

From LETTERS ON CHIVALRY AND ROMANCE

LETTER I

The ages we call barbarous present us with many a subject of curious speculation What, for instance, is more remarkable than the Gothic chivalry? or than the spirit of romance, which took its rise from that singular institution?

Nothing in human nature, my dear friend, is without its reasons. The modes and fashions of different times may appear, at first sight, fantastic and unaccountable But they who look nearly into them discover some latent cause of their production.

Nature once known, no prodigies remain,² as sings our philosophical bard; but to come at this knowledge is the difficulty Sometimes a close attention to the workings of the human mind is sufficient to lead us to it Sometimes more than that, the diligent observation of what passes without us, is necessary.

This last I take to be the case here The prodigies² we are now contemplating had their origin in the barbarous ages Why, then, says the fastidious modern, look any farther for the reason? Why not resolve them at once into the usual caprice and absurdity of barbarians?

This, you see, is a short and commodious philosophy Yet barbarians have their own, such as it is, if they are not enlightened by our reason. Shall we then condemn them unheard, or will it not be fair to let them have the telling of their own story?

Would we know from what causes the institution of chivalry was derived? The time of its birth, the situation of the barbarians, amongst whom it arose, must be considered. Their wants, designs, and policies must be explored. We must inquire when and where and how it came to pass that the western world became familiarized to this prodigy, which we now start at.

Another thing is full as remarkable, and concerns us more nearly. The spirit of chivalry was a fire which soon spent itself; but that of romance, which was kindled at it, burnt long, and continued its light and heat even to the politer ages.

The greatest geniuses of our own and foreign countries, such as Ariosto and Tasso in Italy, and Spenser and Milton in England, were seduced by these barbarities of their forefathers, were even charmed by the Gothic romances.¹ Was this caprice and absurdity in them? Or, may there not be something in the Gothic romance peculiarly suited to the views of a genius, and to the ends of poetry? And may not the philosophic moderns have gone too far, in their perpetual ridicule and contempt of it?

To form a judgment in the case, the rise, progress, and genius of Gothic chivalry must be explained.

The circumstances in the Gothic fictions and manners, which are proper to the ends of poetry (if any such there be) must be pointed out.

Reasons for the decline and rejection of the Gothic taste in later times must be given.

You have in these particulars both the subject and the plan of the following Letters.

LETTER VI

Let it be no surprise to you that, in the close of my last Letter, I presumed to bring the Jerusalem Liberata into competition with the Iliad.

So far as the heroic and Gothic manners are the same, the pictures of each, if well taken, must be equally entertaining. But I go further, and maintain that the circumstances in which they differ are clearly to the advantage of the Gothic designers.

You see, my purpose is to lead you from this forgotten chivalry to a more amusing subject. I mean the poetry we still read, and which was founded upon it.

¹Medieval romances of chivalry

Much has been said, and with great truth, of the felicity of Homer's age, for poetical manners. But as Homer was a citizen of the world, when he had seen in Greece, on the one hand, the manners he has described, could he, on the other hand, have seen in the west the manners of the feudal ages, I make no doubt but he would certainly have preferred the latter. And the grounds of this preference would, I suppose, have been the improved gallantry of the feudal times and the superior solemnity of their superstitions.

If any great poet, like Homer, had lived amongst, and sung of, the Gothic knights (for after all, Spenser and Tasso came too late, and it was impossible for them to paint truly and perfectly what was no longer seen or believed) this preference, I persuade myself, had been very sensible. But their fortune was not so happy.

—omnes illacrymabiles
Argentur, ignotique longa Nocte, carent quia vate sacro¹

As it is, we may take a guess of what the subject was capable of affording to real genius from the rude sketches we have of it in the old romancers. And it is but looking into any of them to be convinced that the gallantry which inspirited the feudal times was of a nature to furnish the poet with finer scenes and subjects of description in every view, than the simple and uncontrolled barbarity of the Grecian.

The principal entertainment arising from the delineation of these consists in the exercise of the boisterous passions, which are provoked and kept alive from one end of the Iliad to the other, by every imaginable scene of rage, revenge, and slaughter. In the other, together with these, the gentler and more humane affections are awakened in us by the most interesting displays of love and friendship; of love, elevated to its noblest heights; and of friendship, operating on the purest motives. The mere variety of these paintings is a relief to the reader, as well as writer. But their beauty, novelty, and pathos give them a vast advantage on the comparison.

Consider, withal, the surprises, accidents, adventures which probably and naturally attend on the life of wandering knights; the occasion there must be for

¹All are overwhelmed with the long night of death, unwept and unknown because they lack a sacred bard —Horace, Odes, IV, 9, 26 ff describing the wonders of different countries, and of presenting to view the manners and policies of distant states: all which make so conspicuous a part of the materials of the greater poetry.

So that, on the whole, though the spirit, passions, rapine, and violence of the two sets of manners were equal, yet there was a dignity, a magnificence, a variety in the feudal, which the other wanted

As to religious machinery, perhaps the popular system of each was equally remote from reason, yet the latter had something in it more amusing, as well as more awakening to the imagination

The current popular tales of elves and faeries were even fitter to take the credulous mind, and charm it into a willing admiration of the specious miracles, which wayward fancy delights in, than those of the old traditionary rabble of pagan divinities. And then, for the more solemn fancies of witchcraft and incantation, the horrors of the Gothic were above measure striking and terrible. The mummeries of the pagan priests were childish, but the Gothic enchanters shook and alarmed all nature

We feel this difference very sensibly in reading the ancient and modern poets. You would not compare the Canidia of Horace with the Witches in Macbeth. And what are Virgil's myrtles dropping blood,¹ to Tasso's enchanted forest?²

Ovid indeed, who had a fancy turned to romance, makes Medea, in a rant, talk wildly. But was this the common language of their other writers? The enchantress in Virgil says coolly of the veiv chiefest prodigies of her charms and poisons.

*Hic ego sarpē lupum fieri, & se condere sylvis Mortuū sarpē animas fūit exire sepulchris Atque satas alio vidi traducere menses.*³

The admirable poet has given an air of the marvellous to his subject, by the magic of his expression. Else, what do we find here, but the ordinary effects of melancholy, the vulgar superstition of evoking spirits, and the supposed influence of fascination on the hopes of rural industry.

says the poet of his country-seat, as if this security from a fascinating eye were a singular privilege, and the mark of a more than common good fortune

Shakespear, on the other hand, with a terrible sublime (which not so much the energy of his genius, as the nature of his subject drew from him) gives us another idea of the rough magic, as he calls it, of fairy enchantment.

I have bedimm'd
The noon-tide sun, call'd forth the mutinous winds,
And 'twixt the green sea and the azure vault Set roaring war, to the dread rattling thunder Have I giv'n fire, and rifted Jove's stout oak With his own bolt. The strong-bas'd promontory Have I made shake, and by the spurs pluck'd up The pine and cedar. Graves, at my command, Have open'd, and let forth their sleepers.⁵

The last circumstance, you will say, is but the *animas imis excire sepulchris*⁶ of the Latin poet. But a very significant word marks the difference. The pagan necromancers had a hundred little tricks by which they pretended to call up the ghosts, or shadows of the dead, but these, in the ideas of paganism, were quite another thing from Shakespear's sleepers

This may serve for a cast of Shakespear's magic. And I can't but think that, when Milton wanted to paint the horrors of that night (one of the noblest parts in his Paradise Regained) which the Devil himself is feigned to conjure up in the wilderness, the Gothic language and ideas helped him to work up his tempest with such terror. You will judge from these lines

Nor staid the terror there Infernal ghosts and hellish furies round Environ'd thee, some howl'd, some yell'd, some shriek'd,
Some bent at thee their fiery darts.⁷

But above all from the following,

Thus pass'd the night so foul till morning fair Came forth with pilgrim steps in amice⁸ gray,
Who with her radiant finger still'd the roar
Of thunder, chas'd the clouds, and laid the winds
And griesly specters.⁹

of morn, were apparently of their raising, as a sagacious critic perceived when he took notice "how very injudicious it was to retail the popular superstition in this place."

After all, the conclusion is not to be drawn so much from particular passages, as from the general impression left on our minds in reading the ancient and modern poets. And this is so much in favor of the latter that Mr Addison scruples not to say, "The ancients have not much of this poetry among them, for, indeed, almost the whole substance of it owes its original to the darkness and superstition of later ages—Our forefathers looked upon nature with more reverence and horror, before the world was enlightened by learning and philosophy, and loved to astonish themselves with the apprehensions of Witchcraft, Prodigies, Charms, and Incantments. There was not a village in England, that had not a Ghost in it; the churchyards were all haunted, every large common had a circle of fairies belonging to it, and there was scarce a Shepherd to be met with who had not seen a spirit."

We are upon enchanted ground, my friend; and you are to think yourself well used that I detain you no longer in this fearful circle. The glimpse you have had of it will help your imagination to conceive the rest. And without more words you will readily apprehend that the fancies of our modern bards are not only more gallant, but, on a change of the scene, more sublime, more terrible, more alarming, than those of the classic fablers. In a word, you will find that the manners they paint, and the superstitions they adopt, are the more poetical for being Gothic.

HORACE WALPOLE (1717-1797)

From THE CASTLE OF OTRANTO

1764

CHAPTER I

Manfred, Prince of Otranto, had one son and one daughter. The latter, a most beautiful virgin aged eighteen, was called Matilda. Conrad, the son, was three years younger, a homely youth, sickly, and of no promising disposition, yet he was the darling of his father, who never showed any symptoms of affection to Matilda. Manfred had contracted a marriage for his son with the Marquis of Vicenza's daughter, Isabella, and she had already been delivered by her guardians into the hands of Manfred that he might celebrate the wedding as soon as Conrad's infirm state of health would permit. Manfred's impatience for this ceremonial was remarked by his family and neighbors. The former indeed, apprehending the severity of their Prince's disposition, did not dare to utter their surmises on this precipitation. Hippolita, his wife, an amiable lady, did sometimes venture to represent the danger of marrying their only son so early, considering his great youth and greater infirmities, but she never received any other answer than reflections on her own sterility, who had given him but one heir. His tenants and subjects were less cautious in their discourses. They attributed this hasty wedding to the Prince's dread of seeing accomplished an ancient prophecy, which was said to have pronounced that the castle and lordship of Otranto should pass from the present family whenever the real owner should be grown too large to inhabit it. It was difficult to make any sense of this prophecy, and still less easy to conceive what it had to do with the marriage in question. Yet these mysteries or contradictions did not make the populace adhere the less to their opinion.

Young Conrad's birthday was fixed for his espousals. The company was assembled in the chapel of the castle, and everything ready for beginning the divine office, when Conrad himself was missing. Manfred, impatient of the least delay, and who had not observed his son retire, dispatched one of his attendants to summon the young prince. The servant, who had not staid long enough to have crossed the court to Conrad's apartment, came running back breathless, in a frantic manner, his eyes staring, and foaming at the mouth. He said nothing, but pointed to the court. The company were struck with terror and amazement. The Princess Hippolita, without knowing what was the matter, but anxious for her son, swooned away. Manfred, less apprehensive than enraged at the procrastination of the nuptials, and at the folly of his domestic, asked imperiously what was the matter. The fellow made no answer, but continued pointing towards the court-yard; and at last, after repeated questions put to him, cried out, "Oh! the helmet! the helmet!" In the meantime, some of the company had run into the court, from whence was heard a confused noise of shrieks, horror, and surprise. Manfred, who began to be alarmed at not seeing his son, went himself to get information of what occasioned this strange confusion. Matilda remained endeavoring to assist her mother, and Isabella staid for the same purpose and to avoid showing any impatience for the bridegroom, for whom, in truth, she had conceived little affection

The first thing that struck Manfred's eyes was a group of his servants endeavoring to raise something that appeared to him a mountain of sable plumes. He gazed without believing his sight. "What are ye doing?" cried Manfred, wrathfully. "Where is my son?" A volley of voices replied, "Oh! my lord! the prince! the prince! the helmet! the helmet!" Shocked with these lamentable sounds, and dreading he knew not what, he advanced hastily, but with a sight for a father's eyes! He beheld his child dashed to pieces and almost buried under an enormous helmet, an hundred times more large than any casque ever made for human being, and shaded with a proportionable quantity of black feathers.

The horror of the spectacle, the ignorance of all around how this misfortune had happened, and above all, the tremendous phenomenon before him, took away the Prince's speech. Yet his silence lasted longer than even grief could occasion. He fixed his eyes on what he wished in vain to believe a vision, and seemed less attentive to his loss than buried in meditation on the stupendous object that had occasioned it. He touched, he examined the fatal casque, nor could even the bleeding mangled remains of the young Prince divert the eyes of Manfred from the portent before him. All who had known his partial fondness for young Conrad were as much surprised at their Prince's insensibility, as thunder-struck themselves at the miracle of the helmet. They conveyed the disfigured corpse into the hall, without receiving the least direction from Manfred. As little was he attentive to the ladies who remained in the chapel. On the contrary, without mentioning the unhappy princesses, his wife and daughter, the first sounds that dropped from Manfred's lips were, "Take care of the Lady Isabella."

The domestics, without observing the singularity of this direction, were guided by their affection to their mistress to consider it as peculiarly addressed to her situation, and flew to her assistance. They conveyed her to her chamber more dead than alive, and indifferent to all the strange circumstances she heard except the death of her son. Matilda, who doted on her mother, smothered her own grief and amazement, and thought of nothing but assisting and comforting her afflicted parents. Isabella, who had been treated by Hippolita like a daughter, and who returned that tenderness with equal duty and affection, was scarce less assiduous about the Princess, at the same time endeavoring to partake and lessen the weight of sorrow which she saw Matilda strove to suppress, for whom she had conceived the warmest sympathy of friendship. Yet her own situation could not help finding its place in her thoughts. She felt no concern for the death of young Conrad, except commiseration, and she was not sorry to be delivered from a marriage which had promised her little felicity, either from her destined bridegroom or from the severe temper of Manfred, who, though he had distinguished her by great indulgence, had imprinted her mind with terror, from his causeless rigor to such amiable princesses as Hippolita and Matilda.

While the ladies were conveying the wretched mother to her bed, Manfred remained in the court, gazing on the ominous casque, and regardless of the crowd which the strangeness of the event had now assembled around him. The few words he articulated tended solely to inquiries whether any man knew from whence it could have come. Nobody could give him the least information. However, as it seemed to be the sole object of his curiosity, it soon became so to the rest of the spectators, whose conjectures were as absurd and improbable as the catastrophe itself was unprecedented. In the midst of their senseless guesses, a young peasant, whom rumor had drawn thither from a neighboring village, observed that the miraculous helmet was exactly like that on the figure in black marble of Alfonso the Good, one of their former princes in the church of St Nicholas. "Villain! What sayest thou?" cried Manfred, starting from his trance in a tempest of rage, and seizing the young man by the collar. "How darest thou utter such treason? Thy life shall pay for it!" The spectators, who as little comprehended the cause of the Prince's fury as all the rest they had seen, were at a loss to unravel this new circumstance. The young peasant himself was still more astonished, not conceiving how he had offended the Prince; yet recollecting himself, with a mixture of grace and humility, he disengaged himself from Manfred's gripe, and then with an obeisance which discovered more jealousy of innocence than dismay, he asked, with respect, of what he was guilty Manfred, more enriaged at the vigor, however decently exerted, with which the young man had shaken off his hold, than appeased by his submission, ordered his attendants to seize him, and if he had not been withheld by his friends, whom he had invited to the nuptials, would have poignarded the peasant in their arms

During this altercation, some of the vulgar spectators had run to the great church, which stood near the castle, and came back open-mouthed, declaring that the helmet was missing from Alfonso's statue Manfred, at this news, grew perfectly frantic, and, as if he sought a subject on which to vent the tempest within him, he rushed again on the young peasant crying, "Villain! Monster! Sorcerer! 'Tis thou hast done this! 'Tis thou hast slain my son!" The mob, who wanted some object within the scope of their capacities on whom they might discharge their bewildered reasonings, caught the words from the mouth of their lord and echoed, "Ay, ay. 'tis he. 'tis he, he has stolen the helmet from good Alfonso's tomb and dashed out the brains of our young Prince with it," never reflecting how enormous the disproportion was between the marble helmet that had been in the church and that of steel before their eyes, nor how impossible it was for a youth, seemingly not twenty, to wield a piece of armor of so prodigious a weight

The folly of these ejaculations brought Manfred to himself Yet whether provoked at the peasant having observed the resemblance between the two helmets, and thereby led to the farther discovery of the absence of that in the church, or wishing to bury any fresh rumors under so impertinent a supposition, he gravely pronounced that the young man was certainly a necromancer, and that till the church could take cognizance of the affair, he would have the magician, whom they had thus detected, kept prisoner under the helmet itself, which he ordered his attendants to raise and place the young man under it, declaring he should be kept there without food, with which his own infernal art might furnish him

It was in vain for the youth to represent against this preposterous sentence In vain did Manfred's friends endeavor to divert him from this savage and ill-grounded resolution The generality were charmed with their lord's decision, which, to their apprehensions, carried great appearance of justice, as the magician was to be punished by the very instrument with which he had offended Nor were they struck with the least compunction at the probability of the youth being starved, for they firmly believed that by his diabolic skill he could easily supply himself with nutriment

Manfred thus saw his commands even cheerfully obeyed, and appointing a guard with strict orders to prevent any food being conveyed to the prisoner, he dismissed his friends and attendants, and retired to his own chamber after locking the gates of the castle, in which he suffered none but his domestics to remain

In the meantime, the care and zeal of the young ladies had brought the Princess Hippolyta to herself, who amidst the transports of her own sorrow frequently demanded news of her lord, would have dismissed her attendants to watch over him, and at last enjoined Matilda to leave her and visit and comfort her father Matilda, who wanted no affectionate duty to Manfred though she trembled at his austerity, obeyed the orders of Hippolyta, whom she tenderly recommended to Isabella, and enquiring of the domestics for her father, was informed that he was retired to his chamber and had commanded that nobody should have admittance to him Concluding that he was immersed in sorrow for the death of her brother, and fearing to renew his tears by the sight of his sole remaining child, she hesitated whether she should break in upon his affliction Yet, solicitude for him, backed by the commands of her mother, encouraged her to venture disobeying the orders he had given, a fault she had never been guilty of before The gentle timidity of her nature made her pause for some minutes at the door She heard him traverse his chamber backwards and forwards with disordered steps, a mood which increased her apprehensions. She was, however, just going to beg admittance when Manfred suddenly opened his door, and as it was now twilight, concurring with the disorder of his mind, he did not distinguish the person, but asked angrily who it was Matilda replied trembling, "My dearest father, it is I, your daughter" Manfred stepping back hastily, cried, "Begone! I do not want a daughter," and flinging back abruptly, clapped the door against the terrified Matilda

She was too well acquainted with her father's impetuosity to venture a second intrusion When she had a little recovered the shock of so bitter a reception, she wiped away her tears to prevent the additional stab that the knowledge of it would give to Hippolita, who questioned her in the most anxious terms on the health of Manfred and how he bore his loss Matilda assured her he was well and supported his misfortune with manly fortitude "But will he not let me see him?" said Hippolita mournfully, "will he not permit me to blend my tears with his and shed a mother's sorrows in the bosom of her lord? Or do you deceive me, Matilda? I know how Manfred doted on his son Is not the stroke too heavy for him? Has he not sunk under it? You do not answer me Alas! I dread the worst! Raise me, my maidens, I will, I will see my lord Bear me to him instantly He is dearer to me even than my children" Matilda made signs to Isabella to prevent Hippolita's rising, and both those lovely young women were using their gentle violence to stop and calm the Princess, when a servant, on the part of Manfred, arrived and told Isabella that his lord demanded to speak with her

"With me!" cried Isabella "Go!" said Hippolita, relieved by a message from her lord, "Manfred cannot support the sight of his own family He thinks you less disordered than we are, and dreads the shock of my grief Console him, dear Isabella, and tell him I will smother my own anguish rather than add to his"

As it was now evening, the servant who conducted Isabella bore a torch before her When they came to Manfred, who was walking impatiently about the gallery, he started and said hastily "Take away that light, and begone!" Then shutting the door impetuously, he flung himself upon a bench against the wall, and bade Isabella sit by him She obeyed trembling "I sent for you lady," said he, and then stopped under great appearance of confusion. "My lord!" "Yes, I sent for you on a matter of great moment," resumed he. "Dry your tears, young lady. You have lost your bridegroom Yes, cruel fate! and I have lost the hopes of my race! But Conrad was not worthy of your beauty." "How! my lord," said Isabella "Sure you do not suspect me of not feeling the concern I ought! My duty and affection would have always"— "Think no more of him," interrupted Manfred; "he was a sickly puny child; and heaven has perhaps taken him away that I might not trust the honors of my house on so frail a foundation The line of Manfred calls for numerous supports. My foolish fondness for that boy blinded the eyes of my prudence, but it is better as it is I hope in a few years to have reason to rejoice at the death of Conrad"

Words cannot paint the astonishment of Isabella At first, she apprehended that grief had disordered Manfred's understanding Her next thought suggested that this strange discourse was designed to ensnare her She feared that Manfred had perceived her indifference for his son, and in consequence of that idea she replied "Good! my lord, do not doubt my tenderness My heart would have accompanied my hand Conrad would have engrossed all my care, and wherever fate shall dispose of me, I shall always cherish his memory, and regard your highness and the virtuous Hippolita as my parents" "'Curse on Hippolita!" cried Manfred "Forget her from this moment, as I do In short, lady, you have missed a husband undeserving of your charms They shall now be better disposed of Instead of a sickly boy, you shall have a husband in the prime of his age, who will know how to value your beauties, and who may expect a numerous offspring" "Alas! my lord," said Isabella, "my mind is too sadly engrossed by the recent catastrophe in your family to think of another marriage If ever my father returns, and it shall be his pleasure, I shall obey, as I did when I consented to give my hand to your son But until his return, permit me to remain under your hospitable roof, and employ the melancholy hours in assuaging yours, Hippolita's and the fair Matilda's affliction."

"I desired you once before," said Manfred, angrily, "not to name that woman From this hour she must be a stranger to you as she must be to me In short, Isabella, since I cannot give you my son,

I offer you myself " "Heavens!" cried Isabella, waking from her delusion, "what do I hear? You! my lord! you! my father-in-law! the father of Conrad! the husband of the virtuous Hippolita!" "I tell you," said Manfred, imperiously, "Hippolita is no longer my wife, I divorce her from this hour. Too long has she cursed me by her unfruitfulness. My fate depends on having sons, and this night I trust will give a new date to my hopes." At those words he seized the cold hand of Isabella, who was half dead with fright and horror. She shrieked and started from him. Manfred rose to pursue her, when the moon, which was now up and gleamed in at the opposite casement, presented to his sight the plumes of the fatal helmet, which rose to the height of the windows, waving backwards and forwards, in a tempestuous manner, and accompanied with a hollow and rustling sound Isabella, who gathered courage from her situation, and who dreaded nothing so much as Manfred's pursuit of his declaration, cried "Look! my lord! See! heaven itself declares against your impious intentions." "Heaven nor hell shall impede my designs," said Manfred, advancing again to seize the Princess. At that instant the portrait of his grandfather, which hung over the bench where they had been sitting, uttered a deep sigh and heaved its breast. Isabella, whose back was turned to the picture, saw not the motion, nor knew whence the sound came, but started, and said "Hark! my lord! What sound was that?" and at the same time made towards the door. Manfred, distracted between the flight of Isabella, who had now reached the stairs, and yet unable to keep his eyes from the picture, which began to move, had, however, advanced some steps after her, still looking backwards on the portrait, when he saw it quit its panel and descend on the floor with a grave and melancholy air "Do I dream?" cried Manfred, returning. "or are the devils themselves in league against me? Speak, infernal spectre! Or, if thou art my grandsire, why dost thou too conspire against thy wretched descendant, who too dearly pays for—" Ere he could finish the sentence, the vision sighed again, and made a sign to Manfred to follow him. "Lead on!" cried Manfred, "I will follow thee to the gulf of perdition." The spectre marched sedately, but dejected, to the end of the gallery and turned into a chamber on the right-hand. Manfred accompanied him at a little distance, full of anxiety and horror, but resolved. As he would have entered the chamber, the door was clapped to with violence by an invisible hand. The Prince, collecting courage from this delay, would have forcibly burst open the door with his foot, but found that it resisted his utmost efforts. "Since hell will not satisfy my curiosity," said Manfred, "I will use the human means in my power for preserving my race. Isabella shall not escape me."

That lady, whose resolution had given way to terror the moment she had quitted Manfred, continued her flight to the bottom of the principal staircase. There she stopped, not knowing whither to direct her steps, nor how to escape from the impetuosity of the Prince. The gates of the castle she knew were locked, and guards placed in the court. Should she, as her heart prompted her, go and prepare Hippolita for the cruel destiny that awaited her, she did not doubt but Manfred would seek her there, and that his violence would incite him to double the injury he meditated, without leaving room for them to avoid the impetuosity of his passions. Delay might give him time to reflect on the horrid measures he had conceived, or produce some circumstance in her favor if she could, for that night at least, avoid his odious purpose. Yet, where conceal herself? How avoid the pursuit he would infallibly make throughout the castle? As these thoughts passed rapidly through her mind, she recollected a subterraneous passage which led from the vaults of the castle to the church of St Nicholas. Could she reach the altar before she was overtaken, she knew even Manfred's violence would not dare to profane the sacredness of the place, and she determined, if no other means of deliverance offered, to shut herself up forever among the holy virgins, whose convent was contiguous to the cathedral. In this resolution, she seized a lamp that burned at the foot of the staircase, and hurried towards the secret passage.

The lower part of the castle was hollowed into several intricate cloisters, and it was not easy for one under so much anxiety to find the door that opened into the cavern. An awful silence reigned throughout those subterraneous regions, except now and then some blasts of wind that shook the doors she had passed, and which, grating on the rusty hinges, were reëchoed through that long labyrinth of darkness. Every murmur struck her with new terror; yet, more she dreaded to hear the wrathful voice of Manfred urging his domestics to pursue her. She trod as softly as impatience would give her leave; yet frequently stopped and listened to hear if she was followed. In one of those moments she thought she heard a sigh. She shuddered, and recoiled a few paces. In a moment she thought she heard the step of some person. Her blood curdled—she concluded it was Manfred. Every suggestion that horror could inspire rushed into her mind. She condemned her rash flight, which had thus exposed her to his rage in a place where her cries were not likely to draw anybody to her assistance. Yet, the sound seemed not to come from behind,—if Manfred knew where she was, he must have followed her. She was still in one of the cloisters, and the steps she heard were too distinct to proceed from the way she had come. Cheered with this reflection, and hoping to find a friend in whoever was not the Prince, she was going to advance, when a door that stood ajar at some distance to the left was opened gently. But ere her lamp, which she held up, could discover who opened it, the person retreated precipitately on seeing the light.

Isabella, whom every incident was sufficient to dismay, hesitated whether she should proceed. Her dread of Manfred soon outweighed every other terror. The very circumstance of the person avoiding her gave her a sort of courage. It could only be, she thought, some domestic belonging to the castle. Her gentleness had never raised her an enemy, and conscious innocence bade her hope that, unless sent by the Prince's order to seek her, his servants would rather assist than prevent her flight. Fortifying herself with these reflections, and believing by what she could observe that she was near the mouth of the subterranean cavern, she approached the door that had been opened; but a sudden gust of wind that met her at the door extinguished her lamp and left her in total darkness.

Words cannot paint the horror of the Princess's situation. Alone in so dismal a place, her mind imprinted with all the terrible events of the day, hopeless of escaping, expecting every moment the arrival of Manfred, and far from tranquil on knowing she was within reach of somebody, she knew not whom, who for some cause seemed concealed thereabouts,—all these thoughts crowded on her distracted mind, and she was ready to sink under her apprehensions. She addressed herself to every saint in heaven, and inwardly implored their assistance. For a considerable time she remained in an agony of despair. At last, as softly as was possible, she felt for the door, and having found it, entered trembling into the vault from whence she had heard the sigh and steps. It gave her a kind of momentary joy to perceive an imperfect ray of clouded moonshine gleam from the roof of the vault, which seemed to be fallen in, and from whence hung a fragment of earth or building, she could not distinguish which, that appeared to have been crushed inward. She advanced eagerly towards this chasm, when she discerned a human form standing close against the wall.

She shrieked, believing it the ghost of her betrothed Conrad. The figure advancing said in a submissive voice: "Be not alarmed, lady; I will not injure you." Isabella, a little encouraged by the words and tone of voice of the stranger, and recollecting that this must be the person who had opened the door, recovered her spirits enough to reply: "Sir, whoever you are, take pity on a wretched princess standing on the brink of destruction. Assist me to escape from this fatal castle, or in a few moments I may be made miserable forever." "Alas!" said the stranger, "what can I do to assist you? I will die in your defence; but I am unacquainted with the castle, and want—" "Oh!" said Isabella, hastily interrupting him, "help me but to find a trap-door that must be hereabout, and it is the greatest service you can do me, for I have not a minute to lose." Saying these words, she felt about on the pavement, and directed the stranger to search likewise for a smooth piece of brass inclosed in one of the stones. "That," said she, "is the lock, which opens with a spring, of which I know the secret. If we can find that, I may escape; if not, alas! courteous stranger, I fear I shall have involved you in my misfortunes. Manfred will suspect you for the accomplice of my flight, and you will fall a victim to his resentment." "I value not my life," said the stranger; "and it will be some comfort to lose it in trying to deliver you from his tyranny."

"Generous youth," said Isabella, "how shall I ever requite—" As she uttered those words, a ray of moonshine streaming through a cranny of the ruin above shone directly on the lock they sought. "Oh! transport!" said Isabella, "here is the trap-door!" And taking out a key, she touched the spring, which starting aside discovered an iron ring. "Lift up the door," said the Princess. The stranger obeyed, and beneath appeared some stone steps descending into a vault totally dark. "We must go down here," said Isabella. "Follow me. Dark and dismal as it is, we cannot miss our way; it leads directly to the church of St. Nicholas. But perhaps," added the Princess, modestly, "you have no reason to leave the castle; nor have I farther occasion for your service. In few minutes I shall be safe from Manfred's rage. Only let me know to whom I am so much obliged." "I will never quit you," said the stranger eagerly, "until I have placed you in safety. Nor think me, Princess, more generous than I am. Though you are my principal care—" The stranger was interrupted by a sudden noise of voices that seemed approaching, and they soon distinguished these words: "Talk not to me of necromancers. I tell you she must be in the castle. I will find her in spite of enchantment." "Oh, heavens!" cried Isabella, "it is the voice of Manfred! Make haste or we are ruined! And shut the trap-door after you." Saying this, she descended the steps precipitately, and as the stranger hastened to follow her he let the door slip out of his hands. It fell, and the spring closed over it. He tried in vain to open it, not having observed Isabella's method of touching the spring; nor had he many moments to make an essay. The noise of the falling door had been heard by Manfred, who directed by the sound, hastened thither, attended by his servants with torches. "It must be Isabella," cried Manfred before he entered the vault; "she is escaping by the subterraneous passage, but she cannot have got far." What was the astonishment of the Prince when, instead of Isabella, the light of the torches discovered to him the young peasant whom he thought confined under the fatal helmet. "Traitor!" said Manfred; "how camest thou here? I thought thee in durance above in the court." "I am no traitor," replied the young man boldly;

"nor am I answerable for your thoughts." "Presumptuous villain!" cried Manfred, "dost thou provoke my wrath? Tell me. How hast thou escaped from above? Thou hast corrupted thy guards, and their lives shall answer it." "My poverty," said the peasant calmly, "will disculpate them. Though the ministers of a tyrant's wrath, to thee they are faithful and but too willing to execute the orders which you unjustly imposed upon them." "Art thou so hardy as to dare my vengeance?" said the Prince. "But tortures shall force the truth from thee. Tell me, I will know thy accomplices." "There was my accomplice," said the youth, smiling, and pointing to the roof. Manfred ordered the torches to be held up, and perceived that one of the cheeks of the enchanted casque had forced its way through the pavement of the court as his servants had let it fall over the peasant, and had broken through into the vault, leaving a gap through which the peasant had pressed himself some minutes before he was found by Isabella. "Was that the way by which thou didst descend?" said Manfred. "It was," said the youth. "But what noise was that," said Manfred, "which I heard as I entered the cloister?" "A door clapped," said the peasant, "I heard it as well as you." "What door?" said Manfred hastily. "I am not acquainted with your castle," said the peasant, "this is the first time I ever entered it, and this vault the only part of it within which I ever was." "But I tell thee," said Manfred, wishing to find out if the youth had discovered the trap-door, "it was thus way I heard the noise, my servants heard it too—" "My lord," interrupted one of them officiously, "to be sure it was the trap-door, and he was going to make his escape." "Peace! blockhead," said the Prince angrily; "if he was going to escape, how should he come on this side? I will know from his own mouth what noise it was I heard. Tell me truly, thy life depends on thy veracity." "My veracity is dearer to me than my life," said the peasant, "nor would I purchase the one by forfeiting the other." "Indeed! young philosopher!" said Manfred contemptuously. "Tell me then. What was the noise I heard?" "Ask me what I can answer," said he; "and put me to death instantly if I tell you a lie." Manfred, growing impatient at the steady valor and indifference of the youth, cried:

"Well then, thou man of truth! answer Was it the fall of the trap-door that I heard?" "It was," said the youth. "It was!" said the Prince, "and how didst thou come to know there was a trap-door here?" "I saw the plate of brass by a gleam of moonshine," replied he. "But what told thee it was a lock?" said Manfred. "How didst thou discover the secret of opening it?" "Providence, that delivered me from the helmet, was able to direct me to the spring of a lock," said he. "Providence should have gone a little farther and have placed thee out of the reach of my resentment," said Manfred. "When Providence had taught thee to open the lock, it abandoned thee for a fool who did not know how to make use of its favors. Why didst thou not pursue the path pointed out for thy escape? Why didst thou shut the trap-door before thou hadst descended the steps?" "I might ask you, my lord," said the peasant, "how I, totally unacquainted with your castle, was to know that those steps led to any outlet. But I scorn to evade your questions. Wherever those steps lead to, perhaps I should have explored the way, I could not be in a worse situation than I was. But the truth is, I let the trap-door fall. Your immediate arrival followed. I had given the alarm, what imported it to me whether I was seized a minute sooner or a minute late?" "Thou art a resolute villain for thy years," said Manfred. "Yet on reflection I suspect thou dost but trifle with me. Thou hast not yet told me how thou didst open the lock." "That I will show you, my lord," said the peasant, and taking up a fragment of stone that had fallen from above, he laid himself on the trap-door and began to bent on the piece of brass that covered it, meaning to gain time for the escape of the Princess. This presence of mind, joined to the frankness of the youth, staggered Manfred. He even felt a disposition towards pardoning one who had been guilty of no crime. Manfred was not one of those savage tyrants who wanton in cruelty unprovoked. The circumstances of his fortune had given an asperity to his temper, which was naturally humane, and his virtues were always ready to operate when his passions did not obscure his reason.

While the Prince was in this suspense, a confused noise of voices echoed through the distant vaults. As the sound approached, he distinguished the clamors of some of his domestics, whom he had dispersed through the castle in search of Isabella, calling out "Where is my lord? Where is the Prince?" "Here I am," said Manfred, as they came nearer. "Have you found the Princess?" The first that arrived replied "Oh! my lord! I am glad we have found you." "Found me!" said Manfred. "Have you found the Princess?" "We thought we had, my lord," said the fellow, looking terrified; "but—" "But what?" cried the Prince. "Has she escaped?" "Jaquez and I, my lord—" "Yes, I and Diego," interrupted the second, who came up in still greater consternation. "Speak one of you at a time," said Manfred. "I ask you, Where is the Princess?" "We do not know," said they both together, "but we are frightened out of our wits." "So I think, blockheads," said Manfred. "What is it has scared you thus?" "Oh! my lord!" said Jaquez, "Diego has seen such a sight! Your highness would not believe our eyes." "What new absurdity is this?" cried Manfred. "Give me a direct answer, or by heaven—" "Why, my lord, if it please your highness to hear me," said the poor fellow, "Diego and I—" "Yes, I and Jaquez," cried his comrade—"Did not I forbid you to speak both at a time?" said the Prince. "You, Jaquez, answer, for the other fool seems more distracted than thou art." "What is the matter, my gracious lord?" said Jaquez. "If it please your highness to hear me, Diego and I according to your highness's orders went to search for the young lady, but being comprehensive that we might meet the ghost of my young lord, your highness's son, (God rest his soul!) as he has not received Christian burial—" "Sot!" cried Manfred, in a rage; "is it only a ghost then that thou hast seen?" "Oh! worse! worse! my lord," cried Diego. "I had rather have seen ten whole ghosts—" "Grant me patience!" said Manfred, "these blockheads distract me. Out of my sight, Diego! And thou, Jaquez, tell me in one word. Art thou sober? Art thou raving? Thou wast wont to have some sense. Hast the other sot frightened himself and thee too? Speak! What is it he fancies he has seen?" "Why, my lord," replied Jaquez, trembling, "I was going to tell your highness that since the calamitous misfortune of my young lord (God rest his precious soul'), not one of us, your highness's faithful servants—indeed we are, my lord, though poor men—I say, not one of us has dared to set a foot about the castle but two together. So Diego and I, thinking that my young lady might be in the great gallery, went up there to look for her, and tell her your highness wanted something to impart to her—" "O blundering fools!" cried Manfred. "And in the meantime she has made her escape because you were afraid of goblins! Why, thou knave! she left me in the gallery. I came from thence myself." "For all that, she may be there still for ought I know," said Jaquez. "but the devil shall have me before I seek her there again! Poor Diego! I do not believe he will ever recover it." "Recover what?" said Manfred. "Am I never to learn what it is has terrified these rascals? But I lose my time. Follow me, slave, I will see if she is in the gallery." "For heaven's sake, my dear good lord," cried Jaquez, "do not go to the gallery! Satan himself I believe is in the great chamber next to the gallery." Manfred, who hitherto had treated the terror of his servants as an idle panic, was struck at this new circumstance. He recollected the apparition of the portrait and the sudden closing of the door at the end of the gallery. His voice faltered, and he asked with disorder, "What is in the great chamber?" "My lord," said Jaquez, "when Diego and I came into the gallery, he went first, for he said he had more courage than I. So when we came into the gallery, we found nobody. We looked under every bench and stool, and still we found nobody." "Were all the pictures in their places?" said Manfred. "Yes, my lord," answered Jaquez, "but we did not think of looking behind them." "Well, well!" said Manfred; "proceed." "When we came to the door of the great chamber," continued Jaquez, "we found it shut—" "And could not you open it?" said Manfred. "Oh! yes, my lord, would to heaven we had not!" replied he. "Nay, it was not I neither, it was Diego. He was grown fool-hardy, and would go on though I advised him not. If ever I open a door that is shut, again—" "Trifle not," said Manfred, shuddering. "but tell me what you saw in the great chamber on opening the door." "I! my lord!" said Jaquez; "I saw nothing; I was behind Diego. But I heard the noise." "Jaquez," said Man-

fred, in a solemn tone of voice, "tell me, I adjure thee by the souls of my ancestors. What was it thou sawest? What was it thou heardest?" "It was Diego saw it, my lord, it was not I," replied Jaquez; "I only heard the noise. Diego had no sooner opened the door than he cried out and ran back. I ran back too, and said, 'Is it the ghost? the ghost?' 'No, no,' said Diego, and his hair stood an end, 'it is a giant, I believe. He is all clad in armor, for I saw his foot and part of his leg, and they are as large as the helmet below in the court.' As he said these words, my lord, we heard a violent motion and the rattling of armor as if the giant was rising, for Diego has told me since that he believes the giant was lying down, for the foot and leg were stretched at length on the floor. Before we could get to the end of the gallery, we heard the door of the great chamber clap behind us, but we did not dare turn back to see if the giant was following us. Yet now I think on it, we must have heard him if he had pursued us—But for heaven's sake, good my lord, send for the chaplain and have the castle exorcised, for, for certain, it is enchanted." "Ay, pray do, my lord," cried all the servants at once, "or we must leave your highness's service." "Peace, dotards," said Manfred, "and follow me. I will know what all this means." "We! my lord," cried they with one voice, "we would not go up to the gallery for your highness's revenue." The young peasant, who had stood silent, now spoke. "Will your highness," said he, "permit me to try this adventure? My life is of consequence to nobody. I fear no bad angel, and have offended no good one." "Your behavior is above your seeming," said Manfred, viewing him with surprise and admiration. "Hereafter, I will reward your bravery, but now," continued he with a sigh, "I am so circumstanced that I dare trust no eyes but my own, however, I give you leave to accompany me."

Manfred, when he first followed Isabella from the gallery, had gone directly to the apartment of his wife, concluding the Princess had retired thither. Hippolyta, who knew his step, rose with anxious fondness to meet her lord, whom she had not seen since the death of their son. She would have flown in a transport mixed of joy and grief to his bosom, but he pushed her rudely off, and said, "Where is Isa-bella?" "Isabella! my lord!" said the astonished Hippolita. "Yes, Isabella!" cried Manfred imperiously. "I want Isabella." "My lord," replied Matilda, who perceived how much his behavior had shocked her mother, "she has not been with us since your highness summoned her to your apartment." "Tell me where she is," said the Prince, "I do not want to know where she has been." "My good lord," said Hippolita, "your daughter tells you the truth: Isabella left us by your command, and has not returned since. But, my good lord, compose yourself, retire to your rest. This dismal day has disordered you. Isabella shall wait your orders in the morning." "What then! you know where she is!" cried Manfred. "Tell me directly, for I will not lose an instant. And you, woman," speaking to his wife, "order your chaplain to attend me forthwith." "Isabella," said Hippolita calmly, "is retired, I suppose, to her chamber. She is not accustomed to watch at this late hour. Gracious my lord," continued she, "let me know what has disturbed you. Has Isabella offended you?" "Trouble me not with questions," said Manfred; "but tell me where she is." "Matilda shall call her," said the Princess. "Sit down, my lord, and resume your wonted fortitude." "What, art thou jealous of Isabella," replied he, "that you wish to be present at our interview?" "Good heavens! my lord," said Hippolita, "what is it your highness means?" "Thou wilt know ere many minutes are passed," said the cruel Prince. "Send your chaplain to me, and wait my pleasure here." At these words he flung out of the room in search of Isabella, leaving the amazed ladies thunder-struck with his words and frantic deportment, and lost in vain conjectures on what he was meditating.

Manfred was now returning from the vault attended by the peasant and a few of his servants whom he had obliged to accompany him. He ascended the staircase without stopping till he arrived at the gallery, at the door of which he met Hippolita and her chaplain. When Diego had been dismissed by Manfred, he had gone directly to the Princess's apartment with the alarm of what he had seen. That excellent lady, who no more than Manfred doubted of the reality of the vision, yet affected to treat it as a delirium of the servant. Willing, however, to save her lord from any additional shock, and prepared by a series of grief not to tremble at any accession to it, she determined to make herself the first sacrifice if fate had marked the present hour for their destruction. Dismissing the reluctant Matilda to her rest, who in vain sued for leave to accompany her mother, and attended only by her chaplain, Hippolita had visited the gallery and great chamber, and now with more serenity of soul than she had felt for many hours, she met her lord and assured him that the vision of the gigantic leg and foot was all a fable, and no doubt an impression made by fear and the dark and dismal hour of the night on the minds of his servants. She and the chaplain had examined the chamber, and found every thing in the usual order. Manfred, though persuaded like his wife that the vision had been no work of fancy, recovered a little from the tempest of mind into which so many strange events had thrown him. Ashamed, too, of his inhuman treatment of a princess who returned every injury with new marks of tenderness and duty, he felt returning love forcing itself into his eyes; but not less ashamed of feeling remorse towards one against whom he was inwardly meditating a yet more bitter outrage, he curbed the yearnings of his heart and did not dare to lean even towards pity. The next transition of his soul was to exquisite villainy. Presuming on the unshaken submission of Hippolita, he flattered himself that she would not only acquiesce with patience to a divorce, but would obey, if it was his pleasure, in endeavoring to persuade Isabella to give him her hand. But ere he could indulge this horrid hope, he reflected that Isabella was not to be found. Coming to himself, he gave orders that every avenue to the castle should be strictly guarded, and charged his domestics on pain of their lives to suffer nobody to pass out. The young peasant, to whom he spoke favorably, he ordered to remain in a small chamber on the stairs, in which there was a pallet-bed, and the key of which he took away himself, telling the youth he would talk with him in the morning. Then dismissing his attendants, and bestowing a sullen kind of half-nod on Hippolita, he retired to his own chamber.

ROBIN HOOD AND GUY OF GISBORNE

When shaws¹ beene sheene,² and shradd³ full fayre,
And leaves both large and longe
Itt is merrye walking in the fayre forrest
To heare the small birdes songe

5 The woodweele⁴ sang, and wold not cease, Sitting upon the sprave.
Soe lowde, he wakened Robin Hood.
In the greenwood where he lay

“Now by my faye,”⁵ sayd jollye Robin 10 “A sweaven⁶ I had this night,
I dreamt me of tow wighty yemen,⁷
That fast with me can⁸ fight

Methought they did mee beate and blude,
And tooke my bow mee froe, 15 If I be Robin alive in this lande, He be wroken⁹ on them towe ”

“Sweavens are swift, master,” quoth John,
“As the wind blowes ore the hill,
For if itt be never so loude this night, 20 Tomorrow it may be still ”

“Buske¹⁰ yee, bowne yee, my merry men
all,
And John shall goe with mee,
For He goe seeke yond wight yeomen,
In greenwood where the¹¹ bee ”

25 Then they cast on then gownes of grene,
And tooke thevr howes each one,
And they away to the greene forrest
A-shooting forth are gone,

Untill they came to the merry greenwood, 30 Where they had gladdest bee,
There were the ware of a wight yeoman,
His body leaned to a tree

A sword and a dagger he wore by his side,
Of manye a man the bane, 35 And he was clad in his capull-hyde,¹² Topp and tayll and mayne

“Stand vou still, master,” quoth Little John,
“Under this tree so grene,

¹ groves² beautiful³ coppices⁴ woodlark⁵ faith⁶ dream⁷ two strong yeomen⁸ for gan, did⁹ avenged¹⁰ make ready (*bunkle*and bowne are doubt lets)

¹¹ they¹² horse hide

And I will go to yond wight yeoman 40 To know what he doth meane ” “Ah! John, by me thou settest noe store,

And that I farley¹ finde:
How offt send I my men beffore
And tarry my selfe behinde?

45 “It is no cunning a knave to ken,
And a man but heare him speake,
And itt were not for bursting of my bowe, John, I thy head wold breake ”

As often wordes they breeden bale, 50 So they parted Robin and John;
And John is gone to Barnesdale,
The gates² he knoweth eche one.

But when he came to Barnesdale, Great heavynesse there hee hadd, 55 For he found tow of his owne fellowes Were slaine both in a slade ”

And Scarlette he was flying a-foote Fast over stoeke and stone,
For the proud sheriffe with seven score men 60 Fast after him is gone.

“One shoote now I will shoofe,” quoth
John,
“With Christ his might and mayne
He make yond fellow that flyes soe fast,
To stopp he shall be fayue ”

65 Then John bent up his long bende-bowe,⁴ And fettele⁵ him to shoote
The bow was made of tender boughs,
And fell down to his foote

“Woe worth, woe worth thee,” wicked
wood, 70 That ere thou grew on a tree,
For now this day thou art my bale,
My boote⁷ when thou shold bee ”

His shoote it was but loosely shott, Yet flewe not the arrowe in vaine,
75 For itt mett one of the sheriffes men, Good William a Trent was slaine

It had bene better of William a Trent
To have bene abed with sorrowe,
Than to be that day in the green wood slade 80 To meet with Little Johns arrowe

But as it is said, when men be mett Fyve can doe more than three,

¹ strange² ways, paths³ valley, ravine⁴ bent, or curved, bow⁵ made ready⁶ woe be to thee⁷ help

The sheriffe hath taken Little John,
And bound him fast to a tree

85 "Thou shalt be drawn by dale and downe,¹
And hanged hye on a hill."

"But thou mayst fayle of thy purpose,"² quoth John,
"If itt be Christ his will "

Let us leave talking of Little John, 90 And thinke of Robin Hood,
How he is gone to the wight yeoman,
Where under the leaves he stood.

"Good morrowe, good fellowe," sayd Robin so fayre.

"Good morrowe, good fellow," quoth he

95 "Methinkes by this howe thou beares in thy hande
A good archere thou sholdst bee "

"I am wilfulle³ of my waye," quo⁴ the veman,

"And of my morning tyde "

"He lead thee through the wood," sayd 140
Robin,

100 "Good fellow. He be thy guide "

"I seeke an outlawe," the straunger sayd.

"Men call him Robin Hood.

Rather Ild meet with that proud outlawe Than fiftie pound soe good "

105 "Now come with me, thou wighty veman
And Robin thou soone shalt see But first let us some pastime find Under the greenwood tree

110 "First let us some masterve⁵ make Among the woods so even,
We may chance to meet with Robin Hood Here att some unsett steven "

They cutt them downe two summer shrogges,⁶

That grew both under a breere.

115 And sett them threescore rood in twaine⁷

To shoot the pricke v-fere⁸

"Leade on, good fellowe," quoth Robin Hood,

"Leade on, I doe hidd thee "

"Nay by my faith, good fellowe, hee sayd, 160

120 "My leader thou shalt be."

The first time Robin shot at the pricke,
He mist but an inch it froe:
The yeoman he was an archer good,
But he cold never shoote soe.

125 The second shoote had the wightye yeman, He shote within the garlande¹
But Robin he shott far better than hee,
For he clave the good pricke wande.

130 "A blessing upon thy heart," he sayd,
"Good fellowe, thy shooting is goode;
For an thy hart be as good as thy hand, Thou wert better then Robin Hood.

"Now tell me thy name, good fellowe," sayd he,

"Under the leaves of lyne "²

135 "Nay by my faith," quoth bolde Robin,
"Till thou have told me thine "

"I dwell by dale and downe," quoth hee,
"And Robin to take lme sworne,
And when I am called by my right name
I am Guye of good Gisborne "

"My dwelling is in this wood," sayes
Robin,

"By thee I set right nought
I am Robin Hood of Barnesdale, Whom thou so long hast sought "

145 He that had neither beene kith nor kin, Might have seene a full fayre sight,
To see how together these veomen went With blades both browne and bright.

To see how these veomen together they fought

150 Two howres of a summers day.
Yett neither Robin Hood nor Sir Guy Them fettled to flye away

Robin was reachles³ on a roote,
And stumbled at that tyde;⁴

155 And Guy was quick and nimble with-all,
And hitt him ore the left side

Robin thought on our ladye deere,
And soone leapt up againe,
And strait he came with a backward¹ stroke,
And he Sir Guy hath slayne

165 He took Sir Guyes head by the hayre, And stuck itt upon his bowes end
"Thou hast beene a traytor all thy life, Which thing must have an ende."

170 Robin pulled forth an Irish kniffe,
And nicked Sir Guy in the face,
That he was never on woman born, Cold tell whose head it was Saies, "Lye there, lye there, now Sir Guye,

And with me be not wrothe, 175 If thou have had the worst strokes at my hand,
Thou shalt have the better clothe "

Robin did off his gowne of greene,
And on Sir Guy did throwe,
And hee put on that capull-hyde, 180 That cladd him topp to toe

"The bowe, the arrowes, and litle horne.
Now with me I will beare,
For I will away to Barnèsdale,
To see how my men doe fare "

185 Robin Hood sett Guyes horne to his mouth.
And a loud blast in it did blow,
That beheard the sheriffe of Nottingham.
As he leaned under a lowe.⁴

"Hearken, hearken," sayd the sheriffe, 190 "I heare now tydings good,
For yonder I heare Sir Guyes horne blowe.
And he hath slaine Robin Hoode.

"Yonder I heare Sir Guyes horne blowe, Itt blowes soe well in tyde, 195 And yonder comes that wightye yeoman.
Cladd in his capull-hyde

"Come hyther, come hyther, thou good Sir Guy,
Aske what thou wilt of mee "
"O I will none of thy gold," sayd Robin, 200 "Nor I will none of thy fee "

"But now I have slaine the master," he sayes,
"Let me goe strike the knave;

For this is all the rewarde I aske; Nor noe other will I have."

205 "Thou art a madman," said the sheriffe,
"Thou sholdst have had a knightes fee
But seeing thy asking hath beene soe bad, Well granted it shale be "

When Little John heard his master speake, 210 Well knewe he it was his steven.¹
"Now shall I be looset," quoth Little John,
"With Christ his might in heaven."

Fast Robin hee hyed him to Little John,
He thought to loose him helve,² 215 The sheriffe and all his companye Fast after him can drive

"Stand abacke, stand abacke," sayd Robin,
"Why draw you mee soe neere?
Itt was never the use in our countrye, 220 Ones shrift another shold heere "

But Robin pulled forth an Irysh knife.
And losed John hand and foote,
And gave him Sir Guyes bow into his hand,
And bade it be his boote

225 Then John he took Guyes bow in his hand, His boltes and arrowes eche one When the sheriffe saw Little John bend his bow,
He fettled him to be gone

Towards his house in Nottingham towne 230 He fled full fast away,
And soe did all his companye
Not one behind wold stay

But he cold neither runne soe fast, Nor away soe fast cold ryde, 235 But Little John with an arrowe soe broad He shott him into the backe-syde

SIR PATRICK SPENCE

The king sits in Dumferling toune, Drinking the blude-reid wine
"O quhar⁵ will I get guid sailòr, To sail this schip of mine?"

5 Up and spak an eldern knicht, Sat at the kings richt kne.
"Sir Patrick Spence is the best sailòr, That sails upon the se "

The king has written a braid⁶ letter, 10 And signd it w¹ his hand,
And sent it to Sir Patrick Spence,
Was walking on the sand.

The first line that Sir Patrick red,
A loud lauch⁷ lauched he:
15 The next line that Sir Patrick red,
The teir blinded his ee.

"O quha⁸ is this has don this deid,
This ill deid don to me,
To send me out this time o' the zen,⁹

"Mak hast, mak haste, my mirry men all, Our guid schip sails the morne;"
"O say na sae, my master deir,
For I feir a deadlie storme.

25 "Late, late yestreen I saw the new moone, W¹ the auld moone in hir arme,
And I feir, I feir, my deir mastèr,
That we will com to harme."

EDOM O' GORDON

It fell about the Martinmas, Quhen⁵ the wind blew schril and cauld,
Said Edom o' Gordon to his men,
"We maun draw to a hauld"⁶

5 "And quhat⁷ a hauld sall we draw till,
My mirry men and me?"
"We wul gae to the house o' the Rodes, To see that fair ladie."

LORD THOMAS AND FAIR ELLINOR

Lord Thomas he was a bold forestèr,
And a chaser of the kings deere,
Faure Ellinor was a fine woman,
And Lord Thomas he loved her deare.

7 "Come riddle my riddle, dear mother," he sayd,
"And riddle us both as one,⁶ Whether I shall marrye with faure Ellinor, And let the browne girl alone?"

"The browne girl she has got houses and
land, 10 Faure Ellinor she has got none,

¹ strong ² are able ³ field
⁴ sorrowful

⁵ avenged
⁶ let us solve it together

And therefore I charge thee on my blessing,
To bring me the browne girl home."

And as it befelle on a high holidaye,
As many there are beaide, 15 Lord Thomas he went to faire Ellinor, That should have been his bride.

And when he came to fair Ellinors bower,
He knocked there at the ring,¹
And who was so readye as faire Ellinor.
20 To let Lord Thomas withinn

"What newes, what newes, Lord Thomas?"
she sayd,
"What newes dost thou bring to mee?"
"I am come to bid thee to my wedding, And that is bad newes for thee"

25 "O God forbid, Lord Thomas," she sayd,
"That such a thing should be done,
I thought to have been the bride my selfe,
And thou to have been the bridegroome"

"Come riddle my riddle, dear mother,"
she sayd,

30 "And riddle it all in one, Whether I shall goe to Lord Thomas his wedding,
Or whether shall tarry at home?"

"There are manye that are your friendes, daughtèr,
And manye a one your foe,

35 Therefore I charge you on my blessing.
To Lord Thomas his wedding don't goe"

"There are manye that are my friendes, mothèr,

But were every one my foe,
Betide me life, betide me death, 40 To Lord Thomas his wedding I'd
goe"

She cloathed herself in gallant attire,
And her merrye men all in greene;
And as they rid through every towne,
They took her to be some queene

45 But when she came to Lord Thomas his gate,
She knocked there at the ring;
And who was so readye as Lord Thomàs, To lett fair Ellinor in

"Is this your bride?" fair Ellinor sayd;

50 "Methinks she looks wonderous browne;

¹ hammer of the door knocker

Thou mightest have had as faire a woman,
As ever trod on the grounde"

"Despise her not, fair Ellin," he sayd,
"Despise her not unto mee;
55 For better I love thy little finger, Than all her whole bodèe."

This browne bride had a little penknife,
That was both long and sharpe,
And betwixt the short ribs and the long.
60 She prick'd faire Ellinor's harte.

"O Christ thee save," Lord Thomas, hee sayd,
"Methinks thou lookst wonderous wan;
Thou usedst to look with as fiesh a colour.
As ever the sun shone on"

65 "Oh, art thou blind, Lord Thomas?"
she sayd,
"Or canst thou not very well see?"
Oh! dost thou not see my owne heart's bloode Run trickling down my knee?"

Lord Thomas he had a sword by his side; 70 As he walked about the halle, He cut off his brides head from her shoulders,
And threw it against the walle

He set the hilt against the grounde,
And the point against his harte 75 There never three lovers together did meete, That sooner againe did parte.

JAMES BEATTIE (1735-1803)

RETIREMENT

1758

When in the crimson cloud of even The lingering light decays,
And Hesper on the front of heaven
His glittering gem displays; 5 Deep in the silent vale, unseen, Beside a lulling stream,
A pensive Youth, of placid mien, Indulged this tender theme.

"Ye cliffs, in hoary grandeur piled 10 High o'er the glimmering dale; Ye woods, along whose windings wild Murmurs the solemn gale:
Where Melancholy strays forlorn,
And Woe retires to weep, 15 What time the wan Moon's yellow horn Gleams on the western deep!

"To you, ye wastes, whose artless charms
 Ne'er drew Ambition's eye,
 'Scaped¹ a tumultuous world's alarms, 20 To your retreats I fly.
 Deep in your most sequester'd bower
 Let me at last recline,
 Where Solitude, mild, modest power, Leans on her ivied shrine.
 25 "How shall I woo thee, matchless fair?
 Thy heavenly smile how win?
 Thy smile that smooths the brow of Care,
 And stills the storm within.
 O wilt thou to thy favorite grove 30 Thine ardent votary bring,
 And bless his hours, and bid them move Serene, on silent wing?
 "Oft let Remembrance soothe his mind With dreams of former days, 35 When, in the lap of Peace reclined, He framed his infant lays,
 When Fancy roved at large, nor Care Nor cold Distrust alarm'd, Nor Envy, with malignant glare, 40 His simple youth had harm'd
 "'Twas then, O Solitude, to thee
 His early vows were paid,
 From heart sincere, and warm, and free,
 Devoted to the shade.
 45 Ah! why did Fate his steps decoy
 In stormy paths to roam, Remote from all congenial joy?—
 O take the wanderer home!
 "Thy shades, thy silence, now be mine, 50 Thy charms my only theme,
 My haunt the hollow cliff, whose pine Waves o'er the gloomy stream, Whence the scared owl on pinions grav Breaks from the rustling boughs, 55 And down the lone vale sails away
 To more profound repose.
 "Oh, while to thee the woodland pours Its wildly-warbling song,
 And balmy from the banks of flowers 60 The Zephyr breathes along, Let no rude sound invade from far,
 No vagrant foot be nigh,
 No ray from Grandeur's gilded car Flash on the startled eye 65 "But if some pilgrim through the glade Thy hallow'd bowers explore,
 O guard from harm his hoary head,
 And listen to his lore;
¹ escaped from

For he of joys divine shall tell, 70 That wean from earthly woe,
 And triumph o'er the mighty spell That chains this heart below

"For me no more the path invites Ambition loves to tread; 75 No more I climb those toilsome heights,
 By guileful Hope misled;
 Leaps my fond fluttering heart no more To Mirth's enlivening strain,
 For present pleasure soon is o'er, 80 And all the past is vain "

THE MINSTREL, OR, THE PROGRESS OF GENIUS

1766 71 1771

From Book I

Ah! who can tell how hard it is to climb
 The steep where Fame's proud temple shines afar?
 Ah! who can tell how many a soul
 sublime
 Has felt the influence of malignant star, 5 And waged with Fortune an eternal war—
 Check'd by the scoff of Pride, by Envy's frown,
 And Poverty's unconquerable bar—In life's low vale remote has pined
 alone,
 Then dropp'd into the grave, unpitied and unknown?
 10 And yet the languor of inglorious days,
 Not equally oppressive is to all, Him who ne'er listen'd to the voice of
 praise,
 The silence of neglect can ne'er appal.
 There are, who, deaf to mad Ambition's call, 15 Would shrink to hear th' obstreperous trump of Fame,
 Supremely blest, if to their portion
 fall Health, competence, and peace Nor higher aim
 Had he whose simple tale these artless lines proclaim The rolls of fame I will not now
 explore;
 20 Nor need I here describe, in learned lay,

How forth the Minstrel far'd in days
 of yore,
 Right glad of heart, though homely in array,
 His waving locks and beard all hoary
 gray;
 While from his bending shoulder, decent hung 25 His harp, the sole companion of his
 way,
 Which to the whistling wild responsive
 rung:
 And ever as he went some merry lay he sung.

Fret not thyself, thou glittering child of pride,
 That a poor villager inspires my
 strain,
 30 With thee let Pageantry and Power abide
 The gentle Muses haunt the sylvan
 reign,
 Where through wild groves at eve the lonely swain Enraptured roams, to gaze on Nature's charms
 They hate the sensual and scorn the
 vain, 35 The parasite their influence never warms, Nor him whose sordid soul the love of gold alarms

Though richest hues the peacock's plumes adorn,
 Yet horror screams from his discordant throat Rise, sons of harmony, and hail the
 morn, 40 While warbling larks on russet pinions float
 Or seek at noon the woodland scene
 remote,
 Where the gray linnets carol from the hill
 Oh, let them ne'er, with artificial note,
 To please a tyrant, strain the little bill, 45 But sing what Heaven inspires, and wander where they will'

Liberal, not lavish, is kind Nature's
 hand;
 Nor was perfection made for man
 below;
 Yet all her schemes with nicest art are plann'd;

Good counteracting ill, and gladness
 woe.
 50 With gold and gems if Chilian mountains glow;
 If bleak and barren Scotia's hills arise;
 There plague and poison, lust and rapine grow;
 Here, peaceful are the vales, and pure the skies,
 And Freedom fires the soul, and spar-kles in the eyes.

55 Then grieve not, thou, to whom th' indulgent Muse
 Vouchsafes a portion of celestial fire; Nor blame the partial Fates, if they refuse
 Th' imperial banquet and the rich attire.
 Know thine own worth, and reverence
 the lyre.
 60 Wilt thou debase the heart which God refined?
 No, let thy heaven-taught soul to Heaven aspire,
 To fancy, freedom, harmony resign'd; Ambition's grovelling crew forever left behind.

'Canst thou forego the pure ethereal
 soul
 65 In each fine sense so exquisitely keen,
 On the dull couch of Luxury to loll, Stung with disease, and stupefied with spleen;
 Fain to implore the aid of Flattery's screen,
 Even from thyself thy loathsome heart to hide 70 (The mansion then no more of joy serene).
 Where fear, distrust, malevolence
 abide,
 And impotent desire, and disappointed
 pride?

Oh, how canst thou renounce the boundless store
 Of charms which Nature to her votary yields?
 75 The warbling woodland, the resounding shore,
 The pomp of groves, and garniture of
 fields;
 All that the genial ray of morning
 gilds,
 And all that echoes to the song of even,

- All that the mountain's sheltering bosom shields, 80 And all the dread magnificence of
heaven,
Oh, how canst thou renounce, and hope to be forgiven?
- These charms shall work thy soul's 165
eternal health,
And love, and gentleness, and joy impart
But these thou must renounce, if lust of wealth
85 E'er win its way to thy corrupted
heart
For, ah! it poisons like a scorpion's dart;
Prompting th' ungenerous wish, the 170 selfish scheme,
The stern resolve, unmoved by pity's smart,
The troublous day, and long distress-ful dream 90 Return, my roving Muse, resume thy purposed theme
- There lived in Gothic days,¹ as legends tell,
A shepherd swain, a man of low de- 175 gree.
Whose sires, perchance, in Fairyland might dwell,
Sicilian groves, or vales of Arcady.
95 But he, I ween, was of the north country,²
A nation famed for song, and beauty's
charms;
Zealous, yet modest, innocent, though 180
free;
Patient of toil serene amidst alarms.
Inflexible in faith: invincible in arms
- 100 The shepherd swain of whom I mention made,
On Scotia's mountains fed his little
flock,
The sickle, scythe, or plough he never sway'd;
An honest heart was almost all his 185
stock;
His drink the living water from the rock, 105 The milky dams supplied his board, and lent
Their kindly fleece to baffle winter's shock,
- And he, though oft with dust and sweat besprent,
Did guide and guard their wanderings, wheresoe'er they went
.
And oft he traced the uplands, to survey,
When o'er the sky advanced the kindling dawn,
The crimson cloud, blue main, and mountain gray,
And lake, dim-gleaming on the smoky lawn
Far to the west the long, long vale withdrawn,
Where twilight loves to linger for a while,
And now he faintly kens the bounding fawn,
And villager abroad at early toil But, lo! the sun appears, and heaven, earth, ocean smile!
- And oft the craggy cliff he loved to
climb,
When all in mist the world below was lost What dreadful pleasure! there to stand sublime,
Like shipwreck'd mariner on desert
coast,
And view the enormous waste of vapor, toss'd
In billows, lengthening to th' horizon
round,
Now scoop'd in gulfs, with mountains now emboss'd!
And hear the voice of Mirth and Song rebound, Flocks, herds, and waterfalls, along the hoar profound!
- In truth he was a strange and wayward wight,
Fond of each gentle and each dreadful scene
In darkness, and in storm, he found
delight,
Nor less than when on ocean-wave
serene
The southern sun diffused his dazzling shene,
Even sad vicissitude amused his soul;
And if a sigh would sometimes intervene,
And down his cheek a tear of pity roll, 190 A sigh, a tear, so sweet, he wish'd not to control

² The "North Country" was the traditional dwelling place of fairies, demons, giants, etc.

280 When the long-sounding curfew from afar
 Loaded with loud lament the lonely
 gale,
 Young Edwin, lighted by the evening 310
 star, Languing and listening, wander'd down the vale
 There would he dream of graves, and corse pale.
 285 And ghosts that to the charnel-dungeon throng,
 And drag a length of clanking chain,
 and wail,
 Till silenced by the owl's terrific
 song,
 Or blast that shrieks by fits the shuddering isles along

 Oh, when the setting moon, in crimson died, 290 Hung o'er the dark and melancholy
 deep,
 To haunted stream, remote from man, he fled, 320
 Where fays of yore their revels wont to keep,
 And there let fancy rove at large, till
 sleep
 A vision brought to his entranced
 sight 295 And first, a wildly murmuring wind
 'gan creep
 Shull to his ringing ear, then tapers
 bright, 325
 With instantaneous gleam, illumed the vault of night

 Anon in view a portal's blazon'd
 arch
 Arose, the trumpet bids the valves unfold,
 300 And forth an host of little warriors march,
 Grasping the diamond lance and targe 330 of gold
 Their look was gentle, their demeanor bold,
 And green then helms, and green their silk attire,
 And here and there, right venerably
 old, 305 The long-rob'd minstrels wake the warbling wire,
 And some with mellow breath the martial pipe inspire 335

 With merriment and song and timbrels
 clear,

A troop of dames from myrtle bowers advance,
 The little warriors doff the targe and spear,
 And loud enlivening strains provoke the dance.
 They meet, they dart away, they wheel
 askance;
 To right, to left, they thrud the flying
 maze,
 Now bound aloft with vigorous spring, then glance
 Rapid along with many-color'd rays 315 Of tapers, gems, and gold, the echoing forests blaze

 The dream is fled Proud harbinger
 of day,
 Who scar'd 'st the vision with thy clarion shrill.
 Fell chanticleer! who oft hath reit
 away
 My fancied good, and brought substantial ill!
 320 O to thy cursed scream, discordant
 still,
 Let Harmony ave shut her gentle ear Thy boastful mirth let jealous rivals spill,
 Insult thy crest, and glossy pinions
 tear,
 And ever in thy dreams the ruthless fox
 appear!

 Forbear, my Muse Let Love attune thy line.
 Revoke the spell Thine Edwin flets not so
 For how should he at wicked chance repine
 Who feels from every change amusement flow?
 Even now his eyes with smiles of rapture glow,
 As on he wanders through the scenes of morn,
 Where the fresh flowers in living lustre
 blow,
 Where thousand pearls the dewy lawns adorn,
 A thousand notes of joy in every breeze are born

 But who the melodies of morn can tell?
 The wild brook babbling down the mountain side,
 The lowing herd, the sheep-fold's simple bell,

- The pipe of early shepherd dim described
In the lone valley; echoing far and 475
wide,
The clamorous horn along the cliffs above;
- 340 The hollow murmur of the ocean-tide:
The hum of bees, the linnet's lay of
love,
And the full choir that wakes the universal grove
- The cottage curs at early pilgrim bark: Crown'd with her pail the tripping 480 milkmaid sings;
- 345 The whistling ploughman stalks afield;
and hark!
Down the rough slope the ponderous wagon rings;
Through rustling corn the hare astonish'd springs,
Slow tolls the village clock the drowsy
hour;
- The partridge bursts away on whir- 485 ring wings,
- 350 Deep mourns the turtle¹ in sequester'd
bower,
And shrill lark carols clear from her aërial tower
- O Nature, how in every charm supreme!
Whose votaries feast on raptures ever 490
new!
- 355 O for the voice and fire of seraphim,
To sing thy glories with devotion due!
Blest be the day I 'scaped the wrangling crew,
From Pyrrho's maze, and Epicurus' sty;
And held high converse with the god-like few,
Who to th' enraptur'd heart, and ear, 495 and eye,
- 360 Teach beauty, virtue, truth, and love, and melody.
- Oft when the winter storm had cea-^d 515 to rave,
- 470 He roam'd the snowy waste at even.
to view
The cloud stupendous, from th' Atlantic wave
High-towering, sail along th' horizon
blue;
Where, midst the changeful scenery, ever new, 520
- Fancy a thousand wondrous forms
descries,
More wildly great than ever pencil
drew,— Rocks, torrents, gulfs, and shapes of giant size,
And glitt'ring cliffs on cliffs, and fiery ramparts rise.
- Thence musing onward to the sounding
shore,
The lone enthusiast oft would take his
way,
Listening, with pleasing dread, to the deep roar
Of the wide-weltering waves In black
array,
When sulphurous clouds roll'd on th'
autumnal day,
Even then he hasten'd from the haunt of man,
Along the trembling wilderness to stray,
What time the lightning's fierce career began,
And o'er Heav'n's rending arch the rattling thunder ran
- Responsive to the lively pipe, when all In sprightly dance the village youth were join'd,
Edwin, of melody aye held in thrall,
From the rude gambol far remote reclin'd, Sooth'd with the soft notes warbling in the wind,
Ah! then all jollity seem'd noise and folly,
To the pure soul by Fancy's fire re-
fin'd;
Ah! what is mirth but turbulence unholy,
When with the charm compar'd of heavenly melancholy?
- Meanwhile, whate'er of beautiful, or
new,
Sublime, or dreadful, in earth, sea, or sky,
By chance, or search, was offer'd to his view,
He scan'd with curious and romantic
eye.
Whate'er of lore tradition could supply From Gothic tale, or song, or fable
old,
Rous'd him, still keen to listen and to pry.

At last, though long by penury con-troll'd
And solitude, his soul her graces 'gan unfold.

Thus on the chill Lapponian's dreary
land,
For many a long month lost in snow
profound,
525 When Sol from Cancer sends the season bland,
And in their northern caves the storms are bound,
From silent mountains, straight, with startling sound, Torrents are hurl'd; green hills emerge, and, lo!
The trees are foliage, cliffs with flowers are crown'd,
530 Pure rills through vales of verdure warbling go,
And wonder, love, and joy, the peasant's heart o'erflow.

Here pause, my Gothic lyre, a little
while,
The leisure hour is all that thou canst
claim
But on this verse if Montagu should smile,
535 New strains ere long shall animate thy frame.
And her applause to me is more than
fame,
For still with truth accords her taste
refin'd
At lucre or renown let others aim,
I only wish to please the gentle
mind,

WILLIAM BECKFORD (1759-1844)

From THE HISTORY OF THE CALIPH-VATHEK

1783

1786

Vathek, ninth Caliph of the race of the Abassides, was the son of Motassem, and the grandson of Haroun Al Raschid. From an early accession to the throne, and 5 the talents he possessed to adorn it, his subjects were induced to expect that his reign would be long and happy. His figure was pleasing and majestic, but when he was angry one of his eyes became so 10 terrible, that no person could bear to behold it, and the wretch upon whom it was fixed instantly fell backward, and sometimes expired. For fear, however, of depopulating his dominions and making his palace desolate, he but rarely gave way to his anger.

Being much addicted to women and the pleasures of the table, he sought by his affa-bility to procure agreeable companions, and he succeeded the better as his generosity was unbounded, and his indulgences unrestrained, for he was by no means scrupulous, nor did he think with the Caliph Omar Ben Abdalaziz, that it was necessary to make a hell of this world to enjoy Paradise in the next

15 He surpassed in magnificence all his predecessors. The palace of Alkoremmi, which his father Motassem had erected on the hill of Pied Hoises, and which commanded the whole city of Samarah, was in his idea far too scanty, he added, therefore, five wings, or rather other palaces, which he destined for the particular gratification of each of his senses

In the first of these were tables continually covered with the most exquisite dainties, which were supplied both by night and by day according to their constant consumption, whilst the most delicious wines and the choicest cordials flowed forth from a hundred fountains that were never exhausted. This palace was called "The Eternal or Unsatiating Banquet"

The second was styled "The Temple of Melody, or the Nectar of the Soul" 25 It was inhabited by the most skilful musicians and admired poets of the time, who not only displayed their talents within, but, dispersing in bands without, caused every surrounding scene to reverberate their songs, which were continually varied in the most delightful succession

The palace named "The Delight of the Eyes, or the Support of Memory," was one entire enchantment. Rarities collected from every corner of the earth were there found in such profusion as to dazzle and confound, but for the order in which they were arranged. One gallery exhibited the pictures of the celebrated Mami, and statues that seemed to be alive. Here a well-managed perspective attracted the sight, there the magic of optics agreeably deceived it:
whilst the naturalist on his part exhibited, 55 in their several classes, the various gifts that Heaven had bestowed on our globe.
In a word, Vathek omitted nothing in this palace that might gratify the curiosity of those who resorted to it, although he was not able to satisfy his own, for he was of all men the most curious.

"The Palace of Perfumes," which was termed likewise "The Incentive to Pleasure," consisted of various halls where the different perfumes which the earth produces were kept perpetually burning in censers of gold. Flambeaus and aromatic lamps were here lighted in open day. But the too powerful effects of this agreeable delirium might be avoided by descending into an immense garden, where an assemblage of every fragrant flower diffused through the air the purest odours.

The fifth palace, denominated "The Retreat of Joy, or the Dangerous," was frequented by troops of young females beautiful as the hours¹ and not less seducing, who never failed to receive with caresses all whom the Caliph allowed to approach them, for he was by no means disposed to be jealous, as his own women were secluded within the palace he inhabited himself.

Notwithstanding the sensuality in which Vathek indulged, he experienced no abatement in the love of his people, who thought that a sovereign immersed in pleasure was not less tolerable to his subjects than one that employed himself in creating them foes. But the inquiet and impetuous disposition of the Caliph would not allow him to rest there, he had studied so much for his amusement in the lifetime of his father, as to acquire a great deal of knowledge, though not a sufficiency to satisfy himself, for he wished to know everything, even sciences that did not exist. He was fond of engaging in disputes with the learned, but liked them not to push their opposition with warmth, he stopped the mouths of those with presents whose mouths could be stopped, whilst others, whom his liberality was unable to subdue, he sent to prison to cool their blood, a remedy that often succeeded.

Vathek discovered also a predilection for theological controversy, but it was not with the orthodox that he usually held. By this means he induced the zealots to oppose him, and then persecuted them in return; for he resolved at any rate to have reason on his side.

The great prophet Mahomet, whose vicars the caliphs are, beheld with indignation from his abode in the seventh heaven the irreligious conduct of such a viceregent "Let us leave him to himself," said he to the Genii,¹ who are always ready to receive his commands; "let us see to what lengths his folly and impiety will carry him; if he runs into excess we shall know how to chastise him. Assist him, therefore, to complete the tower which, in imitation of Nimrod, he hath begun, not, like that great warrior, to escape being drowned, but from the insolent curiosity of penetrating the secrets of Heaven; he will not divine the fate that awaits him."

The Genii obeyed, and when the workmen had raised their structure a cubit in the day time, two cubits more were added in the night. The expedition with which the fabric arose was not a little flattering to the vanity of Vathek. He fancied that even insensible matter showed a forwardness to subserve his designs, not considering that the successes of the foolish and wicked form the first rod of their chastisement.

His pride arrived at its height when, having ascended for the first time the eleven thousand stairs of his tower, he cast his eyes below and beheld men not larger than pygmies, mountains than shells, and cities than beehives. The idea which such an elevation inspired of his own grandeur completely bewildered him; he was almost ready to adore himself, till, lifting his eyes upward, he saw the stars as high above him as they appeared when he stood on the surface of the earth. He consoled himself, however, for this transient perception of his littleness, with the thought of being great in the eyes of others, and flattered himself that the light of his mind would extend beyond the reach of his sight, and transfer to the stars the decrees of his destiny.

With this view the inquisitive Prince passed most of his nights at the summit of his tower, till he became an adept in the mysteries of astrology, and imagined that the planets had disclosed to him the most marvellous adventures, which were to be accomplished by an extraordinary personage from a country altogether unknown. Prompted by motives of curiosity he had always been courteous to strangers, but from this instant he redoubled his attention, and ordered it to be announced by sound of trumpet, through all the streets of Samarah that no one of his subjects, on peril of displeasure, should either lodge or detain a traveller, but forthwith bring him to the palace.

Not long after this proclamation there arrived in his metropolis a man so hideous that the very guards who arrested him were forced to shut their eyes as they led him along. The Caliph himself appeared startled at so horrible a visage, but joy succeeded to this emotion of terror when the stranger displayed to his view such rarities as he had never before seen, and of which he had no conception.

In reality nothing was ever so extraordinary as the merchandize this stranger produced, most of his curiosities, which were not less admirable for their workmanship than splendor, had besides, their several virtues described on a parchment fastened to each. There were slippers which enabled the feet to walk; knives that cut without the motion of a hand; sabres which dealt the blow at the person they were wished to strike, and the whole enriched with gems that were hitherto unknown.

The sabres, whose blades emitted a dazzling radiance, fixed more than all the Caliph's attention, who promised himself to decipher at his leisure the uncouth characters engraven on their sides. Without, therefore, demanding their price, he ordered all the coined gold to be brought from his treasury, and commanded the merchant to take what he pleased, the stranger complied with modesty and silence.

Vathek, imagining that the merchant's taciturnity was occasioned by the awe which his presence inspired, encouraged him to advance, and asked him, with an air of condescension, who he was, whence he came, and where he obtained such beautiful commodities. The man, or rather monster, instead of making a reply, thrice rubbed his forehead, which, as well as his body, was blacker than ebony, four times clapped his paunch, the projection of which was enormous, opened wide his huge eyes, which glowed like firebrands, began to laugh with a hideous noise, and discovered his long amber-colored teeth bestreaked with green.

The Caliph, though a little startled, renewed his inquiries, but without being able to procure a reply; at which, beginning to be ruffled, he exclaimed: "Knowest thou, varlet, who I am? and at whom thou art aiming thy gibes?" Then, addressing his guards, "Have ye heard him speak? is he dumb?"

"He hath spoken," they replied, "though but little."

"Let him speak again then," said Vathek, "and tell me who he is, from whence he came, and where he procured these singular curiosities, or I swear by the ass of Balaam¹ that I will make him rue his pertinacity."

The menace was accompanied by the Caliph with one of his angry and perilous glances, which the stranger sustained without the slightest emotion, although his eyes were fixed on the terrible eye of the Prince.

No words can describe the amazement of the courtiers when they beheld this rude merchant withstand the encounter unshocked. They all fell prostrate with their faces on the ground to avoid the risk of their lives, and continued in the same abject posture till the Caliph exclaimed in a furious tone: "Up, cowards! seize the miscreant! see that he be committed to prison and guarded by the best of my soldiers! Let him, however, retain the money I gave him: it is not my intent to take from him his property. I only want him to speak."

No sooner had he uttered these words than the stranger was surrounded, pinnioned with strong fetters, and hurried away to the prison of the great tower, which was encompassed by seven empalements of iron bars, and armed with spikes in every direction longer and sharper than spits.

The Caliph, nevertheless, remained in the most violent agitation; he sat down indeed to eat, but of the three hundred covers that were daily placed before him could taste of no more than thirty-two. A diet to which he had been so little accustomed was sufficient of itself to prevent him from sleeping, what then must be its effect when joined to the anxiety that preyed upon his spirits? At the first glimpse of dawn he hastened to the prison, again to importune this intractable stranger; but the rage of Vathek exceeded all bounds on finding the prison empty, the gates burst asunder, and his guards lying lifeless around him. In the paroxysm of his passion he fell furiously on the poor carcases, and kicked them till evening without intermission. His courtiers and vizirs exerted their efforts to soothe his extravagance, but finding every expedient ineffectual they all united in one vociferation: "The Caliph is gone mad' the Caliph is out of his senses!"

This outcry, which soon resounded through the streets of Samarah, at length reaching the ears of Carathus, his mother, she flew in the utmost consternation to try her ascendancy on the mind of her son. Her tears and caresses called off his attention, and he was prevailed upon by her entreaties to be brought back to the palace.

Carathus, apprehensive of leaving Vathek to himself, caused him to be put to bed, and seating herself by him, endeavored by her conversation to heal and compose him. Nor could any one have attempted it with better success, for the Caliph not only loved her as a mother, but respected her as a person of superior genius; it was she who had induced him, being a Greek herself, to adopt all the sciences and systems of her country, which good Mussulmans hold in such thorough abhorrence. Judicial astrology¹ was one of those systems in which Carathus was a perfect adept; she began, therefore, with reminding her son of the promise which the stars had made him, and intimated an intention of consulting them again.

"Alas!" sighed the Caliph, as soon as he could speak, "what a fool have I been! not for the kicks bestowed on my guards who so tamely submitted to death, but for never considering that this extraordinary man was the same the planets had foretold, whom, instead of ill-treating, I should have conciliated by all the arts of persuasion."

"The past," said Carathus, "cannot be recalled, but it behoves us to think of the future; perhaps you may again see the object you so much regret; it is possible the inscriptions on the sabies will afford information. Eat, therefore, and take thy repose, my dear son, we will consider, tomorrow, in what manner to act."

Vathek yielded to her counsel as well as he could, and arose in the morning with a mind more at ease. The sabies he commanded to be instantly brought, and poring upon them through a green glass, that their glittering might not dazzle, he set himself in earnest to decipher the inscriptions; but his reiterated attempts were all of them nugatory, in vain did he beat his head and bite his nails, not a letter of the whole was he able to ascertain. So unlucky a disappointment would have undone him again, had not Carathus by good fortune entered the apartment.

"Have patience, son!" said she; "you certainly are possessed of every important science, but the knowledge of languages is a trifle at best, and the accomplishment of none but a pedant. Issue forth a proclamation that you will confer such rewards as become your greatness upon any one that shall interpret what you do not understand, and what it is beneath you to learn, you will soon find your curiosity gratified."

"That may be," said the Caliph; "but in the meantime I shall be horribly disgusted by a crowd of smatterers, who will come to the trial as much for the pleasure of retailing their jargon as from the hope of gaining the reward. To avoid this evil, it will be proper to add that I will put every candidate to death who shall fail to give satisfaction; for, thank heaven! I have skill enough to distinguish between one that translates and one that invents."

"Of that I have no doubt," replied Carathus, "but to put the ignorant to death is somewhat severe, and may be productive of dangerous effects. content yourself with commanding their beards to be burnt;—beards in a state are not quite so essential as men."

The Caliph submitted to the reasons of his mother, and sending for Morakanabad, his prime vizir, said "Let the common cries proclaim, not only in Samarah, but throughout every city in my empire, that whosoever will repair hither and decipher certain characters which appear to be inexplicable, shall experience the liberality for which I am renowned, but that all who fail upon trial shall have their beards burnt off to the last hair. Let them add also that I will bestow fifty beautiful slaves, and as many jars of apricots from the isle of Kirmith, upon any man that shall bring me intelligence of the stranger."

The subjects of the Caliph, like their sovereign, being great admirers of women and apricots from Kirmith, felt their mouths water at these promises, but were totally unable to gratify their hankering, for no one knew which way the stranger had gone.

As to the Caliph's other requisition, the result was different. The learned, the half-learned, and those who were neither, but fancied themselves equal to both, came boldly to hazard their beards, and all shamefully lost them.

The exaction of these forfeitures, which ¹ A pseudo-science concerned with foretelling the future of nations and individuals, from observation of the stars.

¹ From the earliest times, among the Mohammedans, the loss of the beard was regarded as highly disgraceful.

found sufficient employment for the eunuchs, gave them such a smell of singed hair as greatly to disgust the ladies of the seraglio, and make it necessary that this new occupation of their guardians should be transferred into other hands.

At length, however, an old man presented himself whose beard was a cubit and a half longer than any that had appeared before him. The officers of the palace whispered to each other, as they ushered him in, "What a pity such a beard should be burnt!" Even the Caliph, when he saw it, concurred with them in opinion, but his concern was entirely needless. This venerable personage read the characters with facility, and explained them verbatim as follows: "We were made where every thing good is made. we are the least of the wonders of a place where all is wonderful, and deserving the sight of the first potentate on earth."

"You translate admirably!" cried Vathek, "I know to what these marvellous characters allude. Let him receive as many robes of honor and thousands of sequins¹ of gold as he hath spoken words. I am in some measure relieved from the perplexity that embarrassed me!"

Vathek invited the old man to dine, and even to remain some days in the palace. Unluckily for him he accepted the offer; for the Caliph, having ordered him next morning to be called, said: "Read again to me what you have read already. I cannot hear too often the promise that is made me, the completion of which I languish to obtain."

The old man forthwith put on his green spectacles, but they instantly dropped from his nose on perceiving the characters he had read the day preceding had given place to others of different import.

"What ails you?" asked the Caliph. "and why these symptoms of wonder?"

"Sovereign of the world," replied the old man, "these sabres hold another language today from that they yesterday held."

"How say you?" returned Vathek—"but it matters not! tell me, if you can, what they mean."

"It is this, my Lord," rejoined the old man. "Woe to the rash mortal who seeks to know that of which he should remain ignorant, and to undertake that which surpasseth his power!"

"And woe to thee!" cried the Caliph, in a burst of indignation; "today thou art void of understanding; begone from my presence, they shall burn but the half of thy beard, because thou wert yesterday fortunate in guessing;—my gifts I never resume."

The old man, wise enough to perceive he had luckily escaped, considering the folly of disclosing so disgusting a truth, immediately withdrew and appeared not again.

But it was not long before Vathek discovered abundant reason to regret his precipitation, for though he could not decipher the characters himself, yet by constantly poring upon them he plainly perceived that they every day changed, and unfortunately no other candidate offered to explain them. This perplexing occupation inflamed his blood, dazzled his sight, and brought on a giddiness and debility that he could not support. He failed not, however, though in so reduced a condition, to be often carried to his tower, as he flattered himself that he might there read in the stars which he went to consult something more congenial to his wishes: but in this his hopes were deluded, for his eyes, dimmed by the vapors of his head, began to subserve his curiosity so ill, that he beheld nothing but a thick dun cloud, which he took for the most dreadful of omens.

Agitated with so much anxiety, Vathek entirely lost all firmness, a fever seized him, and his appetite failed. Instead of being one of the greatest eaters he became as distinguished for drinking. So insatiable was the thirst which tormented him, that his mouth, like a funnel, was always open to receive the various liquors that might be poured into it, and especially cold water, which calmed him more than every other.

This unhappy prince being thus incapacitated for the enjoyment of any pleasure, commanded the palaces of the five senses to be shut up, forbore to appear in public, either to display his magnificence or administer justice, and retired to the innermost apartment of his harem. As he had ever been an indulgent husband, his wives, overwhelmed with grief at his deplorable situation, incessantly offered their prayers for his health and unremittingly supplied him with water.

In the meantime the Princess Carathis, whose affliction no words can describe, instead of restraining herself to sobbing and tears, was closeted daily with the Vizir Morakanabad, to find out some cure or mitigation of the Caliph's disease. Under the persuasion that it was caused by enchantment, they turned over together, leaf by leaf, all the books of magic that might point out a remedy, and caused the horrible stranger, whom they accused as the enchanter, to be everywhere sought for with the strictest diligence.

At the distance of a few miles from Samarah stood a high mountain, whose sides were swarmed with wild thyme and basil, and its summit overspread with so delightful a plain, that it might be taken for the paradise destined for the faithful. Upon it grew a hundred thickets of eglantine and other fragrant shrubs, a hundred arbors of roses, jessamine, and honeysuckle, as many clumps of orange trees, cedar, and citron, whose branches, interwoven with the palm, the pomegranate, and the vine, presented every luxury that could regale the eye or the taste. The ground was strewed with violets, harebells, and pansies, in the midst of which sprung forth tufts of jonquils, hyacinths, and carnations, with every other perfume that impregnates the air. Four fountains, not less clear than deep, and so abundant as to slake the thirst of ten armies, seemed profusely placed here to make the scene more resemble the garden of Eden, which was watered by the four sacred rivers.¹ Here the nightingale sang the birth of the rose, her well-beloved, and at the same time lamented its short-lived beauty, whilst the turtle² deplored the loss of more substantial pleasures, and the wakeful lark hailed the rising light that reanimates the whole creation. Here more than anywhere the mingled melodies of birds expressed the various passions they inspired, as if the exquisite fruits which they pecked at pleasure had given them a double energy.

To this mountain Vathek was sometimes brought for the sake of breathing a purer air, and especially to drink at will of the four fountains, which were reputed in the highest degree salubrious and sacred to himself. His attendants were his mother, his wives, and some eunuchs, who assiduously employed themselves in filling capacious bowls of rock crystal, and emulously presenting them to him, but it frequently happened that his avidity exceeded their zeal, inasmuch that he would prostrate himself upon the ground to lap up the water, of which he could never have enough.

One day when this unhappy prince had been long lying in so debasing a posture, a voice hoarse but strong, thus addressed him: "Why assumest thou the function of a dog, O Caliph, so proud of thy dignity and power?"

At this apostrophe he raised his head and beheld the stranger that had caused him so much affliction. Inflamed with anger at the sight, he exclaimed:

"Accursed Giaour!¹ what comest thou hither to do? is it not enough to have transformed a prince remarkable for his agility into one of those leather barrels which the Bedouin Arabs carry on their camels when they traverse the deserts? Perceivest thou not that I may perish by drinking to excess no less than by a total abstinence?"

"Drink then this draught," said the stranger, as he presented to him a phial of a red and yellow mixture, "and, to satiate the thirst of thy soul as well as of thy body, know that I am an Indian, but from a region of India which is wholly unknown."

The Caliph, delighted to see his desires accomplished in part, and flattering himself with the hope of obtaining their entire fulfilment, without a moment's hesitation swallowed the potion, and instantaneously found his health restored, his thirst appeased, and his limbs as agile as ever.

In the transports of his joy Vathek leaped upon the neck of the frightful Indian, and kissed his horrid mouth and hollow cheeks as though they had been the coral lips, and the lilies and roses of his most beautiful wives, whilst they, less terrified than jealous at the sight, dropped their veils to hide the blush of mortification that suffused their foreheads.

Nor would the scene have closed here, had not Carathis, with all the art of insinuation, a little repressed the raptures of her son. Having prevailed upon him to return to Samarah, she caused a herald to precede him, whom she commanded to proclaim as loudly as possible: "The wonderful stranger hath appeared again, he hath healed the Caliph, he hath spoken! he hath spoken!"

Forthwith all the inhabitants of this vast city quitted their habitations, and ran together in crowds to see the procession of Vathek and the Indian, whom they now blessed as much as they had before execrated, incessantly shouting: "He hath healed our sovereign, he hath spoken! he hath spoken!" Nor were these words forgotten in the public festivals which were celebrated the same evening, to testify the general joy; for the poets applied them as a chorus to all the songs they composed.

The Caliph, fired with the ambition of prescribing laws to the Intelligences of Darkness, was but little embarrassed at this dereliction; the impetuosity of his blood prevented him from sleeping, nor did he encamp any more as before. Nouronihar, whose impatience if possible exceeded his own, importuned him to hasten his march, and lavished on him a thousand caresses to beguile all reflection. She fancied herself already more potent than Balkis, and pictured to her imagination the Genn falling prostrate at the foot of her throne. In this manner they advanced by moonlight, till they came within view of the two towering rocks that form a kind of portal to the valley, at whose extremity rose the vast ruins of Istakhar. Aloft on the mountain glimmered the fronts of various royal mausoleums, the horror of which was deepened by the shadows of night. They passed through two villages almost deserted, the only inhabitants remaining being a few feeble old men, who at the sight of horses and litters, fell upon their knees and cried out

"O heaven! is it then by these phantoms that we have been for six months tormented? Alas! it was from the terror of these spectres and the noise beneath the mountains, that our people have fled, and left us at the mercy of maleficent spirits!"

The Caliph, to whom these complaints were but unpromising auguries, drove over the bodies of these wretched old men, and at length arrived at the foot of the terrace of black marble, there he descended from his litter, handing down Nouronihar; both with beating hearts stared wildly around them, and expected with an apprehensive shudder the approach of the Giaour; but nothing as yet announced his appearance.

A deathlike stillness reigned over the mountain and through the air, the moon dilated on a vast platform the shades of the lofty columns, which reached from the terrace almost to the clouds, the gloomy watch-towers, whose numbers could not be counted, were veiled by no roof, and their capitals, of an architecture unknown in the records of the earth, served as an asylum for the birds of darkness, which, alarmed at the approach of such visitants, fled away croaking.

The chief of the eunuchs, trembling with fear, besought Vathek that a fire might be kindled.

"No!" replied he, "there is no time left to think of such trifles, abide where thou art, and expect my commands."

Having thus spoken he presented his hand to Nouronihar, and, ascending the steps of a vast staircase, reached the terrace, which was flagged with squares of marble, and resembled a smooth expanse of water, upon whose surface not a leaf ever dared to vegetate. on the right rose the watch-towers, ranged before the ruins of an immense palace, whose walls were embossed with various figures, in front stood forth the colossal forms of four creatures, composed of the leopard and the griffin, and, though but of stone, inspired emotions of terror; near these were distinguished by the splendor of the moon, which streamed full on the place, characters like those on the sabres of the Giaour, that possessed the same virtue of changing every moment; these, after vacillating for some time, at last fixed in Arabic letters, and prescribed to the Caliph the following words.

"Vathek! thou hast violated the conditions of my parchment, and deservest to be sent back, but, in favor to thy companion, and as the need for what thou hast done to obtain it, Ebhis permitteth that the portal of his palace shall be opened, and the subterranean fire will receive thee into the number of its adorers."

He scarcely had read these words before the mountain against which the terrace was reared trembled, and the watch-towers were ready to topple headlong upon them, the rock yawned, and disclosed within it a staircase of polished marble that seemed to approach the abyss, upon each stair were planted two large torches, like those Nouronihar had seen in her vision, the camphorated vapor ascending from which gathered into a cloud under the hollow of the vault.

This appearance, instead of terrifying, gave new courage to the daughter of Fakreddin. Scarcely deigning to bid adieu to the moon and the firmament, she abandoned without hesitation the pure atmosphere to plunge into these infernal exhalations. The gait of those unpoisoned personages was haughty and determined, as they descended by the effulgence of the torches they gazed on each other with mutual admiration, and both appeared so resplendent, that they already esteemed themselves spiritual Intelligences, the only circumstance that perplexed them was then not arriving at the bottom of the stairs, on hastening their descent with an ardent impetuosity, they felt their steps accelerated to such a degree, that they seemed not walking, but falling from a precipice. Their progress, however, was at length impeded by a vast portal of ebony, which the Caliph without difficulty recognized; here the Giaour awaited them with the key in his hand.

"Ye are welcome," said he to them with a ghastly smile, "in spite of Mahomet and all his dependants. I will now admit you into that palace where you have so highly merited a place."

Whilst he was uttering these words he touched the enamelled lock with his key, and the doors at once expanded, with a noise still louder than the thunder of mountains, and as suddenly recoiled the moment they had entered.

The Caliph and Nouronihar beheld each other with amazement, at finding themselves in a place which, though roofed with a vaulted ceiling, was so spacious and lofty that at first they took it for an immeasurable plain. But their eyes at length growing familiar to the grandeur of the objects at hand, they extended their view to those at a distance, and discovered rows of columns and arcades, which gradually diminished till they terminated in a point, radiant as the sun when he darts his last beams athwart the ocean. the pavement, strewed over with gold dust and saffron, exhaled so subtle an odor as almost overpowered them, they, however, went on, and observed an infinity of censers, in which ambergris and the wood of aloes were continually burning. between the several columns were placed tables, each spread with a profusion of viands, and wines of every species sparkling in vases of crystal. A throng of Genni and other fantastic spirits of each sex danced lasciviously in troops, at the sound of music which issued from beneath

In the midst of this immense hall a vast multitude was incessantly passing, who severally kept their right hands on their hearts, without once regarding anything around them. they had all the livid paleness of death, their eyes, deep sunk in their sockets, resembled those phosphoric meteors that glimmer by night in places of interment. Some stalked slowly on, absorbed in profound reveries, some, shrieking with agony, ran furiously about, like tigers wounded with poisoned arrows, whilst others, grinding their teeth in rage, foamed along, more frantic than the wildest maniac. They all avoided each other, and, though surrounded by a multitude that no one could number, each wandered at random, unheeding of the rest, as if alone on a desert which no foot had trodden.

Vathek and Nouronihar, frozen with terror at a sight so baleful, demanded of the Giaour what these appearances might mean, and why these ambulating spectres never withdrew their hands from their hearts.

"Perplex not yourselves," replied he bluntly, "with so much at once, you will soon be acquainted with all, let us haste and present you to Eblis."

They continued then way through the multitude, but, notwithstanding their confidence at first, they were not sufficiently composed to examine with attention the various perspectives of halls and of galleries that opened on the right hand and left, which were all illuminated by torches and braziers, whose flames rose in pyramids to the centre of the vault. At length they came to a place where long curtains, brocaded with crimson and gold, fell from all parts in striking confusion; here the choirs and dances were heard no longer, the light which glimmered came from afar.

After some time Vathek and Nouronihar perceived a gleam brightening through the drapery, and entered a vast tabernacle carpeted with the skins of leopards, an infinity of elders with streaming beards, and Afrits¹ in complete armor, had prostrated themselves before the ascent of a lofty eminence on the top of which, upon a globe of fire, sat the formidable Eblis. His person was that of a young man, whose noble and regular features seemed to have been tarnished by malignant vapors, in his large eyes appeared both pride and despair, his flowing hair retained some resemblance to that of an angel of light, in his hand, which thunder had blasted, he swayed the iron sceptre that causes the monster Ouanabad, the Afrits, and all the powers of the abyss to tremble: at his presence the heart of the Caliph sunk within him, and for the first time, he fell prostrate on his face. Nouronihar, however, though greatly dismayed, could not help admiring the person of Eblis, for she expected to have seen some stupendous Giant Eblis, with a voice more mild than might be imagined, but such as transfused through the soul the deepest melancholy, said

"Creatures of clay, I receive you into mine empire, ye are numbered amongst my adorers, enjoy whatever this palace affords, the treasures of the pre-adamite Sultans, their bickering² sabres, and those talismans that compel the Dives to open the subterranean expanses of the mountain of Kaf, which communicate with these; there, insatiable as your curiosity may be, shall you find sufficient to gratify it; you shall possess the exclusive privilege of entering the fortress of Aberman, and the halls of Aigenk, where are portrayed all creatures endowed with intelligence, and the various animals that inhabited that earth prior to the creation of that contemptible being, whom ye denominate the Father of Mankind."

Vathek and Nouronihar, feeling themselves revived and encouraged by this harangue, eagerly said to the Giaour:

"Bring us instantly to the place which contains these precious talismans."

"Come!" answered this wicked Dive, with his malignant grin, "come!" and possess all that my Sovereign hath promised, and more."

He then conducted them into a long aisle adjoining the tabernacle, preceding them with hasty steps, and followed by his disciples with the utmost alacrity. They reached, at length, a hall of great extent, and covered with a lofty dome, around which appeared fifty portals of bronze, secured with as many fastenings of iron; a funereal gloom prevailed over the whole scene. Here, upon two beds of incorruptible cedar, lay recumbent the fleshless forms of the Pre-Adamite Kings, who had been monarchs of the whole earth; they still possessed enough of life to be conscious of their deplorable condition; their eyes retained a melancholy motion; they regarded each other with looks of the deepest dejection, each holding his right hand motionless on his heart; at their feet were inscribed the events of their several reigns, their power, their pride, and their crimes. Soliman Raad, Soliman Dakr, and Soliman Di Gian Ben Gian, who, after having chained up the Dives in the dark caverns of Kaf, became so presumptuous as to doubt of the Supreme Power; all these mantained great state, though not to be compared with the eminence of Soliman Ben Daoud.

This king, so renowned for his wisdom, was on the loftiest elevation, and placed immediately under the dome, he appeared to possess more animation than the rest, though from time to time he labored with profound sighs, and, like his companions, kept his right hand on his heart; yet his countenance was more composed, and he seemed to be listening to the sullen roar of a vast cataract, visible in part through the grated portals; this was the only sound that intruded on the silence of these doleful mansions. A range of brazen vases surrounded the elevation.

"Remove the covers from these cabalistic depositories," said the Giaour to Vathek, "and avail thyself of the talismans, which will break asunder all these gates of bronze, and not only render thee master of the treasures contained within them, but also of the spirits by which they are guarded."

The Caliph, whom this ominous preliminary had entirely disconcerted, approached the vases with faltering footsteps, and was ready to sink with terror when he heard the groans of Soliman. As he proceeded, a voice from the livid lips of the Prophet articulated these words:

"In my life-time I filled a magnificent throne, having on my right hand twelve thousand seats of gold, where the patriarchs and the prophets heard my doctrines; on my left the sages and doctors, upon as many thrones of silver, were present at all my decisions. Whilst I thus administered justice to innumerable multitude, the birds of the air librating over me served as a canopy from the rays of the sun; my people flourished, and my palace rose to the clouds. I erected a temple to the Most High, which was the wonder of the universe; but I basely suffered myself to be seduced by the love of women, and a curiosity that could not be restrained by sublunary things. I listened to the counsels of Aberman and the daughter of Pharaoh, and adored fire and the hosts of heaven. I forsook the holy city, and commanded the Genn to rear the stupendous palace of Istakhan, and the terrace of the watch-towers, each of which was consecrated to a star; there for a while I enjoyed myself in the zenith of glory and pleasure, not only men, but supernatural existences were subject also to my will. I began to think, as these unhappy monarchs around had already thought, that the vengeance of Heaven was asleep, when at once the thunder burst my structures asunder and precipitated me hither, where, however, I do not remain, like the other inhabitants, totally destitute of hope, for an angel of light hath revealed that, in consideration of the piety of my early youth, my woes shall come to an end when this cataract shall forever cease to flow; till then I am in torments, ineffable torments! an unrelenting fire preys on my heart."

Having uttered this exclamation Soliman raised his hands towards Heaven, in token of supplication, and the Caliph discerned through his bosom, which was transparent as crystal, his heart enveloped in flames. At a sight so full of horror Nouronihar fell balancing back, like one petrified, into the arms of Vathek, who cried out with a convulsive sob

"O Giaour! whither hast thou brought us? Allow us to depart, and I will relinquish all thou hast promised. O Mahomet! remains there no more mercy?"

"None! none!" replied the malicious Dive. "Know, miserable prince! thou art now in the abode of vengeance and despair, thy heart also will be kindled, like those of the other votaries of Eblis. A few days are allotted thee previous to this fatal period; employ them as thou wilt; recline on these heaps of gold; command the Infernal Potentates; range at thy pleasure through these immense subterranean domains; no barrier shall be shut against thee, as for me, I have fulfilled my mission; I now leave thee to thyself." At these words he vanished

The Caliph and Nouronihar remained in the most abject affliction; their tears unable to flow, scarcely could they support themselves. At length, taking each other despondingly by the hand, they went faltering from this fatal hall, indifferent which way they turned their steps, every portal opened at their approach; the Dives fell prostrate before them; every reservoir of riches was disclosed to their view, but they no longer felt the incentives of curiosity, pride, or avarice. With like apathy they heard the chorus of Genii, and saw the stately banquets prepared to regale them, they went wandering on from chamber to chamber, hall to hall, and gallery to gallery, all without bounds or limit, all distinguishable by the same lowering gloom, all adorned with the same awful grandeur, all traversed by persons in search of repose and consolation, but who sought them in vain, for, every one carried within him a heart tormented in flames, shunned by these various sufferings, who seemed by their looks to be upbraiding the partners of their guilt, they withdrew from them to wait in direful suspense the moment which should render them to each other the like objects of terror.

"What!" exclaimed Nouronihar, "will the time come when I shall snatch my hand from thine?"

"Ah!" said Vathek, "and shall my eyes ever cease to drink from thine long draughts of enjoyment! Shall the moments of our reciprocal ecstasies be reflected on with horror! It was not thou that broughtest me hither; the principles by which Carathis perverted my youth, have been the sole cause of my perdition!" Having given vent to these painful expressions, he called to an

Afrî, who was stirring up one of the braziers, and bade him fetch the Princess Carathis from the palace of Samarah.

After issuing these orders, the Caliph and Nouronihar continued walking amidst the silent crowd, till they heard voices at the end of the gallery; presuming them to proceed from some unhappy beings, who like themselves were awaiting their final doom, they followed the sound, and found it to come from a small square chamber, where they discovered sitting on sofas five young men of goodly figure, and a lovely female, who were all holding a melancholy conversation by the glimmering of a lonely lamp, each had a gloomy and forlorn air, and two of them were embracing each other with great tenderness. On seeing the Caliph and the daughter of Fakreddin enter, they arose, saluted and gave them place; then he who appeared the most considerable of the group addressed himself thus to Vathek

"Strangers! who doubtless are in the same state of suspense with ourselves, as you do not yet bear your hand on your heart, if you are come hither to pass the interval allotted previous to the infliction of our common punishment, condescend to relate the adventures that have brought you to this fatal place, and we in return will acquaint you with ours, which deserve but too well to be heard; we will trace back our crimes to their source, though we are not permitted to repent, this is the only employment suited to wretches like us!"

The Caliph and Nouronihar assented to the proposal, and Vathek began, not without tears and lamentations, a sincere recital of every circumstance that had passed. When the afflicting narrative was closed, the young man entered on his own. Each person proceeded in order, and when the fourth prince had reached the midst of his adventures, a sudden noise interrupted him, which caused the vault to tremble and to open.

Immediately a cloud descended, which gradually dissipating, discovered Carathis on the back of an Afrî, who grievously complained of his burden. She, instantly springing to the ground, advanced towards her son and said:

"What dost thou here in this little square chamber? As the Dives are become subject to thy beck, I expected to have found thee on the throne of the Pre-adamite Kings."

"Execrable woman!" answered the Caliph; "cursed be the day thou gavest me birth! go, follow this Afrî, let him conduct thee to the hall of the Prophet Soliman;

there thou wilt learn to what these palaces are destined, and how much I ought to abhor the impious knowledge thou hast taught me."

"The height of power, to which thou art arrived, has certainly turned thy brain," answered Carathis, "but I ask no more than permission to show my respect for the Prophet. It is, however, proper thou shouldst know, that (as the Afrit has informed me neither of us shall return to Samarah) I requested his permission to arrange my affairs, and he politely consented, availing myself, therefore, of the few moments allowed me, I set fire to the tower, and consumed in it the mutes, negresses, and serpents which have rendered me so much good service; nor should I have been less kind to Morakana-bad, had he not prevented me, by deserting at last to thy brother. As for Bababalouk, who had the folly to return to Samarah, and all the good brotherhood to provide husbands for thy wives, I undoubtedly would have put them to the torture, could I but have allowed them the time, being, however, in a hurry. I only hung him after having caught him in a snare with thy wives, whilst them I buried alive by the help of my negresses, who thus spent their last moments greatly to their satisfaction. With respect to Dilara, who ever stood high in my favor, she hath evinced the greatness of her mind by fixing herself near in the service of one of the Magi, and I think will soon be our own."

Vathek, too much cast down to express the indignation excited by such a discourse, ordered the Afrit to remove Carathis from his presence, and continued immersed in thought, which his companion durst not disturb.

Carathis, however, eagerly entered the dome of Soliman, and, without regarding in the least the groans of the Prophet, undauntedly removed the covers of the vases, and violently seized on the talismans, then, with a voice more loud than had hitherto been heard within these mansions, she compelled the Dives to disclose to her the most secret treasures, the most profound stores, which the Afrit himself had not seen; she passed by rapid descents known only to Eblis and his most favored potentates, and thus penetrated the very entrails of the earth, where breathes the Sansar, or icy wind of death; nothing appalled her dauntless soul, she perceived, however, in all the inmates who bore their hands on their heart a little singularity, not much to her taste. As she was emerging from one of the abysses, Eblis stood forth to her view, but, notwithstanding he displayed the full effulgence of his infernal majesty, she preserved her countenance unaltered, and even paid her compliments with considerable firmness.

This superb Monarch thus answered "Princess, whose knowledge and whose crimes have merited a conspicuous rank in my empire, thou dost well to employ the leisure that remains; for the flames and torments, which are ready to seize on thy heart, will not fail to provide thee with full employment." He said thus, and was lost in the curtains of his tabernacle.

Carathis paused for a moment with surprise; but, resolved to follow the advice of Eblis, she assembled all the choirs of Genn, and all the Dives, to pay her homage, thus marched she in triumph through a vapor of perfumes, amidst the acclamations of all the malignant spirits, with most of whom she had formed a previous acquaintance, she even attempted to dethrone one of the Solimans for the purpose of usurping his place, when a voice, proceeding from the abyss of Death, proclaimed, "All is accomplished!" Instantaneously, the haughty forehead of the intrepid Princess was coruscated with agony; she uttered a tremendous yell, and fixed, no more to be withdrawn, her right hand upon her heart, which was become a receptacle of eternal fire.

In this delirium, forgetting all ambitious projects and her thirst for that knowledge which should ever be hidden from mortals, she overturned the offerings of the Genn, and, having execrated the hour she was begotten and the womb that had borne her, glanced off in a whirl that rendered her invisible, and continued to revolve without intermission.

At almost the same instant the same voice announced to the Caliph, Nouronihar, the five princes, and the princess, the awful and irrevocable decree. Their hearts immediately took fire, and they at once lost the most precious of the gifts of heaven—Hope. These unhappy beings recoiled with looks of the most furious distraction. Vathek beheld in the eyes of Nouronihar nothing but rage and vengeance, nor could she discern aught in his but aversion and despair. The two princes who were friends, and till that moment had preserved their attachment, shrunk back, gnashing their teeth with mutual and unchangeable hatred. Kalilah and his sister made reciprocal gestures of imprecation, whilst the two other princes testified their horror for each other by the most ghastly convulsions, and screams that could not be smothered. All severally plunged themselves into the accursed multitude, there to wander in an eternity of unabating anguish

5 Such was, and such should be, the punishment of unrestrained passions and atrocious actions! Such is, and such should be, the chastisement of blind ambition, that would transgress those bounds which the Creator 10 hath prescribed to human knowledge, and, by aiming at discoveries reserved for pure Intelligence, acquire that insatuated pride, which perceives not the condition appointed to man is to be ignorant and humble

15 Thus the Caliph Vathek, who, for the sake of empty pomp and forbidden power, had sullied himself with a thousand crimes, became a prey to grief without end, and remorse without mitigation; whilst the humble and despised Gulchenrouz passed whole ages 20 in undisturbed tranquillity, and the pure happiness of childhood

LOV'ST THOU ME?

Hark, my soul! it is the Lord,
'Tis thy Saviour, hear his word, Jesus speaks, and speaks to thee.
"Say, poor sinner, lov'st thou me?"

5 I deliver'd thee when bound,
And, when bleeding, heal'd thy wound Sought thee wand'ring, set thee right Turn'd thy darkness into light

Can a woman's tender care 10 Cease towards the child she bare?
Yes, she may forgetful be Yet will I remember thee

Mine is an unchanging love,
Higher than the heights above 15 Deeper than the depths beneath, Free and faithful, strong as death

Thou shalt see my glory soon,
When the work of grace is done Partner of my throne shalt be 20 Say, poor sinner, lov'st thou me?"

Lord, it is my chief complaint,
That my love is weak and faint.
Yet I love thee and adore, Oh! for grace to love thee more!

LIGHT SHINING OUT OF DARKNESS¹

God moves in a mysterious way.
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm

5 Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never-failing skill,
He treasures up his bright designs,
And works his sovereign will

Ye fearful saints, fresh courage take, 10 The clouds ye so much dread Are big with mercy, and shall break In blessings on your head

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust him for his grace, 15 Behind a frowning providence,
He hides a smiling face

His purposes will ripen fast, Unfolding ev'ry hour,

slip Through the cleft rock, and, chiming as they fall Upon loose pebbles, lose themselves at length 195 In matted grass, that with a livelier
green
Betrays the secret of their silent course Nature inanimate employs sweet sounds, But animated nature sweeter still.
To sooth and satisfy the human ear 200 Ten thousand warblers cheer the day, and one
The livelong night not these alone, whose notes
Nee-hunger'd art must emulate in vain, But cawing rooks, and kites that swim
sublime
In still repeated circles, screaming loud,
The jay, the pie, and ev'n the boding owl
That hails the rising moon, have charms for me.
Sounds inharmonious in themselves and harsh.
Yet heard in scenes where peace forever reigns,
And only there, please highly for their sake.
(God made the country, and man made the town.
205 What wonder then that health and virtue, gifts
That can alone make sweet the bitter draught
That life holds out to all, should most abound
And least be threaten'd in the fields and groves?
Possess ye, therefore, ye who, borne about 210 In chariots and sedans, know no fatigue
But that of idleness, and taste no scenes

- But such as art contrives, possess ye
still
Your element; there only ye can shine, There only minds like your's can do no harm.
- 760 Our groves were planted to console at noon
The pensive wand'rer in their shades
At eve
The moonbeam, sliding softly in between
The sleeping leaves, is all the light they wish,
Birds warbling all the music We can spare
- 765 The splendor of your lamps, they but eclipse
Our softer satellite Your songs confound
Our more harmonious notes the thrush departs Scar'd, and th' offended nightingale is mute
There is a public mischief in your mouth, 770 It plagues your country. Folly such as your's,
Grac'd with a sword, and worthier of a fan,
Has made, what enemies could ne'er have done,
Our arch of empire, steadfast but for you,
A mutilated structure, soon to fall

FROM BOOK II THE TIME-PIECE

- Oh for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
Some boundless contiguity of shade,
Where rumor of oppression and deceit,
Of unsuccessful or successful war, 7 Might never reach me more! My ear is pain'd,
My soul is sick, with ev'ry day's report
Of wrong and outrage with which earth is fill'd
There is no flesh in man's obdurate
heart,
It does not feel for man; the nat'ral bond
- 10 Of brotherhood is sever'd as the flax
That falls asunder at the touch of fire
He finds his fellow guilty of a skin Not color'd like his own; and, having pow'r
T' enforce the wrong, for such a worthy cause
- 15 Dooms and devotes him as his lawful
prey
- Lands intersected by a narrow frith Abhor each other. Mountains interpos'd Make enemies of nations, who had else, Like kindred drops, been mingled into one.
- 20 Thus man devotes his brother, and destroys,
And, worse than all, and most to be deplor'd,
As human nature's broadest, foulest blot, Chains him, and tasks him, and exacts his sweat
With stripes, that Mercy, with a bleeding heart, 25 Weeps when she sees inflicted on a beast
Then what is man? And what man, seeing this,
And having human feelings, does not blush,
And hang his head, to think himself a
man?
I would not have a slave to till my
ground,
- 30 To carry me, to fan me while I sleep, And tremble when I wake, for all the wealth
That sinews bought and sold have ever earn'd
No dear as freedom is, and in my heart's
Just estimation priz'd above all price, 35 I had much rather be myself the slave,
And wear the bonds, than fasten them on him
We have no slaves at home — Then why
abroad?
And they themselves, once ferried o'er
the wave
That parts us, are emancipate and loos'd.
- 40 Slaves cannot breathe in England,¹ if their lungs
Receive our air, that moment they are
free,
They touch our country, and their shackles fall.
That's noble, and bespeaks a nation
proud
And jealous of the blessing Spread it then,
- 45 And let it circulate through ev'ry vein
Of all your empire; that where Britain's pow'r
Is felt, mankind may feel her mercy too

¹ The court decision that "slaves cannot breathe in England" was given by Lord Mansfield in 1772. The slave trade was abolished in 1811.

FROM BOOK VI THE WINTER WALK
AT NOON

560 I would not enter on my list of friends (Tho' grac'd with polish'd manners and fine sense,
Yet wanting sensibility) the man Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm
An inadvertent step may crush the snail 365 That crawls at ev'ning in the public path.
But he that has humanity, forewarn'd,
Will tread aside, and let the reptile live The creeping vermin, loathsome to the
sight,
And charg'd perhaps with venom, that intrudes,
770 A visitor unwelcome, into scenes Sacred to neatness and repose—th' alcove,
The chamber, or refectory—may die
A necessary act incurs no blame Not so when, held within their proper bounds 575 And guiltless of offence, they range the
air
Or take their pastime in the spacious field
There they are privileg'd and he that hunts
Or harms them there is guilty of a wrong.
Disturbs th' economy of Nature's realm 580 Who, when she form'd, design'd them an abode
The sum is this—If man's convenience,
health,
Or safety interfere, his rights and claims
Are paramount, and must extinguish their's Else they are all—the meanest things that are—585 As free to live, and to enjoy that life.
As God was free to form them at the first,
Who, in his sov'reign wisdom, made them
all Ye, therefore, who love mercy, teach your sons
To love it too The spring-time of our
years 590 Is soon dishonor'd and defil'd in most By budding ill, that ask a prudent hand To check them But, alas! none sooner shoots,
If unrestrain'd, into luxuriant growth,
Than cruelty, most devilish of them all.
795 Mercy to him that shows it, is the rule
And righteous limitation of its act,

By which Heav'n moves in pard'ning guilty man,
And he that shows none, being ripe in
years,
And conscious of the outrage he commits,
600 Shall seek it, and not find it, in his turn

THE POPLAR-FIELD

1784

1785

The poplars are fell'd, farewell to the
shade
And the whispering sound of the cool colonnade,
The winds play no longer and sing in the leaves,
Nor Ouse on his bosom their image receives 7 Twelve years have elaps'd since I first took a view
Of my favorite field and the bank where they grew
And now in the grass behold they are
laid,
And the tree is my seat that once lent me a shade
The blackbird has fled to another retreat 10 Where the hazels afford him a screen from the heat,
And the scene where his melody charm'd me before,
Resounds with his sweet-flowing ditty no more
My fugitive years are all hasting away,
And I must ere long lie as lowly as they.
15 With a turf on my breast, and a stone at my head,
Ere another such grove shall arise in its stead
'Tis a sight to engage me, if anything can,
To muse on the perishing pleasures of
man,
Though his life be a dream, his enjoyments, I see,
20 Have a being less durable even than he

THE NEGRO'S COMPLAINT

1788

1793

Forc'd from home and all its pleasures, Afur'd coast I left forlorn,
To increase a stranger's treasures,
O'er the raging billows borne.

5 Men from England bought and sold me, Paid my price in paltry gold;
But, though slave they have enroll'd me,
Minds are never to be sold

Still in thought as free as ever, 10 What are England's rights, I ask, Me from my delights to sever,
Me to torture, me to task?
Fleecy locks and black complexion Cannot forfeit nature's claim.
15 Skins may differ, but affection Dwells in white and black the same

Why did all-creating Nature Make the plant for which we toil?
Sighs must fan it, tears must water, 20 Sweet of ours must dress the soil Think, ye masters, iron-hearted, Lolling at your jovial boards,
Think how many backs have smarted
For the sweets your cane affords

25 Is there, as ye sometimes tell us,
Is there one who reigns on high?
Has he bid you buy and sell us,
Speaking from his throne, the sky?
Ask him if your knotted scourges, 30 Matches, blood-extorting screws,
Are the means which duty urges Agents of his will to use?

Hark! he answers!—Wild tornadoes, Strewing yonder sea with wrecks, 35 Wasting towns, plantations, meadows,
Are the voice with which he speaks
He, foreseeing what vexations Afric's sons should undergo,
Fix'd their tyrants' habitations 40 Where his whirlwinds answer—No

By our blood in Afric wasted, Lies our necks receiv'd the chain,
By the miseries that we tasted, Crossing in your barks the main,
45 By our suff'rings since ye brought us To the man-degrading mart,
All sustain'd by patience, taught us
Only by a broken heart

Deem our nation brutes no longer 50 Till some reason ye shall find Worthier of regard and stronger Than the color of our kind.
Slaves of gold, whose sordid dealings Tarnish all your boasted pow'rs, 55 Prove that you have human feelings, Ere you proudly question ours!

ON THE RECEIPT OF MY MOTHER'S PICTURE OUT OF NORFOLK

THE GIFT OF MY COUSIN ANN BODHAM
1790 1798

Oh that those lips had language! Life has pass'd
With me but roughly since I heard thee
last .
Those lips are thine—thy own sweet smile I see,
The same that oft in childhood solaced
me;
5 Voice only fails, else, how distinct they saw,
"Grieve not, my child, chase all thy fears away!"
The meek intelligence of those dear eyes (Blest be the art that can immortalize, The art that baffles Time's tyrannic claim 10 To quench it) here shines on me still the same
Faithful remembrancer of one so dear, O welcome guest, though unexpected,
here!
Who bidd'st me honor with an artless
song,
Affectionate, a mother lost so long.¹ 15 I will obey, not willingly alone,
But gladly, as the precept were her own,
And, while that face renews my filial grief,
Fancy shall weave a charm for my relief—
Shall steep me in Elvian reverie, 20 A momentary dream, that thou art she My mother! when I learn'd that thou wast dead,
Saw, wast thou conscious of the tears I
shed?
Hover'd thy spirit o'er thy sorrowing son,
Wretch even then, life's journey just begun?
25 Perhaps thou gav'st me, though unfelt, a kiss,
Perhaps a tear, if souls can weep in
bliss—
Ah, that maternal smile! it answers—
Yes
I heard the bell toll'd on thy burial day, I saw the hearse that bore thee slow
away, 30 And, turning from my nurs'ry window,
drew
A long, long sigh, and wept a last adieu!
But was it such?—It was—Where thou art gone

¹ Cowper's mother died in 1737.

- Adieus and farewells are a sound unknown.
 May I but meet thee on that peaceful shore, 35 The parting word shall pass my lips no more!
 Thy maidens griev'd themselves at my concern, (Oft gave me promise of thy quick return
 What ardently I wish'd, I long believ'd.
 And, disappointed still, was still deceiv'd; 40 By expectation every day beguill'd.
 Dupe of tomorrow even from a child Thus many a sad tomorrow came and went,
 Till, all my stock of infant sorrow spent.
 I learn'd at last submission to my lot.
 45 But, though I less deplor'd thee, ne'er forgot Where once we dwelt our name is heard no more, Children not thine have trod my nurse's floor;
 And where the gard'ner Robin, day by day, Drew me to school along the public way.
 50 Delighted with my bauble coach, and wrapt In scarlet mantle warm, and velvet cap.
 'Tis now become a history little known.
 That once we call'd the pastoral house our own Short-liv'd possession! but the record fair 55 That mem'ry keeps of all thy kindness there, Still outlives many a storm that has effac'd
 A thousand other themes less deeply trac'd, Thy mighty visits to my chamber made,
 That thou might'st know me safe and warmly laid;
 60 Thy morning bounties ere I left my home.
 The biscuit, or confectionary plum.
 The fragrant waters on my cheeks bestow'd
 By thy own hand, till fresh they shone and glow'd;
 All this, and more endearing still than all, 65 Thy constant flow of love, that knew no fall, Ne'er roughen'd by those cataracts and brakes That humor interpos'd too often makes;
 All this still legible in mem'ry's page.
 And still to be so, to my latest age,
- 70 Adds joy to duty, makes me glad to pay Such honors to thee as my numbers may;
 Perhaps a frail memorial, but sincere,
 Not scorn'd in heav'n, though little notice'd here.
 Could Time, his flight revers'd, restore the hours, 75 When, playing with thy vesture's tissued flow'rs,
 The violet, the pink, and jessamine.
 I prick'd them into paper with a pin.
 (And thou wast happier than myself the while, Would'st softly speak, and stroke my head, and smile) 80 Could those few pleasant hours again appear, Might one wish bring them, would I wish them here?
 I would not trust my heart—the dear delight Seems so to be desir'd, perhaps I might — But no—what here we call our life is such, 85 So little to be lov'd, and thou so much,
 That I should ill requite thee to constrain Thy unbound spirit into bonds again Thou, as a gallant bark from Albion's coast (The storms all weather'd and the ocean cross'd) 90 Shoots into port at some well-haven'd isle, Where spices breathe, and brighter seasons smile,
 There sits quiescent on the floods that show
 Her beauteous form reflected clear below, While airs impregnated with incense play 95 Around her, fanning light her streamers gay, So thou, with sails how swift! hast reach'd the shore
 "Where tempests never beat nor billows roar,"¹
 And thy lov'd consort on the dangerous tide
 Of life, long since, has anchor'd at thy side.² 100 But me, scarce hoping to attain that rest, Always from port withheld, always distress'd—
 Me howling blasts drive devious, tempest toss'd, Sails ript, seams op'ning wide, and compass lost,

² Cowper's father died in 1756

And day by day some current's thwart-ing force 105 Sets me more distant from a pros'prous course.
Yet, oh, the thought that thou art safe, and hel
That thought is joy, arrive what may to
me
My boast is not that I deduce my birth From loins enthron'd, and rulers of the earth,¹ 110 But higher far my proud pretensions rise—
The son of parents pass'd into the skies And now, farewell—Time, unrevok'd, has run
His wonted course, yet what I wish'd is done
By contemplation's help, not sought in
vain,
115 I seem t' have liv'd my childhood o'er
again,
To have renew'd the joys that once were
mine,
Without the sin of violating thine And, while the wings of Fancy still are
free,
And I can view this mimic show of thee, 120 Time has but half succeeded in his theft—
Thyself remov'd, thy power to sooth me left

YARDLEY OAK
1791 1804

Survivor sole, and hardly such, of all That once liv'd here thy brethren!—at my birth (Since which I number three-score winters past)
A shatter'd veteran, hollow-trunk'd perhaps 5 As now, and with execrate² forks deform,
Relics of ages! Could a mind, imbued With truth from heav'n, created things
adore,
I might with reverence kneel and worship
thee
It seems idolatry with some excuse 10 When our forefather Druids in their oaks Imagin'd sanctity The conscience yet Unpurified by an authentic act Of amnesty, the meed of blood divine, Lov'd not the light, but, gloomy, into gloom

cestry to Henry III.

² bark removing

15 Of thickest shades, like Adam after taste
Of fruit proscrub'd, as to a refuge, fled.
Thou wast a bauble once; a cup and ball,
Which babes might play with, and the thievish jay Seeking her food, with ease might have purloin'd 20 The auburn nut that held thee, swallowing down
Thy yet close-folded latitude of boughs
And all thine embryo vastness, at a gulp But Fate thy growth decreed autumnal rains Beneath thy parent tree mellow'd the soil, 25 Design'd thy cradle, and a skipping deer,
With pointed hoof dibbling the glebe,¹ prepared
The soft receptacle, in which, secure, Thy rudiments should sleep the winter through
So Fancy dreams—Disprove it, if ye can, 30 Ye reas'ners broad awake, whose busy search (Of argument, employ'd too oft amiss, Sifts half the pleasures of short life
away.
Thou fell'st mature, and in the loamy clod
Swelling, with vegetative force instinct 35 Didst burst thine egg, as theirs the fabled Twins
Now stars;² two lobes, protruding, pair'd exact,
A leaf succeeded, and another leaf,
And all the elements thy puny growth Fost'ring propitious, thou becam'st a twig.
40 Who liv'd when thou wast such? Oh, couldst thou speak,
As in Dodona once thy kindred trees Oracular,³ I would not curious ask The future, best unknown, but at thy mouth
Inquisitive, the less ambiguous past.
45 By thee I might correct, erroneous oft,
The clock of history, facts and events Timing more punctual, unrecorded facts Recov'ring, and misstated setting right—Desp'rate attempt, till trees shall speak
again!

¹ making holes in the sod or ground.

² Castor and Pollux, who, according to one tradition, were born of an egg.

³ The responses of the oracle at Dodona, in Epirus, were given by the rustling of the oak trees in the wind. The sounds were interpreted by priests.

- 50 Time made thee what thou wast—King of the woods;
 And Time hath made thee what thou art—a cave
 For owls to roost in Once thy spreading boughs O'erhung the champaign,¹ and the numerous flocks
 That graz'd it stood beneath that ample eope 55 Uncrowded, yet safe-shelter'd from the storm.
 No flock frequents thee now. Thou hast outliv'd Thy popularity and art become (Unless verse rescue thee awhile) a thing Forgotten, as the foliage of thy youth 60 While thus through all the stages thou hast push'd
 Of tree-ship, first a seedling hid in grass, Then twig, then sapling, and, as century
 roll'd
 Slow after century, a giant bulk Of girth enormous, with moss-cushion'd root 65 Uplifted above the soil, and sides emboss'd
 With prominent wens globose,² till at the last
 The rottenness, which Time is charg'd t' inflict
 On other mighty ones, found also thee
 What exhibitions various hath the world 70 Witness'd of mutability in all That we account most durable below Change is the diet on which all subsist, Created changeable, and change at last Destroys them Skies uncertain, now the heat 75 Transmitting cloudless, and the solar beam
 Now quenching in a boundless sea of
 clouds;
 Calm and alternate storm, moisture and drought, Invigorate by turns the springs of life In all that live,—plant, animal, and
 man,— 80 And in conclusion mar them Nature's threads,
 Fine passing thought, ev'n in her consistent works,
 Delight in agitation, yet sustain
 The force, that agitates not unimpair'd, But, worn by frequent impulse, to the cause 85 Of their best tone their dissolution owe of field
 ¹ growths in the shape of globes
- Thought cannot spend itself, comparing still
 The great and little of thy lot, thy growth
 From almost nullity into a state Of matchless grandeur, and declension thence,
 90 Slow, into such magnificent decay.
 Time was when, settling on thy leaf, a fly
 Could shake thee to the root, and time has been When tempests could not. At thy firmest age
 Thou hadst within thy bole solid contents 95 That might have ribb'd the sides and plank'd the deck
 Of some flagg'd admiral; and tortuous arms,
 The shipwright's darling treasure, didst present
 To the four-quarter'd winds, robust and
 bold, Warp'd into tough knee-timber, many a load 100 But the axe spared thee, in those thinner days
 Oaks fell not, hewn by thousands to supply
 The bottomless demands of contest wag'd
 For senatorial honors Thus to Time
 The task was left to whittle thee away 105 With his sly scythe, whose ever-mibbling edge, Noiseless, an atom, and an atom more,
 Disjoining from the rest, has, unobserv'd, Achiev'd a labor, which had, far and
 wide, (By man perform'd) made all the forest ring 110 Embowell'd now, and of thy ancient self Possessing nought but the scoop'd mind, that seems
 An huge throat calling to the clouds for drink,
 Which it would give in riv'lets to thy
 root,
 Thou tempest none, but rather much forbid'st
 115 The feller's toil, which thou couldst ill requite.
 Yet is thy root sincere, sound as the rock,
 A quarry of stout spurs and knotted fangs, Which, crook'd into a thousand whimsies, clasp
 The stubborn soil, and hold thee still erect

- 130 So stands a kingdom, whose foundation yet
Fails not, in virtue and in wisdom laid, Though all the superstructure, by the tooth
Pulveriz'd of venality, a shell Stands now, and semblance only of itself
- 125 Thine arms have left thee. Winds have rent them off
Long since, and rovers of the forest wild With bow and shaft have burnt them
Some have left A splinter'd stump, bleach'd to a snowy
white;
And some memorial none, where once they grew
- 130 Yet life still lingers in thee, and puts
forth
Proof not contemptible of what she can.
Even where death predominates The
Spring
Finds thee not less alive to her sweet force
Than yonder upstart of the neighboring
wood.
- 135 So much thy juniors, who their birth receiv'd
Half a millennium since the date of thine.
But since, although well qualhied by
age
To teach, no spirit dwells in thee, nor
voice
May be expected from thee, seated here
- 140 On thy distorted root, with hearers none Or prompter, save the scene, I will perform
Myself the oracle, and will discourse
In my own ear such matter as I may One man alone, the Father of us all.
- 145 Drew not his life from woman, never gaz'd,
With mute unconsciousness of what he saw,
On all around him; learn'd not by degrees,
Nor owed articulation to his ear,
But, moulded by his Maker into man
- 150 At once, upstood intelligent, survey'd
All creatures, with precision understood Their purport, uses, properties, assign'd
To each his name significant, and, fill'd With love and wisdom, render'd back to heav'n
- 155 In praise harmonious the first air he drew
He was excus'd the penalties of dull Minority No tutor charg'd his hand With the thought-tracing quill, or task'd his mind
With problems; history, not wanted vet,
- 160 Lean'd on her elbow, watching Time, whose
course,
Eventful, should supply her with a theme

- TO MARY 1793 1803
- The twentieth year is well-nigh past, Since our first sky was overcast,¹ Ah, would that this might be the last'
My Mary'
- 5 Thy spirits have a fainter flow, I see thee daily weaker grow—
'Twas my distress that brought thee low.
My Mary'
- Thy needles, once a shining store, 10 For my sake restless heretofore, Now rust disus'd, and shine no more,
My Mary'
- For though thou gladly wouldst fulfil The same kind office for me still, 15 Thy sight now seconds not thy will,
My Mary'
- But well thou play'd'st the housewife's
part.
And all thy threads with magic art
Have wound themselves about this heart,
20 My Mary'
- Thy indistinct expressions seem Like language utter'd in a dream, Yet me they charm, whate'er the theme.
My Mary'
- 25 Thy silver locks, once auburn bright,
Are still more lovely in my sight
Than golden beams of orient light,
My Mary'
- For, could I view nor them nor thee, 30 What sight worth seeing could I see?
The sun would rise in vain for me.
My Mary'
- Partakers of thy sad decline,
Thy hands their little force resign.
35 Yet, gently prest, press gently mine
My Mary'
- And then I feel that still I hold A richer store ten thousandfold Than misers fancy in their gold.
40 My Mary'
- Such feebleness of limbs thou prov'st,
That now at every step thou mov'st

¹ A reference to Cowper's violent attack of insanity in 1779.

Upheld by two; yet still thou lov'st,
My Mary!

45 And still to love, though prest with ill.
In wintry age to feel no chill,
With me is to be lovely still,

My Mary!

But ah! by constant heed I know, 50 How oft the sadness that I show Transforms thy smiles to looks of woe.

My Mary!

And should my future lot be cast
With much resemblance of the past 55 Thy worn-out heart will break at last,
My Mary!

THE CASTAWAY 1799 1801

Obscure night involv'd the sky.
Th' Atlantic billows roar'd.
When such a destin'd wretch as I, Wash'd headlong from on board, 5 Of friends, of hope, of all bereft.
His floating home forever left

No braver chief could Albion boast Than he with whom he went,
Nor ever ship left Albion's coast, 10 With warmer wishes sent
He loved them both, but both in vain.
Nor him beheld, nor her again

Not long beneath the whelming brine.
Expert to swim, he lay.
15 Nor soon he felt his strength decline,
Or courage die away;
But wag'd with death a lasting strife.
Supported by despair of life

He shouted: nor his friends had fail'd 20 To check the vessel's course, But so the furious blast prevail'd,
That, pitiless perforce,
They left their outcast mate behind.
And scudded still before the wind

Some succor yet they could afford.
And, such as storms allow,
The cask, the coop, the floated cord.
Delay'd not to bestow
But he (they knew) nor ship, nor shore, 30 Whate'er they gave, should visit more

Nor, cruel as it seem'd, could he Their haste himself condemn, Aware that flight, in such a sea,
Alone could rescue them;

35 Yet bitter felt it still to die Deserted, and his friends so nigh.

He long survives, who lives an hour
In ocean, self-upheld;
And so long he, with unspent pow'r, 40 His destiny repell'd,
And ever, as the minutes flew,
Entreated help, or cried—"Adieu!"

At length, his transient respite past.
His comrades, who before 45 Had heard his voice in ev'ry blast.
Could catch the sound no more
For then, by toil subdued, he sank
The stifling wave, and then he sank

No poet wept him: but the page 50 Of narrative sincere,
That tells his name, his worth, his age.
Is wet with Anson's tear,¹ And tears by bards or heroes shed Alike immortalize the dead

I therefore purpose not, or dream, Descanting² on his fate,
To give the melancholy theme
A more enduring date
But misery still delights to trace 60 Its semblance in another's case

No voice divine the storm allay'd,
No light propitious shone,
When, snatch'd from all effectual aid,
We perish'd, each alone 65 But I beneath a rougher sea,
And whelm'd in deeper gulfs than he!

GEORGE CRABBE (1754-1832)

From THE VILLAGE
1780-1783 1783

BOOK I

The village life, and every care that reigns O'er youthful peasants and declining
swains;
What labor yields, and what, that labor
past,
Age, in its hour of languor, finds at last.
7 What form the real picture of the poor.
Demand a song—the Muse can give no
more.

¹ The poem is founded on an incident in Lord George Anson's Voyage Round the World (1748) commenting freely

² Cowper had a delusion that he had lost the favor of God. See his letter to Newton, written April 11, 1799.

- Fled are those times, when, in harmonious strains,
The rustic poet praised his native plains
No shepherds now, in smooth alternate verse, 10 Their country's beauty or their nymphs' rehearse;
Yet still for these we frame the tender strain, Still in our lays fond Corydons complain,
And shepherds' boys their amorous pains reveal,
The only pains, alas! they never feel 15 On Mincio's banks, in Caesar's bounteous reign, If Tityrus found the Golden Age again.
Must sleepy bards the flattering dream prolong, Mechanic echoes of the Mantuan song'
From Truth and Nature shall we widely stray, 20 Where Virgil, not where Fancy, leads the way?
Yes, thus the Muses sing of happy swains, Because the Muses never knew their pains
They boast their peasants' pipes, but peasants now Resign their pipes and plod behind the plough; 25 And few, amid the rural-tribe, have time To number syllables, and play with rhyme.
Save honest Duck, what son of verse could share
The poet's rapture, and the peasant's care?
Or the great labors of the field degrade.
30 With the new peril of a poorer trade?
From this chief cause these idle praises spring,
That themes so easy few forbear to sing;
For no deep thought the trifling subjects ask,
To sing of shepherds is an easy task: 35 The happy youth assumes the common strain,
A nymph his mistress, and himself a swain.
With no sad scenes he clouds his tuneful prayer,
But all, to look like her, is painted fair.
I grant indeed that fields and flocks have charms 40 For him that grazes or for him that farms;
But when amid such pleasing scenes I trace
The poor laborious natives of the place,
And see the mid-day sun, with fervid ray,
On their bare heads and dewy temples play, 45 While some, with feeble heads and fainter hearts, Deplore their fortune, yet sustain their parts.
Then shall I dare these real ills to hide
In tinsel trappings of poetic pride?
No; cast by Fortune on a frowning coast, 50 Which neither groves nor happy valleys boast, Where other cares than those the Muse relates,
And other shepherds dwell with other mates,
By such examples taught, I paint the cot.
As Truth will paint it, and as bards will not:
55 Nor you, ye poor, of letter'd scorn complain,
To you the smoothest song is smooth in vain;
O'ercome by labor, and bow'd down by time, Feel you the barren flattery of a rhyme?
Can poets soothe you, when you pine for bread, 60 By winding myrtles round your ruin'd shed?
Can their light tales your weighty griefs o'erpower,
Or glad with airy mirth the toilsome hour?
Lo! where the heath with withering brake grown o'er,
Lends the light turf that warms the neighboring poor, 65 From thence a length of burning sand appears,
Where the thin harvest waves its wither'd ears;
Rank weeds, that every art and care defy Reign o'er the land, and rob the blighted rye.
There thistles stretch their prickly arms afar, 70 And to the ragged infant threaten war;
There poppies nodding, mock the hope of toil;
There the blue bugloss¹ paints the sterile soil;
Hardy and high, above the slender sheaf,
The slimy mallow¹ waves her silky leaf;

¹ A kind of plant

- 75 O'er the young shoot the charlock¹ throws a shade,
And clasping tares² cling round the sickly blade,
With mingled tints the rocky coasts
abound,
And a sad splendor vainly shines around So looks the nymph whom wretched arts
adorn, 80 Betray'd by man, then left for man to scorn,
Whose cheek in vain assumes the mimic
rose,
While her sad eyes the troubled breast disclose,
Whose outward splendor is but folly's dress,
Exposing most, when most it gilds distress 85 Here joyless roam a wild amphibious
race,
With sullen wo display'd in every face,
Who, far from civil arts and social life,
And scowl at strangers with suspicious
eye.
Here too the lawless merchant of the main³
90 Draws from his plough th' intoxicated swain,⁴
Want only claim'd the labor of the day, But vice now steals his nightly rest
away
Where are the swains, who, daily labor
done,
With rural games play'd down the setting sun.
95 Who struck with matchless force the bounding ball,
Or made the pond'rous quoit obliquely
fall, While some huge Ajax, terrible and
strong,
Engaged some artful stripling of the
throng,
And fell beneath him, foil'd, while far
around 100 Hoarse triumph rose, and rocks return'd the sound⁵
Where now are these?—Beneath yon cliff they stand,
To show the freighted pinnace where to land;⁶
- To load the ready steed with guilty haste,
To fly in terror o'er the pathless waste 105 Or, when detected, in then straggling
course,
To foil then toes by cunning or by
force,
Or, yielding part (which equal knives demand),
To gain a lawless passport through the land
Here, wand'ring long, amid these frowning fields,
110 I sought the simple life that Nature yields Rapine and Wrong and Fear usurp'd her place,
And a bold, artful, surly, savage race,
Who, only skill'd to take the funny tribe,
The yearly dinner, or septennial bribe,⁷ 115 Wait on the shore, and, as the waves run high,
On the tost vessel bend their eager eye,
Which to their coast directs its vent'rous
way,
Thence, on the ocean's miserable prey
As on their neighboring beach yon swallows stand, 120 And wait for favoring winds to leave the land,
While still for flight the ready wing is
spread,
So wanted I the favoring hour, and fled Fled from these shores where guilt and famine reign,
And cried, Ah! hapless they who still remain.
125 Who still remain to hear the ocean roar Whose greedy waves devour the lessening
shore;
Till some fierce tide, with more impetuous sway,
Sweeps the low hut and all it holds away.
When the sad tenant weeps from door to
door, 130 And begs a poor protection from the poor!
But these are scenes where Nature's niggard hand
Gave a spare portion to the famish'd
land;
Hers is the fault, if here mankind complain
Of fruitless toil and labor spent in vain.
135 But yet in other scenes more fair in view, Where Plenty smiles—alas! she smiles for few—

¹ A kind of plant² The smuggler³ He became intoxicated on smuggled brandy⁴ So enormous was the smuggling business that agriculture, in some places, was seriously impeded by the constant employment of farmers' horses in carrying goods to a distance from the shore⁵ bribe given at the septennial elections of members of Parliament

- And those who taste not, yet behold her store,
Are as the slaves that dig the golden ore,—
The wealth around them makes them doubly poor 110 Or will you deem them amply paid in health,
Labor's fan child, that languishes with wealth?
Go then! and see them rising with the
sun,
Through a long course of daily toil to
run,
See them beneath the dog-star's raging
heat, 115 When the knees tremble and the temples beat;
Behold them leaning on their scythes, look o'er
The labor past, and toils to come explore, See them alternate suns and showers engage,
And hoard up aches and anguish for their age, 120 Through fens and marshy moors their steps pursue,
When their warm pores imbibe the evening dew,
Then own that labor may as fatal be To these thy slaves, as thine excess to
thee
Amid this tribe too oft a manly pride 125 Strives in strong toil the fainting heart to lide,
There may you see the youth of slender frame Contend with weakness, weariness, and shame,
Yet, urged along, and proudly loth to yield,
He strives to join his fellows of the field.
130 Till long-contending nature droops at
last,
Declining health rejects his poor repast.
His cheerless spouse the coming danger sees,
And mutual murmurs urge the slow disease
Yet grant them health, 'tis not for us to tell, 135 Though the head droops not, that the heart is well,
Or will you praise that homely, healthy fare,
Plenteous and plain, that happy peasants share!
Oh! trifle not with wants you cannot feel,
Nor mock the misery of a stinted meal;
140 Homely, not wholesome, plain, not plenteous, such
As you who praise would never deign to touch
Ye gentle souls, who dream of rural
ease,
Whom the smooth stream and smoother sonnet please;
Go! if the peaceful cot your praises
share,
145 Go look within, and ask if peace be there.
If peace be his—that drooping weary
sire,
Or theirs, that offspring round their feeble fire,
Or hers, that matron pale, whose trembling hand
Turns on the wretched hearth th' expiring brand!
150 Nor yet can Time itself obtain for these Life's latest comforts, due respect and
ease,
For yonder see that hoary swain, whose
age
Can with no cares except his own engage;
Who, propp'd on that rude staff, looks up to see 155 The bare arms broken from the withering
tree,
On which, a boy, he climb'd the loftiest bough,
Then his first joy, but his sad emblem
now.
He once was chief in all the rustic
trade,
His steady hand the straightest furrow made, 160 Full many a prize he won, and still is proud
To find the triumphs of his youth al-low'd,
A transient pleasure sparkles in his eyes,
He hears and smiles, then thinks again and sighs
For now he journeys to his grave in pain; 165 The rich disdain him, nay, the poor disdain Alternate masters now their slave command,
Urged the weak efforts of his feeble hand,
And, when his age attempts its task in
vain,
With ruthless taunts, of lazy poor complain 170 Oft may you see him, when he tends the sheep,
His winter-charge, beneath the lullock weep.

- Oft hear him murmur to the winds that blow
 O'er his white locks and bury them in
 snow,
 When, roused by rage and muttering in the morn, 205 He mends the broken hedge with icy 240 thorn:—
 "Why do I live, when I desire to be At once from life and life's long labor
 free?
 Like leaves in spring, the young are blown away,
 Without the sorrows of a slow decay, 210 I, like yon wither'd leaf, remain behind, Nipp'd by the frost, and shivering in 245
 the wind,
 There it abides till younger buds come on,
 As I, now all my fellow-swains are gone,
 Then, from the rising generation thrust.
 215 It falls, like me, unnoticed, to the dust "These fruitful fields, these numerous flocks I see,
 Are others' gain, but killing cares to me, 250 To me the children of my youth are lords,
 'Cool in their looks, but hasty in their words.
 220 Wants of their own demand their care:
 and who Feels his own want and succors others too?
 A lonely, wretched man, in pain I go, None need my help, and none relieve my wo,
 Then let my bones beneath the turf be
 laid, 225 And men forget the wretch they would not aid."
 Thus groan the old, till, by disease 260
 oppress'd,
 They taste a final wo, and then they rest Theirs is yon house that holds the parish-poor,
 Whose walls of mud scarce bear the broken door;
 230 There, where the putrid vapors, flagging,
 play,
 And the dull wheel¹ hums doleful through the day;—
 There children dwell who know no parents' care;
 Parents who know no children's love, dwell there!
 Heartbroken matrons on their joyless
 bed,
 235 Forsaken wives, and mothers never wed,
- Dejected widows with unheeded tears,
 And crippled age with more than childhood fears;
 The lame, the blind, and, far the happiest they!
 The moping idiot and the madman gay.
 Here too the sick their final doom receive,
 Here brought, amid the scenes of grief,
 to grieve,
 Where the loud groans from some sad chamber flow,
 Mix'd with the clamors of the crowd
 below,
 Here, sorrowing, they each kindred sorrow scan, 245 And the cold charities of man to man: Whose laws indeed for ruin'd age provide,
 And strong compulsion plucks the scrap from pride,
 But still that scrap is bought with many a sigh,
 And pride embitters what it can't deny 250 Say ye, oppress'd by some fantastic woes,
 Some jarring nerve that baffles your repose,
 Who press the downy couch, while slaves
 advance
 With timid eye, to read the distant glance,
 Who with sad prayers the weary doctor tease, 255 To name the nameless ever-new disease, Who with mock patience dire complaints endure,
 Which real pain and that alone can cure.
 How would ye bear in real pain to lie, Despised, neglected, left alone to die?
 260 How would ye bear to draw your latest breath,
 Where all that's wretched paves the way for death?
 Such is that room which one rude beam divides,
 And naked rafters form the sloping sides;
 Where the vile bands that bind the thatch are seen, 265 And lath and mud are all that lie between,
 Save one dull pane, that, coarsely patch'd, gives way
 To the rude tempest, yet excludes the
 day:
 Here, on a matted flock,¹ with dust o'er spread,

¹ The spinning-wheel.¹ A bed filled with flocks of coarse wool

- The drooping wretch reclines his languid head; 270 For him no hand the cordial cup applies,
 Or wipes the tear that stagnates in his eyes;
 No friends with soft discourse his pain beguile,
 Or promise hope till sickness wears a smile.
 But soon a loud and hasty summons calls, 275 Shakes the thin roof, and echoes round the walls.
 Anon, a figure enters, quaintly neat,
 All pride and business, bustle and conceit,
 With looks unalter'd by these scenes of woe,
 With speed that, entering, speaks his haste to go, 280 He bids the gazing throng around him fly,
 And carries fate and physic in his eye
 A potent quack, long versed in human ills,
 Who first insults the victim whom he kills;
 Whose murd'rous hand a drowsy Bench¹ protect, 285 And whose most tender mercy is neglect Paid by the parish for attendance here.
 He wears contempt upon his sapient sneer,
 In haste he seeks the bed where Misery lies, Impatience mark'd in his averted eyes, 290 And, some habitual queries hurried o'er.
 Without reply, he rushes on the door
 His drooping patient, long inured to pain,
 And long unheeded, knows remonstrance vain;
 He ceases now the feeble help to crave 295 Of man; and silent sinks into the grave
 But ere his death some pious doubts arise,
 Some simple fears, which "bold bad" men despise; Fain would he ask the parish-priest to prove His title certain to the joys above 300 For this he sends the murmuring nurse, who calls
 The holy stranger to these dismal walls:
 And doth not he, the pious man, appear,
 He, "passing rich with forty pounds a year"²;
 Ah! no; a shepherd of a different stock, 305 And far unlike him, feeds this little flock
 A jovial youth, who thinks his Sunday's task
 As much as God or man can fairly ask,
 The rest he gives to loves and labors light,
 To fields the morning, and to feasts the night;
 310 None better skill'd the noisy pack to guide,
 To urge their chase, to cheer them or to chide;
 A sportsman keen, he shoots through half the day,
 And, skill'd at whist, devotes the night to play:
 Then, while such honors bloom around his head, 315 Shall he sit sadly by the sick man's bed,
 To raise the hope he feels not, or with zeal
 To combat fears that e'en the pious feel?
 Now once again the gloomy scene explore, 320 Less gloomy now; the bitter hour is o'er,
 The man of many sorrows sighs no more Up yonder hill, behold how sadly slow
 The bier moves winding from the vale below;
 There lie the happy dead, from trouble free,
 And the glad parish pays the frugal fee.
 325 No more, O Death! thy victim starts to hear Churchwarden stern, or kingly overseer.
 No more the farmer claims his humble bow, Thou art his lord, the best of tyrants thou!
 Now to the church behold the mourners come, 330 Sedately torpid and devoutly dumb,
 The village children now their games suspend,
 To see the bier that bears their ancient friend,
 For he was one in all their idle sport.
 And like a monarch ruled their little court.
 335 The pliant bow he form'd, the flying ball,
 The bat, the wicket, were his labors all;
 Him now they follow to his grave, and stand Silent and sad, and gazing, hand in hand:
 While bending low, their eager eyes explore 340 The mingled relics of the parish poor:
 The bell tolls late, the moping owl flies round,

² Goldsmith, The Deserted Village, 142.

Fear marks the flight and magnifies the
 sound;
 The busy priest, detain'd by weightier
 care,
 Defers his duty till the day of prayer.
 345 And, waiting long, the crowd retire distress'd,
 To think a poor man's bones should lie unblest'd

LETTER I GENERAL DESCRIPTION

"Describe the Borough"—though our idle tribe
 May love description, can we so describe.
 That you shall fairly streets and buildings trace,
 And all that gives distinction to a place?
 5 This cannot be, yet, moved by your request,
 A part I paint—let fancy form the rest Cities and towns, the various haunts
 of men,
 Require the pencil, they defy the pen ('ould he, who sang so well the Grecian fleet,¹ 10 So well have sung of alley, lane, or street?
 Can measured lines these various buildings show,
 The Town-Hall Turning, or the Prospect
 Row?
 Can I the seats of wealth and want explore,
 And lengthen out my lays from door to
 door?
 15 Then let thy fancy aid me—I repair From this tall mansion of our last-year's mayor, Till we the outskirts of the Borough reach,
 And these half-buried buildings next the beach,
 Where hang at open doors the net and cork, 20 While squalid sea-dames mend the meshy work,
 Till comes the hour, when fishing through the tide,
 The weary husband throws his freight aside,
 A living mass, which now demands the wife,
 Th' alternate labors of their humble life 25 Can scenes like these withdraw thee from thy wood,
 Thy upland forest or thy valley's flood?

Seek then thy garden's shrubby bound,
 and look,
 As it steals by, upon the bordering
 brook,
 That winding streamlet, limpid, lingering, slow, 30 Where the reeds whisper when the zephyrs blow;
 Where in the midst, upon her throne of
 green,
 Sits the large lily as the water's queen.
 And makes the current, forced awhile to stay,
 Murmur and bubble as it shoots away, 35 Draw then the strongest contrast to that stream,
 And our broad river will before thee seem
 With ceaseless motion comes and goes
 the tide,
 Flowing, it fills the channel vast and
 wide,
 Then back to sea, with strong majestic sweep 40 It rolls, in ebb yet terrible and deep, Here sam-pire-banks¹ and salt-wort² bound
 the flood,
 There stakes and sea-weeds withering on the mud,
 And higher up, a ridge of all things base,
 Which some strong tide has roll'd upon the place
 45 Thy gentle river boasts its pigmy boat,
 Urged on by pains, half grounded, half afloat,
 While at her stern an angler takes his
 stand,
 And marks the fish he purposes to land, From that clear space, where, in the cheerful ray 50 Of the warm sun, the scaly people play Far other craft our prouder river shows, Hoys, pinks, and sloops, brigs, brigantines, and snows - Nor angler we on our wide stream deserve,
 But one poor dredger where his oysters lie 55 He, cold and wet, and driving with the tide,
 Beats his weak arms against his tarri-
 side,
 Then drains the remnant of diluted gin,
 To aid the warmth that languishes within,
 Renewing oft his poor attempts to beat

¹ A kind of sea shrub

² Kinds of small coasting vessels

- 60 His tingling fingers into gathering heat He shall again be seen when evening
 comes,
 And social parties crowd their favorite rooms:
 Where on the table pipes and papers lie.
 The steaming bowl or foaming tankard by;
 65 'Tis then, with all these comforts spread
 around,
 They hear the painful dredger's welcome
 sound,
 And few themselves the savory boon deny,
 The food that feeds the living luxury Yon is our quay! those smaller hovels from town, 70 Its various wares, for country-use, bring
 down;
 Those laden wagons, in return, impart
 The country-produce to the city mart;
 Hark to the clamor in that noisy road, Bounded and narrow'd by yon vessels'
 load,
 75 The lumbering wealth she empties round
 the place,
 Package and parcel, hogshead, chest, and case
 While the loud seaman and the angry
 hind,
 Mingling in business, bellow to the wind Near these a crew amphibious, in the docks, 80 Rear, for the sea, those castles on the stocks,
 See! the long keel, which soon the waves must hide,
 See! the strong ribs which form the roomy side,
 Bolts yielding slowly to the sturdiest
 stroke,
 And planks which curve and crackle in the smoke 85 Around the whole rise cloudy wreaths, and far Bear the warm pungence of o'er-boiling tar Dabbling on shore half-naked sea-boys
 crowd,
 Swim round a ship, or swing upon the shroud;
 Or in a boat purlion'd, with paddles play, 90 And grow familiar with the watery way Young though they be, they feel whose sons they are,
 They know what British seamen do and dare,
 Proud of that fame, they raise and they enjoy
 The rustic wonder of the village-boy.
- 95 Before you bid these busy scenes adieu.
 Behold the wealth that lies in public
 view,
 Those far-extended heaps of coal and coke,
 Where fresh-fill'd lime-kilns breathe their stifling smoke.
 This shall pass off, and you behold, instead,
 100 The night-fire gleaming on its chalky bed;
 When from the light-house brighter beams will rise,
 To show the shipman where the shallow lies.
 Thy walks are ever pleasant; every scene is rich in beauty, lively, or serene—105 Rich—is that varied view with woods
 around,
 Seen from thy seat, within the shrubb'ry bound;
 Where shines the distant lake, and where appear
 From ruins bolting, unmolested deer; Lively—the village-green, the inn, the
 place, 110 Where the good widow schools her infant
 race,
 Shops, whence are heard the hammer and the saw,
 And village-pleasures unreprieved by law, Then how serene! when in your favorite room, Gales from your jasmines soothe the evening gloom;
 115 When from your upland paddock! you look down,
 And just perceive the smoke which hides
 the town.
 When weary peasants at the close of day
 Walk to their cots, and part upon the way;
 When cattle slowly cross the shallow
 brook,
 120 And shepherds pen their folds, and rest upon their crook
 We prune our hedges, prime our slender
 trees,
 And nothing looks untutor'd and at ease;
 On the wide heath, or in the flow'ry vale,
 We scent the vapors of the sea-born gale; 125 Broad-beaten paths lead on from stile to stile,
 And sewers from streets, the road-side banks defile;
 Our guarded fields a sense of danger show, Where garden-crops with corn and clover grow;
 Fences are form'd of wreck and placed
 around,
 1 small pasture, field

- 130 (With tenters¹ tipp'd) a strong repulsive bound;
Wide and deep ditches by the gardens run,
And there in ambush lie the trap and gun,
Or yon broad board, which guards each tempting prize,
"Like a tall bully, lifts its head and lies."²
- 135 There stands a cottage with an open door,
Its garden undefended blooms before Her wheel is still, and overturn'd her stool, While the lone widow seeks the neighbour's pool
This gives us hope, all views of town to shun—
- 140 No! here are tokens of the sailor-son.
That old blue jacket, and that shirt of check.
And silken kerchief for the seaman's neck;
Sea-spoils and shells from many a distant shore,
And furry robe from frozen Labrador
- 145 Our busy streets and sylvan-walks between,
Fen, marshes, bog, and heath all intervene,
Here pits of clag, with spongy, plashy base,
To some enrich th' uncultivated space For there are blossoms rare, and curious rush,
- 150 The gale's¹ rich balm, and sun-dew's¹ crimson blush, Whose velvet leaf with radiant beauty dress'd, Forms a gay pillow for the plover's breast
Not distant far, a house commodious made, (Lonely yet public stands) for Sunday-trade,
- 155 Thither, for this day free, gay parties go,
Their tea-house walk, their tippling rendezvous,
There humble couples sit in corner-bowers,
Or gaily ramble for th' allotted hours.
Sailors and lasses from the town attend,
- 160 The servant-lover, the apprentice-friend.
With all the idle social tribes who seek.
And find their humble pleasures once a week Turn to the watery world¹—but who to thee (A wonder yet unview'd) shall paint—the sea?
- 165 Various and vast, sublime in all its forms, When lull'd by zephyrs, or when roused by storms,
- Its colors changing; when from clouds and sun Shades after shades upon the surface run, Embrown'd and horrid¹ now, and now serene, 170 In limpid blue, and evanescent green;
And off the foggy banks on ocean lie, Lift the fair sail, and cheat th' experienced eye
Be it the summer-noon a sandy space
The ebbing tide has left upon its place.
175 Then just the hot and stony beach above.
Light twinkling streams in bright confusion move, (For heated thus, the warmer air ascends, And with the cooler in its fall contends)— Then the broad bosom of the ocean keeps 180 An equal motion, swelling as it sleeps.
Then slowly sinking, curling to the strand, Faint, larv waves o'ercreep the ridgy sand,
Or tap the tarry boat with gentle blow,
And back return in silence, smooth and slow 185 Ships in the calm seem anchor'd, for they glide On the still sea, urged solely by the tide, Art thou not present, this calm scene before,
Where all beside is pebbly length of shore,
And far as eye can reach, it can discern no more?²
- 190 Yet sometimes comes a ruffling cloud to make The quiet surface of the ocean shake,
As an awaken'd giant with a frown Might show his wrath, and then to sleep sink down View now the winter-storm¹ above, one cloud, 195 Black and unbroken, all the skies o'er-shroud,
Th' unwieldy porpoise through the day before Had roll'd in view of boding men on shore,
And sometimes hid and sometimes show'd his form, Dark as the cloud, and furious as the storm 200 All where the eye delights, yet dreads to roam.
The breaking billows cast the flying foam Upon the billows rising—all the deep Is restless change; the waves so swell'd and steep, Breaking and sinking, and the sunken swells,

But nearer land you may the billows trace,
As if contending in their watery chase;
May watch the mightiest till the shoal

And then re-flowing, take their grating
course.
Raking the rounded flints, which ages past Roll'd by their rage, and shall to ages last.
Far off the petrel in the troubled way
- 215 Swims with her brood, or flutters in the spray;
She rises often, often drops again.
And sports at ease on the tempestuous
main High o'er the restless deep, above the

Of gunner's hope, vast flights of wild-ducks stretch.
- 220 Far as the eye can glance on either side
In a broad space and level line they glide.
All in their wedge-like figures from the north,
Day after day, flight after flight go forth In-shore their passage tribes of seagulls urge.
- 225 And drop for prey within the sweeping

Oft in the rough opposing blast they fly Far back, then turn, and all their force

Hark! to those sounds! they're from distress at sea
How quick they come! What terrors may there be!
- Yes, 'tis a driven vessel. I discern Lights, signs of terror, gleaming from the stern;
- 245 Others behold them too, and from the town
In various parties seamen hurry down.
Their wives pursue, and damsels urged by dread,
Lest men so dear be into danger led.
Their head the gown has hooded, and their call
- 250 In this sad night is piercing like the squall; They feel their kinds of power, and when they meet, Chide, fondle, weep, dare, threaten, or entreat.
See one poor girl, all terror and alarm.
Has fondly seized upon her lover's arm.
- 255 “Thou shalt not venture,” and he answers, “No!
I will not”—still she cries, “Thou shalt not go”
No need of this, not here the stoutest
boat (Can through such breakers, o'er such billows float,
Yet may they view these lights upon the beach,
- 260 Which yield them hope, whom help can never reach
From parted clouds the moon her radiance throws
On the wild waves, and all the danger
shows,
But shows them beaming in her shining vest,
Terrific splendor! gloom in glory dress'd!
- 265 This for a moment, and then clouds again Hide every beam, and fear and darkness
reign
But hear we now those sounds? Do lights appear?
I see them not! the storm alone I hear And lo! the sailors homeward take their
way.
- 270 Man must endure—let us submit and pray.
Such are our winter-views; but night comes on—
Now business sleeps, and daily cares are gone.
Now parties form, and some their friends assist
To waste the idle hours at sober whist.
The tavern's pleasure or the concert's charm
- 275 Unnumber'd moments of their sting disarm;
Play-bills and open doors a crowd invite,
To pass off one dread portion of the night,
And show and song and luxury combined,

- 280 Lift off from man this burthen of mankind.
 Others advent'rous walk abroad and
 meet Returning parties pacing through the street,
 When various voices, in the dying day, Hum in our walks, and greet us in our
 way;
 285 When tavern-lights flit on from room to room,
 And guide the tippling sailor staggering
 home.
 There as we pass, the jingling bells betray How business rises with the closing day
 Now walking silent, by the river's side.
 290 The ear perceives the rippling of the tide,
 Or measured cadence of the lads who tow
 Some enter'd hoy, to fix her in her row.
 Or hollow sound, which from the parish-
 bell
 To some departed spirit bids farewell' 295 Thus shall you something of our Borough
 know,
 Far as a verse, with Fancy's aid, can show,
 Of sea or river, of a quay or street,
 The best description must be incomplete, But when a happier theme succeeds, and when 300 Men are our subjects and the deeds of men, Then may we find the Muse in happier style,
 And we may sometimes sigh and sometimes smile

WILLIAM LISLE BOWLES (1762-1850)

AT TYNEMOUTH PRIORY

1789

- As slow I climb the cliff's ascending side.
 Much musing on the track of terror past, When o'er the dark wave rode the howling blast,
 Pleased I look back, and view the tranquil tide 5 That laves the pebbled shore and now the beam
 Of evening smiles on the gray battlement.
 And yon forsaken tower that time has rent.
 The lifted oar far off with transient gleam Is touched, and hushed is all the billow's
 deep'
 10 Soothed by the scene, thus on tired Nature's breast
 A stillness slowly steals, and kindred rest, While sea-sounds lull her, as she sinks to
 sleep,
 Like melodies that mourn upon the lyre.
 Waked by the breeze, and, as they mourn, expire!

THE BELLS, OSTEND

1787

1789

- How sweet the tuneful bells' responsive peal!
 As when, at opening morn, the fragrant
 breeze
 Breathes on the trembling sense of pale disease,
 So piercing to my heart their force I feel' 5 And hark! with lessening cadence now they fall!
 And now, along the white and level tide.
 They fling their melancholy music wide, Bidding me many a tender thought recall Of summer days, and those delightful years 10 When from an ancient tower, in life's fan prime,
 The mournful magic of then mingling chime
 First waked my wondering childhood into tears'
 But seeming now, when all those days are o'er,
 The sounds of joy once heard, and heard no
 more

BEREAVEMENT

1789

- Whose was that gentle voice, that, whispering sweet, Promised, methought, long days of bliss sincere!
 Soothing it stole on my deluded ear,
 Most like soft music, that might sometimes cheat 5 Thoughts dark and drooping 'Twas the voice of Hope
 Of love, and social scenes, it seemed to
 speak,
 Of truth, of friendship, of affection meek.
 That oh! poor friend, nought to life's downward slope
 Lead us in peace, and bless our latest hours.
 10 Ah me! the prospect saddened as she sung, Loud on my startled ear the death-bell
 rung.
 'Hill darkness wrapt the pleasurable
 bowers,
 Whilst Horror pointing to you breathless
 clay,
 "No peace be thine," exclaimed, "away,
 away!"

RAMBOROUGH CASTLE

1789

- Ye holy towers that shade the wave-worn steep.
 Long may ye rear your aged brows sublime, Though, hurrying silent by, relentless Time

Assail you, and the winds of winter sweep 5 Round your dark battlements; for far from halls
 Of Pride, here Charity hath fixed her seat.
 Oft listening, tearful, when the tempest-beat
 With hollow bodings round your ancient walls;
 And Pity, at the dark and stormy hour 10 Of midnight, when the moon is hid on high, Keeps her lone watch upon the topmost tower,
 And turns her ear to each expiring cry, Blessed if her aid some fainting wretch may save,
 And snatch him cold and speechless from the wave

HOPE 1789

As one who, long by wasting sickness worn, Weary has watched the lingering night, and
 heard Unmoved the carol of the matin bird Salute his lonely porch, now first at morn 5 Goes forth, leaving his melancholy bed.
 He the green slope and level meadow views Delightful bathed with slow-ascending dews;
 Or marks the clouds, that o'er the mountain's head
 In varying forms fantastic wander white.
 10 Or turns his ear to every random song, Heard the green river's winding marge
 along,
 The whilst each sense is steeped in still
 delight
 So o'er my breast young Summer's breath
 I feel,
 Sweet Hope! thy fragrance pure and healing incense steal!

INFLUENCE OF TIME ON GRIEF 1789

O Time! who know'st a lenient hand to lay Softest on sorrow's wounds, and slowly
 thence,
 Lulling to sad repose the weary sense.
 The faint pang stealest unperceived away 5 On thee I rest my only hope at last,
 And think, when thou hast dried the bitter
 That flows in vain o'er all my soul held
 dear,
 I may look back on every sorrow past,
 And meet life's peaceful evening with a smile;—
 10 As some lone bird, at day's departing hour,

Sings in the sunbeam, of the transient shower
 Forgetful, though its wings are wet the while;—
 Yet ah! how much must that poor heart
 endure,
 Which hopes from thee, and thee alone, a cure

APPROACH OF SUMMER 1789

How shall I meet thee, Summer, wont to fill My heart with gladness, when thy pleasant tide
 First came, and on the Coomb's romantic side
 Was heard the distant cuckoo's hollow
 bill!
 5 Fresh flowers shall fringe the margin of the stream,
 As with the songs of joyance and of hope The hedge-rows shall ring loud, and on the slope
 The poplars sparkle in the passing beam.
 The shrubs and laurels that I loved to tend, 10 Thinking their May-tide fragrance would
 delight,
 With many a peaceful charm, thee, my poor friend,
 Shall put forth their green shoots, and cheer the sight!
 But I shall mark their hues with sadder
 eyes,
 And weep the more for one who in the cold earth lies!

ABSENCE 1793

There is strange music in the stirring wind, When lowers the autumnal eve, and all
 alone
 To the dark wood's cold covert thou art
 gone,
 Whose ancient trees on the rough slope reclined
 5 Rock, and at times scatter their tresses sere If in such shades, beneath their murmur-
 ing,
 Thou late hast passed the happier hours of
 spring,
 With sadness thou wilt mark the fading
 year;
 Chiefly if one, with whom such sweets at morn 10 Or evening thou hast shared, afar shall stray
 O Spring, return! return, auspicious May!

' bell boom

But sad will be thy coming, and forlorn,
If she return not with thy cheering ray,
Who from these shades is gone, far, far
away

WILLIAM BLAKE (1757-1827)

TO SPRING
1783

O thou with dewy locks, who lookest down Through the clear windows of the morning, turn Thine angel eyes upon our western isle,
Which in full choir hails thy approach,
O Spring!

5 The hills tell each other, and the listening Valleys hear, all our longing eyes are turned
Up to thy bright pavilions issue forth,
And let thy holy feet visit our clime

Come o'er the eastern hills, and let our winds

10 Kiss thy perfumèd garments, let us taste Thy morn and evening breath, scatter thy pearls Upon our love-sick land that mourns for
thee

O deck her forth with thy fair fingers, pour Thy soft kisses on her bosom, and put 15 Thy golden crown upon her languished

head,
Whose modest tresses were bound up for thee

HOW SWEET I ROAMED
1783

How sweet I roamed from field to field,
And tasted all the summer's pride, Till I the Prince of Love beheld,
Who in the sunny beams did glide

5 He showed me lilies for my hair,
And blushing roses for my brow,
He led me through his gardens fair,
Where all his golden pleasures grow

With sweet May dews my wings were wet, 10 And Phœbus fired my vocal rage.
He caught me in his silken net,
And shut me in his golden cage.

He loves to sit and hear me sing, Then, laughing, sports and plays with
me;

15 Then stretches out my golden wing,
And mocks my loss of liberty.

MY SILKS AND FINE ARRAY 1783

My silks and fine array,
My smiles and languished air,
By love are driven away;
And mournful lean Despair
5 Brings me vew to deck my grave Such end true lovers have

His face is fair as heaven
When springing buds unfold, O, why to him was't given,
10 Whose heart is wintry cold?
His breast is love's all-worshipped tomb.
Where all love's pilgrims come

Bring me an axe and spade,
Bring me a winding-sheet, 15 When I my grave have made.
Let winds and tempests beat:
Then down I'll lie, as cold as clay True love doth pass away!

TO THE MUSES
1783

Whether on Ida's shady brow,
Or in the chambers of the East,
The chambers of the sun, that now
From ancient melody have ceased.

5 Whether in Heaven ye wander fair,
Or the green corners of the earth,
Or the blue regions of the air
Where the melodious winds have birth,

Whether on crystal rocks ye rove, 10 Beneath the bosom of the sea,
Wandering in many a coral grove, Fair Nine, forsaking Poetry!

How have you left the ancient love
That bards of old enjoyed in you!
15 The languid strings do scarcely move,
The sound is forced, the notes are few!

INTRODUCTION TO SONGS OF INNOCENCE
1789

Piping down the valleys wild, Piping songs of pleasant glee,
On a cloud I saw a child,
And he, laughing, said to me:

5 "Pipe a song about a Lamb!"
So I piped with merry cheer
"Piper, pipe that song again;"
So I piped: he wept to hear.

“Drop thy pipe, thy happy pipe, 10 Sing thy songs of happy cheer!”
 So I sang the same again,
 While he wept with joy to hear.

“Pipe, sit thee down, and write In a book, that all may read” 15 So he vanished from my sight,
 And I plucked a hollow reed,

And I made a rural pen,
 And I stained the water clear,
 And I wrote my happy songs 20 Every child may joy to hear

THE SHEPHERD

1789

How sweet is the shepherd's sweet lot!
 From the morn to the evening he strays,
 He shall follow his sheep all the day,
 And his tongue shall be fill'd with praise.

5 For he hears the lambs' innocent call,
 And he hears the ewes' tender reply,
 He is watchful while they are in peace,
 For they know when their shepherd is nigh

THE LITTLE BLACK BOY

1789

My mother bore me in the southern wild,
 And I am black, but O, my soul is white!
 White as an angel is the English child,
 But I am black, as if bereaved of light

5 My mother taught me underneath a tree.
 And, sitting down before the heat of
 day,
 She took me on her lap and kiss'd me.
 And, pointing to the East, began to say.

“Look on the rising sun there God does
 live, 10 And gives His light, and gives His heat
 away,
 And flowers and trees and beasts and men receive Comfort in morning, joy in the noon-
 day

“And we are put on earth a little space, That we may learn to bear the beams of love,
 15 And these black bodies and this sunburnt face
 Are but a cloud, and like a shady grove

“For, when our souls have learned the heat to bear,
 The cloud will vanish, we shall hear His voice,

Saying. ‘Come out from the grove, my love and care, 20 And round my golden tent like lambs rejoice.’”

Thus did my mother say, and kiss'd me,
 And thus I say to little English boy, When I from black, and he from white cloud free,
 And round the tent of God like lambs we joy.

25 I'll shade him from the heat till he can bear To lean in joy upon our Father's knee.
 And then I'll stand and stroke his silver
 hair,
 And be like him, and he will then love me

LAUGHING SONG

1789

When the green woods laugh with the voice of joy,
 And the dimpling stream runs laughing by;
 When the air does laugh with our merry wit,
 And the green hill laughs with the noise of it.

5 When the meadows laugh with lively
 green,
 And the grasshopper laughs in the merry
 scene,
 When Mary and Susan and Emily
 With their sweet round mouths sing “Ha ha he!”

When the painted birds laugh in the shade, 10 Where our table with cherries and nuts is spread
 Come live, and be merry, and join with me,
 To sing the sweet chorus of “Ha ha he!”

THE DIVINE IMAGE

1789

To Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love,
 All pray in their distress,
 And to these virtues of delight Return their thankfulness

5 For Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love, Is God, our Father dear;
 And Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love,
 Is man, His child and care.

For Mercy has a human heart;
 10 Pity, a human face;
 And Love, the human form divine;
 And Peace, the human dress

- Then every man of every clime,
That prays in his distress, 15 Prays to the human form divine Love, Mercy, Pity, Peace
- And all must love the human form.
In heathen, Turk, or Jew.
Where Mercy, Love, and Pity dwell, 20 There God is dwelling too

A DREAM
1789

- Once a dream did weave a shade
O'er my angel-guarded bed,
That an emmet¹ lost its way Where on grass methought I lay
- 5 Troubled, wildered, and forlorn.
Dark, benighted, travel-worn.
Over many a tangled spray.
All heart-broke, I heard her say
- "O my children! do they cry, 10 Do they hear their father sigh,
Now they look abroad to see.
Now return and weep for me "
- Pitying, I dropped a tear
But I saw a glow-worm near.
15 Who replied "What wailing wight Calls the watchman of the night "
- "I am set to light the ground.
While the beetle goes his round!
Follow now the beetle's hum.
20 Little wanderer, hie thee home!"

THE BOOK OF THEL.
1789

THEL'S MOTTO

Does the eagle know what is in the pit.
Or wilt thou go ask the mole?
Can wisdom be put in a silver rod Or love in a golden bowl?

I

- The Daughters of the Seraphim led round their sunny flocks—
All but the youngest, she in paleness sought the secret air, To fade away like morning beauty from her mortal day
Down by the river of Adona her soft voice is heard, 5 And thus her gentle lamentation falls like morning dew:
"O life of this, our Spring! why fades the lotus of the water?

¹ ant

- Why fade these children of the Spring, born but to smile and fall?
Ah! Thel is like a watery bow, and like a parting cloud,
Like a reflection in a glass, like shadows in the water, 10 Like dreams of infants, like a smile upon an infant's face,
Like the dove's voice, like transient day.
like music in the air.
Ah! gentle may I lay me down, and gentle rest my head, And gentle sleep the sleep of death, and gentle hear the voice Of Him that walketh in the garden in the evening time!"
- 15 The Lily of the Valley, breathing in the humble grass, Answered the lovely maid, and said "I am a watery weed,
And I am very small, and love to dwell in lowly vales.
So weak, the gilded butterfly scarce perches on my head Yet I am visited from heaven, and He that smiles on all, Walks in the valley, and each morn over me spreads His hand, 20 Saying, 'Rejoice, thou humble grass, thou new-born lily-flower, Thou gentle maid of silent valleys and of modest brooks.
For thou shalt be clothed in light and fed with morning manna.
Till summer's heat melts thee beside the fountains and the springs.
To flourish in eternal vales' Then why should Thel complain?
- 25 Why should the mistress of the vales of Har utter a sigh?"
She ceased, and smiled in tears, then sat down in her silver shrine
- Thel answered "O thou little virgin of the peaceful valley, giving to those that cannot crave, the voiceless, the o'ertired.
Thy breath doth nourish the innocent lamb, he smells thy milky garments.
30 He crops thy flowers, while thou sittest smiling in his face, Wiping his mild and meek² mouth from all contagious taints Thy wine doth purify the golden honey.
thy perfume,
Which thou dost scatter on every little blade of grass that springs,

² gentle

fire-breathing steed.

¹⁵ But Thel is like a faint cloud kindled at the rising sun.

I vanish from my pearly throne, and who shall find my place?"

"Queen of the vales," the Lily answered.

"ask the tender Cloud,
And it shall tell thee why it glitters in the morning sky,

And why it scatters its bright beauty through the humid air

⁴⁰ Descend, O little Cloud, and hover before the eyes of Thel "

The Cloud descended, and the Lily bowed her modest head,

And went to mind her numerous charge among the verdant grass

||

"O little Cloud," the virgin said, "I charge thee tell to me

Why thou complainest not, when in one hour thou fad'st away

⁴⁵ Then we shall seek thee, but not find Ah! Thel is like to thee--

I pass away, yet I complain, and no one hears my voice "

The Cloud then showed his golden head, and his bright form emerged,

Hovering and glittering on the air, before the face of Thel

"O virgin, know'st thou not our steeds drink of the golden springs

⁵⁰ Where Luvah doth renew his horses' ¹ Look'st thou on my youth,

And fearest thou because I vanish and am seen no more?

Nothing remains O maid, I tell thee, when I pass away.

It is to tenfold life, to love, to peace, and raptures holy

Unseen, descending, weigh my light wings upon balmy flowers,

⁵⁵ And court the fair-eyed Dew to take me to her shining tent

The weeping virgin, trembling, kneels before the risen sun,

Till we arise, linked in a golden band, and never part,

But walk united, bearing food to all our tender flowers "

"Dost thou, O little Cloud? I fear that I am not like thee,

⁶⁰ For I walk through the vales of Har, and smell the sweetest flowers,

But I feed not the little flowers; I hear the warbling birds,

But I feed not the warbling birds—they fly and seek their food.

But Thel delights in these no more, because I fade away,

And all shall say, 'Without a use this shining woman lived;

⁶⁵ Or did she only live to be at death the food of worms?"

The Cloud reclined upon his airy throne, and answered thus

"Then if thou art the food of worms, O virgin of the skies,

How great thy use, how great thy blessing! Everything that lives

⁷⁰ Lives not alone nor for itself ¹ Fear not, and I will call

The weak Worm from its lowly bed, and thou shalt hear its voice

Come forth, Worm of the silent valley, to thy pensive queen "

|||

The helpless Worm arose, and sat upon the Lily's leaf,

And the bright Cloud sailed on to find his partner in the vale

⁷⁵ Then Thel, astonished, viewed the Worm upon its dewy bed

"Art thou a worm, image of weakness?
art thou but a worm?

I see thee, like an infant, wrapped in the Lily's leaf

Ah! weep not, little voice, thou canst not speak, but thou canst weep

Is this a worm? I see thee he helpless and naked, weeping,

⁸⁰ And none to answer, none to cherish thee with mother's smiles "

The Clod of Clay heard the Worm's voice, and raised her pitying head.

She bowed over the weeping infant, and her life exhaled

In milky fondness, then on Thel she fixed her humble eyes

"O beauty of the vales of Har! we live not for ourselves.

⁸⁵ Thou seest me, the meanest thing, and so I am indeed.

My bosom of itself is cold, and of itself is dark.

But He that loves the lowly pours His oil upon my head,

And kisses me, and binds His nuptial bands around my breast,

And says: 'Thou mother of my children, 115
I have loved thee,

90 And I have given thee a crown that none can take away.'

But how this is, sweet maid, I know not,
and I cannot know;

I ponder, and I cannot ponder, yet I live and love!"

The Daughter of Beauty wiped her pitying tears with her white veil,

And said "Alas! I knew not this, and 120
therefore did I weep

95 That God would love a worm I knew, and punish the evil foot

That wilful bruised its helpless form;¹ but that He cherished it

With milk and oil, I never knew, and therefore did I weep

And I complained in the mild air, because I fade away,

And lay me down in thy cold bed, and 125 leave my shining lot "

100 "Queen of the vales," the matron Clay answered, "I heard thy sighs,

And all thy moans flew o'er my roof, but I have called them down

Wilt thou, O queen, enter my house?
'Tis given thee to enter,

And to return: fear nothing, enter with thy virgin feet "

IV

The eternal gates' terrific porter lifted the northern bar,

105 Thel entered in, and saw the secrets of the land unknown

She saw the couches of the dead, and where fibrous root

Of every heart on earth infixes deep its restless twists,

A land of sorrows and of tears, where never smile was seen

She wandered in the land of clouds, through valleys dark, listening

110 Dolours and lamentations; waiting oft beside a dewy grave,

She stood in silence, listening to the voices of the ground,

Till to her own grave-plot she came, and there she sat down,

And heard this voice of sorrow breathed from the hollow pit

¹ See Cowper's The Task, 6, 560 ff (p 148)

"Why cannot the ear be closed to its own destruction?

115 Or the glistening eye to the poison of a smile?

Why are eyelids stored with arrows ready dawn,

Where a thousand fighting-men in ambush lie,

Or an eye of gifts and graces showering fruits and coined gold?

Why a tongue impressed with honey from every wind?

120 Why an ear, a whirlpool fierce to draw creations in?

Why a nostril wide-inhaling terror, trembling, and affright?

Why a tender curb upon the youthful burning boy?

Why a little curtain of flesh on the bed of our desire?"

The Virgin started from her seat, and with a shriek

125 Fled back unhindered till she came into the vales of Har

THE CLOD AND THE PEBBLE

1794

"Love seeketh not itself to please.

Nor for itself hath any care,

But for another gives its ease,

And builds a heaven in hell's despair "

5 So sung a little clod of clay, Trodden with the cattle's feet,

But a pebble of the brook

Warbled out these metres meet

10 "Love seeketh only self to please,

To bind another to its delight,

Joys in another's loss of ease,

And builds a hell in heaven's despite "

HOLY THURSDAY

1794

Is this a holy thing to see

In a rich and fruitful land,—

Babes reduced to misery,

Fed with cold and usurous hand?

5 Is that trembling cry a song?

Can it be a song of joy?

And so many children poor?

It is a land of poverty!

10 And their sun does never shine,

And their fields are bleak and bare.

And their ways are filled with thorns—

It is eternal winter there.

For where'er the sun does shine,
 And where'er the rain does fall, 15 Babe can never hunger there, Nor poverty the mind appal

THE CHIMNEY-SWEEPER

1794

A little black thing among the snow, Crying "weep! weep!" in notes of woe,
 "Where are thy father and mother?
 Say!"—

"They are both gone up to church to pray

5 "Because I was happy upon the heath,
 And smiled among the winter's snow,
 They clothed me in the clothes of death,
 And taught me to sing the notes of woe

"And because I am happy, and dance and sing,

10 They think they have done me no injury,
 And are gone to praise God and His priest and king,
 Who make up a heaven of our misery "

NURSE'S SONG

1794

When the voices of children are heard on the green,

And whisperings are in the dale,
 The days of my youth rise fresh in my
 mind,

My face turns green and pale

5 Then come home my children, the sun is gone down,

And the dews of night arise, Your spring and your day are wasted in
 play,

And your winter and night in disguise

THE TIGER

1794

Tiger, tiger, burning bright
 In the forests of the night,
 What immortal hand or eye
 Could frame thy fearful symmetry?

5 In what distant deeps or skies Burnt the fire of thine eyes?
 On what wings dare he aspire?
 What the hand dare seize the fire?

10 And what shoulder and what art Could twist the sinews of thy heart?
 And, when thy heart began to beat,
 What dread hand and what dread feet?

What the hammer? what the chain?
 In what furnace was thy brain?
 15 What the anvil? what dread grasp Dare its deadly terrors clasp?

When the stars threw down their spears,
 And watered heaven with their tears, 20 Did He smile His work to see?
 Did He who made the lamb make thee?

Tiger, tiger, burning bright
 In the forests of the night,
 What immortal hand or eye
 Dare frame thy fearful symmetry?

AH, SUNFLOWER

1794

Ah, Sunflower, weary of time,
 Who countest the steps of the sun;
 Seeking after that sweet golden clime
 Where the traveller's journey is done,

5 Where the youth pined away with desire,
 And the pale virgin shrouded in snow,
 Arise from their graves, and aspire Where my Sunflower wishes to go!

THE GARDEN OF LOVE

1794

I went to the Garden of Love,
 And saw what I never had seen;
 A chapel was built in the midst,
 Where I used to play on the green

5 And the gates of this chapel were shut, And 'Thou shalt not' writ over the
 door.
 So I turned to the Garden of Love
 That so many sweet flowers bore

10 And I saw it was filled with graves, And tombstones where flowers should be;
 And priests in black gowns were walking their rounds,
 And binding with briars my joys and desires

A POISON TREE

1794

I was angry with my friend,
 I told my wrath, my wrath did end.
 I was angry with my foe:
 I told it not, my wrath did grow

5 And I watered it in fears Night and morning with my tears,
 And I sunned it with smiles
 And with soft deceitful wiles.

And it grew both day and night, 10 Till it bore an apple bright,
 And my foe beheld it shine,
 And he knew that it was mine,—

And into my garden stole
 When the night had veiled the pole.
 15 In the morning, glad, I see My foe outstretched beneath the tree

A CRADLE SONG

1794

Sleep! sleep! beauty bright, Dreaming o'er the joys of night
 Sleep! sleep! in thy sleep Little sorrows sit and weep

5 Sweet babe, in thy face Soft desires I can trace, Secret joys and secret smiles,
 Little pretty infant wiles

As thy softest limbs I feel, 10 Smiles as of the morning steal O'er thy cheek, and o'er thy breast Where thy little heart does rest

O! the cunning wiles that creep
 In thy little heart asleep 15 When thy little heart does wake,
 Then the dreadful lightnings break

From thy cheek and from thy eye O'er the youthful harvests high Infant wiles and infant smiles, 20 Heaven and Earth of peace beguiles

AUGURIES OF INNOCENCE

1801-3

1803

To see a world in a grain of sand,
 And a heaven in a wild flower,
 Hold infinity in the palm of your hand,
 And eternity in an hour

5 A robin redbreast in a cage Puts all heaven in a rage,
 A dove-house filled with doves and pigeons Shudders hell through all its regions
 A dog starved at his master's gate 10 Predicts the ruin of the state A game-cock clipped and armed for fight Doth the rising sun affright;
 A horse misused upon the road Calls to heaven for human blood Every wolf's and lion's howl 15 Raises from hell a human soul;
 Each outcry of the hunted hare
 A fibre from the brain does tear;
 A skylark wounded on the wing 20 Doth make a cherub cease to sing

He who shall hurt the little wren Shall never be beloved by men;
 He who the ox to wrath has moved Shall never be by woman loved;
 25 He who shall train the horse to war Shall never pass the polar bar
 The wanton boy that kills the fly Shall feel the spider's enmity,
 He who torments the chafer's spite 30 Weaves a bower in endless night
 The caterpillar on the leaf Repeats to thee thy mother's grief,
 The wild deer wandering here and
 there

Keep the human soul from care.
 35 The lamb misused breeds public strife
 And yet forgives the butcher's knife Kill not the moth nor butterfly,
 For the last judgment draweth nigh.
 The beggar's dog and widow's cat, 40 Feed them and thou shalt grow fat Every tear from every eye Becomes a babe in eternity.
 The bleat, the bark, bellow, and roar,
 Are waves that beat on heaven's shore

45 The bat, that flits at close of eve,
 Has left the brain that won't believe,
 The owl, that calls upon the night,
 Speaks the unbeliever's flight.
 The gnat, that sings his summer's song, 50 Poison gets from Slander's tongue,
 The poison of the snake and newt
 Is the sweat of Envy's foot,
 The poison of the honey-bee
 Is the artist's jealousy.
 55 The strongest poison ever known Came from Cæsar's laurel crown

Nought can deform the human race
 Like to the armorer's iron brace,
 The soldier armed with sword and gun 60 Palsied strikes the summer's sun
 When gold and gems adorn the plough,
 To peaceful arts shall Envy bow
 The beggar's rags fluttering in air
 Do to rags the heavens' tear.
 65 The prince's robes and beggar's rags Are toadstools on the miser's bags

One mite wrung from the laborer's hands
 Shall buy and sell the miser's lands,
 Or, if protected from on high, 70 Shall that whole nation sell and buy;
 The poor man's farthing is worth more Than all the gold on Afric's shore.
 The whore and gambler, by the state Licensed, build that nation's fate.

75 The harlot's cry from street to street Shall weave Old England's winding sheet,
 The winner's shout, the loser's curse,
 Shall dance before dead England's hearse

He who mocks the infant's faith 90 Shall be mocked in age and death,
 He who shall teach the child to doubt
 The rotting grave shall ne'er get out,
 He who respects the infant's faith Triumphs over hell and death.
 95 The babe is more than swaddling-bands Throughout all these human lands, Tools were made, and born were hands.
 Every farmer understands

The questioner who sits so sly 90 Shall never know how to reply,
 He who replies to words of doubt Doth put the light of knowledge out,
 A riddle, or the cricket's cry,
 Is to doubt a fit reply
 95 The child's toys and the old man's reasons Are the fruits of the two seasons
 The emmet's¹ inch and eagle's mile Make lame philosophy to smile
 A truth that's told with bad intent 100 Beats all the lies you can invent He who doubts from what he sees
 Will ne'er believe, do what you please,
 If the sun and moon should doubt,
 They'd immediately go out

105 Every night and every morn
 Some to misery are born,
 Every morn and every night
 Some are born to sweet delight,
 Some are born to sweet delight,
 110 Some are born to endless night
 Joy and woe are woven fine,
 A clothing for the soul divine,
 Under every grief and pine Runs a joy with silken twine 115 It is right it should be so,
 Man was made for joy and woe.
 And, when this we rightly know, Safely through the world we go

We are led to believe a lie 120 When we see with not through the eye Which was born in a night to perish in a
 night
 When the soul slept in beams of light God appears, and God is light
 To those poor souls who dwell in night, 125 But doth a human form display
 To those who dwell in realms of day

THE MENTAL TRAVELLER
 1801 1803

I travelled through a land of men,
 A land of men and women too;
 And heard and saw such dreadful things
 As cold earth-wanderers never knew

5 For there the babe is born in joy
 That was begotten in dire woe,
 Just as we reap in joy the fruit
 Which we in bitter tears did sow

• And, if the babe is born a boy.
 10 He's given to a woman old,
 Who nails him down upon a rock,
 Catches his shrieks in cups of gold

She binds iron thorns around his head.
 She pierces both his hands and feet;
 15 She cuts his heart out at his side.
 To make it feel both cold and heat

Her fingers number every nerve.
 Just as a miser counts his gold,
 She lives upon his shrieks and cries, 20 And she grows young as he grows old

Till he becomes a bleeding youth,
 And she becomes a virgin bright.
 Then he rends up his manacles,
 And binds her down for his delight

25 He plants himself in all her nerves,
 Just as a husbandman his mould,
 And she becomes his dwelling-place
 And garden fruitful seventy-fold.

An aged shadow soon he fades, 30 Wandering round an earthly cot, Full-filled all with gems and gold Which he by industry had got

And these are the gems of the human soul.
 The rubies and pearls of a love-sick eye, 35 The countless gold of the aching heart,
 The martyr's groan and the lover's sigh

They are his meat, they are his drink.
 He feeds the beggar and the poor.
 To the wayfaring traveller 40 Forever open is his door

His grief is their eternal joy,
 They make the roofs and walls to ring,
 Till from the fire upon the hearth
 A little female babe doth spring.

45 And she is all of solid fire
 And gems and gold, that none has hand

Dares stretch to touch her baby form,
Or wrap her in his swaddling-band

But she comes to the man she loves, 50 If young or old or rich or poor.
They soon drive out the aged host,
A beggar at another's door

He wanders weeping far away, Until some other take him in, 55 Oft blind and age-bent, sore distressed, Until he can a maiden win

And, to allay his freezing age,
The poor man takes her in his arms,
The cottage fades before his sight, 60 The garden and its lovely charms

The guests are scattered through the land,
For the eye altering alters all,
The senses roll themselves in fear,
And the flat earth becomes a ball

65 The stars, sun, moon, all shrink away
A desert vast without a bound,
And nothing left to eat or drink,
And a dark desert all around

The honey of her infant lips, 70 The bread and wine of her sweet smile,
The wild game of her roving eye,
Do him to infancy beguile

For as he eats and drinks, he grows Younger and younger every day, 75 And on the desert wild, they both Wander in terror and dismay

Like the wild stag she flies away,
Her fear plants many a thicket wild,
While he pursues her night and day 80 By various art of love beguiled,

By various arts of love and hate, Till the wild desert planted o'er With labyrinths of wayward love,
Where roam the lion, wolf, and boar,

85 Till he becomes a wayward babe,
And she a weeping woman old,
Then many a lover wanders here,
The sun and stars are nearer rolled,

The trees bring forth sweet ecstasy 90 To all who in the desert roam; Till many a city there is built
And many a pleasant shepherd's home

But, when they find the frowning babe, Terror strikes through the region wide;
95 They cry: "The babe! the babe is born!"
And flee away on every side

For who dare touch the frowning form,
His arms is withered to its root.
Bears, lions, wolves, all howling flee.
100 And every tree doth shed its fruit

And none can touch that frowning form Except it be a woman old,
She nails him down upon the rock,
And all is done as I have told

COUPLET

Great things are done when men and mountains meet,
These are not done by jostling in the street

From MILTON

1804

And did those feet in ancient time Walk upon England's mountain green?
And was the holy Lamb of God
On England's pleasant pastures seen?

7 And did the Countenance Divine Shine forth upon our clouded hills?
And was Jerusalem builded here
Among these dark Satanic mills?

Bring me my bow of burning gold!
10 Bring me my arrows of desire!
Bring me my spear! O clouds, unfold!
Bring me my chariot of fire!

I will not cease from mental fight,
Nor shall my sword sleep in my hand.
15 Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land

TO THE QUEEN

1806 7

1808

The door of Death is made of gold,
That mortal eyes cannot behold,
But when the mortal eyes are closed,
And cold and pale the limbs reposed, 7 The soul awakes, and, wond'ring, sees In her mild hand the golden keys
The grave is heaven's golden gate,
And rich and poor around it wait
O Shepherdess of England's fold, 10 Behold this gate of pearl and gold!

To dedicate to England's Queen
The visions that my soul has seen,
And by her kind permission bring

What I have borne on solemn wing 15 From the vast regions of the grave, Before her throne my wings I wave, Bowing before my sov'reign's feet,
 The Grave produced these blossoms sweet,
 In mild repose from earthly strife, 20 The blossoms of eternal life.

ROBERT BURNS (1759-1796)

O, ONCE I LOV'D A BONIE¹ LASS 1771 1786

O, once I lov'd a bonie lass, Ay, and I love her still!
 And whilst that virtue warms my breast, I'll love my handsome Nell

5 As bonie lasses I hae² seen,
 And monie full as braw,³
 But for a modest, gracefu' mien,
 The like I never saw

A bonie lass, I will confess, 10 Is pleasant to the e'e,
 But without some better qualities
 She's no a lass for me

But Nelly's looks are blythe and sweet,
 And what is best of a', 15 Her reputation is complete,
 And fair without a flaw

She dresses ay sae clean and neat, Both decent and genteel
 And then there's something in her gait 20 Gars⁴ onie dress look weel.

A gaudy dress and gentle air
 May slightly touch the heart, But it's innocence and modesty
 That polishes the dair.

25 'Tis this in Nelly pleases me,
 'Tis this enchants my soul,
 For absolutely in my breast
 She reigns without control

A PRAYER IN THE PROSPECT OF

1781 1786

O Thou unknown, Almighty Cause
 Of all my hope and fear!
 In whose dread presence, ere an hour,
 Perhaps I must appear!

5 If I have wander'd in those paths
 Of life I ought to shun,—

¹ pretty ² have

³ gallily dressed ⁴ makes

As something, loudly, in my breast, Remonstrates I have done,—

Thou know'st that Thou hast form'd me 10 With passions wild and strong,
 And list'ning to their witching voice
 Has often led me wrong.

Where human weakness has come short,
 Or frailty stept aside, 15 Do Thou, All-Good—for such Thou art—
 In shades of darkness hide.

Where with intention I have err'd, No other plea I have,
 But, Thou art good, and Goodness still 20 Delighteth to forgive

MARY MORISON

1781 1800

O Mary, at thy window be!
 It is the wish'd, the trysted hour
 Those smiles and glances let me see,
 That make the miser's treasure poor 5 How blithely wad I bide¹ the stoure,² A weary slave frae³ sun to sun,
 Could I the rich reward secure,
 The lovely Mary Morison!

Yestreen,⁴ when to the trembling string 10 The dance gaed⁵ thro' the lighted ha',
 To thee my fancy took its wing, I sat, but neither heard or saw:
 Tho' this was fair, and that was braw.⁶
 And yon the toast of a' the town, 15 I sigh'd, and said, among them a'
 "Ye are na Mary Morison!"

O Mary, canst thou wreck his peace Wha for thy sake wad gladly die?
 Or canst thou break that heart of his 20 Whase only faut⁷ is loving thee?
 If love for love thou wilt na gie,⁸
 At least be pity to me shown,
 A thought ungenteel canna be The thought o' Mary Morison.

 Then in an *arioso*⁸ key,

Her charms had struck a sturdy caird,¹
 As weel as poor gut-scraper;
 He takes the fiddler by the beard,
 And draws a roosty rapier,

THE HOLY FAIR!

A robe of seeming truth and trust Hid crafty observation,
And secret hung, with poison'd crust,
The dirk of defamation
A mask that like the gorget show'd

THE COTTER'S SATURDAY NIGHT

INSCRIBED TO ROBERT AIKEN, ESQ
1785 1786

Let not Ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, and destiny obscure,
Nor Grandeur hear, with a disdainful smile,
The short and simple annals of the poor
—GRAHAM'S Etc.

My lov'd, my honor'd, much respected
friend!

No mercenary bard his homage pays,
With honest pride, I scorn each selfish end My dearest meed a friend's esteem and praise.

⁵ To you I sing, in simple Scottish lays,
The lowly train in life's sequester'd scene,
The native feelings strong, the guileless ways,

What Aiken in a cottage would have been.
Ah! tho' his worth unknown, far happier there, I ween!

¹⁰ November chill blows loud wi' angry sigh,
The short'ning winter day is near a close.
The mry beasts retreating frae the plough.
The black'ning trains o' craws¹ to their repose,

The toil-worn cotter frae his labor goes,— ¹⁵ This night his weekly toil is at an end,— Collects his spades, his mattocks, and his hoes,
Hoping the morn in ease and rest to spend And weary, o'er the moor, his course does homeward bend

At length his lonely cot appears in view ²⁰ Beneath the shelter of an aged tree, Th' expectant wee-things, toddlin, stacher²
through
To meet their dad, wi' flucht³ noise and glee

His wee bit ingle,⁴ blinkin bonnie,⁵ His clean hearth-stane, his thrifty wife's
smile,

²⁵ The sleeping infant, prattling on his knee.
Does a' his weary kiaugh⁶ and care beguile,
An' makes him quite forget his labor and his toil

Belyve,⁷ the elder banns come drapping in.
At service out, amang the farmers roun'.

³⁰ Some ca⁸ the plough, some herd, some tentie⁹ rin

A cannie¹ errand to a neebor town:²
Their eldest hope, their Jenny, woman grown,

In youthfu' bloom, love sparkling in her
e'e,

Comes hame, perhaps, to shew a braw³ new gown,

³⁵ O! deposite her sair-won penny-fee,⁴
To help her parents dear, if they in hardship be

With joy unfeign'd, brothers and sisters
meet,

And each for other's weelfare kindly spies⁵

The social hours, swift-wing'd, unnotic'd fleet,

⁴⁰ Each tell the uncoss⁶ that he sees or hears The parents, partial, eye then hopeful
years,

Anticipation forward points the view,
The mother, wi' her needle and her sheers,

Gais⁷ auld claes look amais⁸ as weel's the
new;

⁴⁵ The father mixes a' wi' admonition due

Then master's and their mistress's command

The youngsters a' are warn'd to obey, And mind their labors wi' an eydent⁹
hand,

And ne'er, tho' out o' sight, to jauk¹⁰ on
play

⁵⁰ "And O! be sure to fear the Lord alway,
And mind your duty, duly, morn and night!
Lest in temptation's path ye gang astray, Implore His counsel and assisting might They never sought in vain that sought the Lord aright!"

⁵⁵ But hark! a rap comes gently to the door.
Jenny, wha kens¹¹ the meaning o' the same.
Tells how a neebor lad came o'er the moor,
To do some errands, and convoy her hame

The wily mother sees the conscious flame

⁶⁰ Sparkle in Jenny's e'e, and flush her cheek;

With heart-struck, anxious care, enquires his name,

While Jenny lassie¹¹ is afraid to speak.
Weel-pleas'd the mother hears it's nae

 65 A strappin' youth, he takes the mother's Blythe Jenny sees the visit's no ill taen, The father cracks² of horses, pleughs, and

 The youngster's artless heart o'erflows wi'
 joy,
 But, blate⁴ and laithfu',⁵ scarce can weel behave, 70 The mother, wi' a woman's wiles, can spy What makes the youth sae bashfu' and sae grave,
 Weel-pleas'd to think her bairn's respected like the lave⁶

O happy love! where love like this is
 found!
 O heart-felt raptures! bliss beyond compare!
 75 I've pac'd much this weary, mortal round,
 And sage experience bids me thus declare —
 "If Heaven a draught of heavenly pleasure spare,
 One cordial in this melancholy vale,
 'Tis when a youthful, loving, modest pair,
 80 In other's arms, breathe out the tender tale Beneath the milk-white thorn that scents the ev'ning gale"

Is there, in human form, that bears a heart,
 A wretch! a villain! lost to love and truth!
 That can, with studied, sly, ensnaring art, 85 Betray sweet Jenny's unsuspecting youth?
 Curse on his perjur'd arts! dissembling, smooth!
 Are honor, virtue, conscience, all evil'd?
 Is there no pity, no relenting ruth, Points to the parents fondling o'er their child?
 90 Then paints the ruin'd maid, and their distraction wild?

But now the supper crowns them simple

 The wholesome parritch,⁷ chief of Scotia's

¹² David

- 180 Had not on earth whereon to lay His head;
How His first followers and servants sped, The precepts sage they wrote to many a
land;
How he,¹ who lone in Patmos banish'd, Saw in the sun a mighty angel stand, 135 And heard great Bab'lon's doom pro-nounc'd by Heaven's command.
- Then kneeling down to Heaven's Eternal
King,
The saint, the father, and the husband prays Hope "springs exulting on triumphant wing,"²
That thus they all shall meet in future days, 140 There, ever bask in uncreated rays,
No more to sigh or shed the bitter tear,
Together hymning their Creator's praise,
In such society, yet still more dear, While circling Time moves round in an eternal sphere.
- 145 Compar'd with this, how poor Religion's
pride,
In all the pomp of method and of art,
When men display to congregations wide Devotion's ev'ry grace, except the heart,
The Power, incens'd, the pageant will desert,
150 The pompous strain, the sacerdotal stole,³ But haply, in some cottage far apart, May hear, well-pleas'd, the language of the
soul,
And in His Book of Life the inmates poor enroll
- Then homeward all take off their sev'ral
way, 155 The youngling cottagers retire to rest,
The parent-pair then secret homage pay,
And proffer up to Heaven the warm request,
That He, who stills the raven's clam'rous nest,⁴
And decks the hly fair in flow'ry pride,⁵ 160 Would, in the way His wisdom sees the best,
For them and for their little ones provide,
But, chiefly, in their hearts with Grace Divine preside
- From scenes like these, old Scotia's grandeur springs,
That makes her lov'd at home, rever'd
abroad.
- 165 Princes and lords are but the breath of kings,
"An honest man's the noblest work of God."⁶
And certes, in fair Virtue's heavenly road,
The cottage leaves the palace far behind.
What is a lordling's pomp? a cumbrous
load,
170 Disguising oft the wretch of human kind, Studied in arts of Hell, in wickedness
refin'd!
- O Scotia! my dear, my native soil!
For whom my warmest wish to Heaven is sent!
Long may thy hardy sons of rustic toil
Be blest with health, and peace, and sweet content!
175 And O! may Heaven their simple lives prevent
From Luxury's contagion, weak and vile!
Then, howe'er crowns and coronets be rent,
A virtuous populace may rise the while, 180 And stand a wall of fire around their much-lov'd Isle.
- O Thou, who pour'd the patriotic tide That stream'd thro' Wallace's undaunted
heart,
Who dar'd to nobly stem tyrannic pride,
Or nobly die, the second glorious part!
185 (The patriot's God, peculiarly Thou art, His friend, inspirer, guardian, and reward!)
- O never, never Scotia's realm desert,
But still the patriot and the patriot-bard In bright succession raise, her ornament and guard!

A BARD'S EPITAPH
1786 1788

Is there a whim-inspired fool, Owre fast for thought, owre hot for
rule, Owre blate¹ to seek, owre proud to snool?²—

Let him draw near,
5 And owre this grassy heap sing dool,³
And drap a tear.

Is there a bard of rustic song,
Who, noteless, steals the crowds among.
That weekly this aréa throng?⁴—10 O, pass not by!
But with a frater-feeling strong,
Here heave a sigh.

Is there a man whose judgment clear
Can others teach the course to steer.
15 Yet runs himself life's mad career Wild as the wave?⁵—
Here pause—and thro' the starting tear Survey this grave.

The poor inhabitant below 20 Was quick to learn and wise to know.
And keenly felt the friendly glow
And softer flame,
But thoughtless follies laid him low.
And stain'd his name

25 Reader, attend! whether thy soul
Soars fancy's flights beyond the pole.
Or darkling grubs this earthly hole
In low pursuit,
Know, prudent, cautious, self-control
Is wisdom's root

That frequent pass dounce¹⁴ Wisdom's door For glaukit¹⁵ Folly's portals;
I, for their thoughtless, careless sakes,
Would here propone¹⁶ defences—15 Their donsie¹⁷ tricks, their black mistakes.
Their failings and mischances.

Ye see your state wi' theirs compared,
And shudder at the niffer;¹⁸
But cast a moment's fair regard.

WHISTLE O'ER THE LAVE O'T' 1789 1790

First when Maggie was my care, Heav'n, I thought, was in her air,
 Now we're married—spier nae mair⁷—
 But—whistle o'er the lave o't!

5 Meg was meek, and Meg was mild, Sweet and harmless as a child:
 Wiser men than me's beguil'd—
 Whistle o'er the lave o't!

How we live, my Meg and me, 10 How we love, and how we gree,⁸ I care na by¹⁰ how few may see—
 Whistle o'er the lave o't!
 Wha I wish were maggots' meat,
 Dish'd up in her winding-sheet, 15 I could write—but Meg wad see't—
 Whistle o'er the lave o't!

MY HEART'S IN THE HIGHLANDS
 1789 1790

Chorus

My heart's in the Highlands, my heart is not here;
 My heart's in the Highlands, a-chasing the deer,
 A-chasing the wild deer, and following the roe—
 My heart's in the Highlands, wherever I go.

That lov'st to greet the early morn,

Where is thy place of blissful rest?
See'st thou thy lover lowly laid?

¹⁰ Can I forget the hallow'd grove, Where, by the winding Ayr, we met
To live one day of parting love?
Eternity cannot efface
Those records dear of transports past, ¹⁵ Thy image at our last embrace—Ah! little thought we 'twas our last!

- Ayr, gurgling, kiss'd his pebb'l'd shore, O'erhuing with wild woods, thickening

The fragrant birch and hawthorn hoar ²⁰ Twin'd amorous round the raptur'd
scene;
The flowers sprang wanton to be prest,
The birds sang love on every spray.
Till too, too soon, the glowing west

TAM O' SHANTER

A TALE

1790 1791

Of Brownjis and of Bogillis' full is this Buke.
—GAWIN DOUGLAS.¹

- When chapman billies² leave the street,
And drouthy³ neebors, neebors meet,
As market-days are wearin late,
An' folk begin to tak the gate,⁴ ⁵ While we sit bousing at the nappy,⁵ An' gettin' fou⁶ and unco⁷ happy,
We think na on the lang Scots miles,⁸
The mosses, waters, slaps,¹⁰ and styles,
That lie between us and our hame, ¹⁰ Whare sits our sulky, sullen dame, Gathering her brows like gathering
storm,
Nursing her wrath to keep it warm.

- This truth fand¹¹ honest Tam o' Shanter,
As he frae Ayr ae night did canter:
¹⁵ (Auld Ayr, wham ne'er a town surpasses, For honest men and bonie lasses).

- O Tam, hadst thou but been sae wise,
As taen thy ain wife Kate's advice!
She tauld thee weel thou was a skellum¹² ²⁰ A blethering,¹³ blustering, drunken blellum;¹⁴
That frae November till October,
Ae market-day thou was nae sober;
That ilka melder¹⁵ wi' the miller, Thou sat as lang as thou had miller, ²⁵ That ev'ry naig was ca'd¹⁶ a shoe on,
The smith and thee gat roaring fou on.
That at the Lord's house, even on Sunday, Thou drank wi' Kirkton Jean till Mon-
day.

- She prophesied that, late or soon, ³⁰ Thou would be found deep drown'd in Doon,
Or catch'd wi' warloeks¹⁷ in the mirk¹⁸
By Alloway's auld, haunted kirk.

 To think how monie counsels sweet,

 The husband frae the wife despises!

But to our tale —Ae market-night,
 Tam had got planted unco right;
 Fast by an ingle,² bleezing finely, 40 Wi' reaming swats,³ that drank divinely,

And at his elbow, Souter⁴ Johnie,
 His ancient, trusty, drouthy cronie, Tam lo'ed him like a very brither;
 They had been fou for weeks thegither!
 45 The night drave on wi' sangs and clatter;
 And ay the ale was growing better.
 The landlady and Tam grew gracious Wi' secret favors, sweet and precious,
 The Souter tauld his queerest stories, 50 The landlord's laugh was ready chorus.
 The storm without might rair and rustle, Tam did na mind the storm a whistle

Care, mad to see a man sae happy, E'en drown'd himsel amang the nappy 55 As bees flec hame wi' lades o' treasure, The minutes wing'd their way wi'
 pleasure
 Kings may be blest, but Tam was glorious, O'er a' the ills o' life victorious!

But pleasures are like poppies spread;
 60 You seize the flow'r, its bloom is shed,
 Or like the snow falls in the river,
 A moment white—then melts forever,
 Or like the borealis race,
 That fit ere you can point their place.
 65 Or like the rainbow's lovely form, Evanishing amid the storm
 Nae man can tether time or tide:
 The hour approaches Tam maun ride That hour, o' night's black arch the keystone,
 70 That dreary hour Tam mounts his beast in;
 And sic a night he takes the road in.
 As ne'er poor sinner was abroad in

The wind blew as 'twad blawn its last;
 The rattling showers rose on the blast.
 75 The speedy gleams the darkness swal-low'd,
 Loud, deep, and lang, the thunder hel-
 low'd:
 That night, a child might understand,
 The Deil had business on his hand.

15 For dear to me as light and life,
Was my sweet Highland Mary

- Wi' monie a vow and lock'd embrace Our parting was fu' tender,
And, pledging aft' to meet again, 20 We tore oursel's asunder.
But O, fell Death's untimely frost,
That nipt my flower sae early!
Now green's the sod, and cauld's the
clay,
That wraps my Highland Mary!

- 25 O, pale, pale now, those rosy lips
I aft hae kiss'd sae fondly,
And clos'd for ay, the sparkling glance,
That dwalt on me sae kindly.
And mouldering now in silent dust, 30 That heart that lo'ed me dearly!
But still within my bosom's core Shall live my Highland Mary

IS THERE FOR HONEST POVERTY

1794 1795

Is there for honest poverty,
That tings his head, an' a' that?
The coward slave, we pass him by—
We dare be poor for a' that!

5 For a' that, an' a' that,
Our toils obscure, an' a' that,
The rank is but the guinea's stamp.
The man's the gowd⁴ for a' that

What though on hamely fare we dine, 10 Wear hodden gray⁵, an' a' that?
Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wine—

A man's a man for a' that!
For a' that, an' a' that,
Their tinsel show, an' a' that.

15 The honest man, tho' e'er sae poor, Is king o' men for a' that 20 He's but a cuif¹ for a' that

 For a' that, an' a' that,
 His ribband, stai, an' a' that.
 The man o' independent mind,

PREFACE TO THE FIRST, OR KILMAR-NOCK EDITION OF BURNS'S POEMS 1786 1786

- The following trifles are not the production of the poet, who, with all the advantages of learned art, and, perhaps, amid the elegancies and idlenesses of 5 upper life, looks down for a rural theme, with an eye to Theocritus or Virgil. To the author of this, these and other celebrated names (their countrymen) are, at least in their original language, "a fountain shut up, and a book sealed" Unacquainted with the necessary requisites for commencing poet² by rule, he sings the sentiments and manners he felt and saw in himself and his rustic compeers around 15 him, in his and their native language Though a rhymers from his earliest years at least from the earliest impulses of the softer passions, it was not till very lately that the applause, perhaps the partiality, 20 of friendship, awakened his vanity so far as to make him think any thing of his was worth showing; and none of the following works were composed with a view to the press To amuse himself with the little 25 creations of his own fancy, amid the toil and fatigues of a laborious life; to tran-scribe the various feelings, the loves, the griefs, the hopes, the fears, in his own breast; to find some kind of counterpoise 30 to the struggles of a world, always an alien scene, a task uncouth to the poetical mind; these were his motives for courting the Muses, and in these he found poetry to be its own reward
- 35 Now that he appears in the public character of an author, he does it with fear and trembling. So dear is fame to the rhyming tribe, that even he, an obscure, nameless bard, shrinks aghast at the 40 thought of being branded as "An imper-

¹ fool
² above
³ may not claim
⁴ prize

⁵ windy quarter
⁶ shelter
⁷ palm of the hand
⁸ much woe

¹ foe
 - for beginning the vocation of a poet

tinent blockhead, obtruding his nonsense on the world; and, because he can make shift to jingle a few doggerel Scotch rhymes together, looks upon himself as a poet of no small consequence forsooth."

It is an observation of that celebrated poet,¹ whose divine Elegies do honor to our language, our nation, and our species—that "Humility has depressed many a genius to a hermit, but never raised one to fame." If any critic catches at the word genius, the author tells him, once for all, that he certainly looks upon himself as possessed of some poetic abilities. otherwise his publishing in the manner he has done would be a maneuver below the worst character which, he hopes, his worst enemy will ever give him. But to the genius of a Ramsay, or the glorious dawnings of the poor, unfortunate Fergusson, he, with equal unaffected sincerity, declares that, even in his highest pulse of vanity, he has not the most distant pretensions. These two justly admired Scotch poets he has often had in his eye in the following pieces, but rather with a view to kindle at their flame, than for servile imitation.

To his subscribers the author returns his most sincere thanks. Not the mercenary bow over a counter, but the heart-throbbing gratitude of the bard, conscious how much he is indebted to benevolence and friendship for gratifying him, if he deserves it, in that dearest wish of every poetic bosom—to be distinguished. He begs his readers, particularly the learned and the polite, who may honor him with a perusal, that they will make every allowance for education and circumstances of life; but if, after a fair, candid, and impartial criticism, he shall stand convicted of dulness and nonsense, let him be done by as he would in that case do by others—let him be condemned without mercy, to contempt and oblivion.

DEDICATION TO THE SECOND, OR EDINBURGH EDITION OF BURNS'S POEMS
1787 1787

TO THE NOBLEMEN AND GENTLEMEN OF THE CALEDONIAN HUNT²

My LORDS AND GENTLEMEN:

A Scottish bard, proud of the name, and whose highest ambition is to sing in his country's service—where shall he so properly look for patronage as to the illustrious names of his native laud; those who bear the honors and inherit the virtues of their ancestors? The poetic genius of my country found me, as the prophetic bard Elijah did Elisha—at the plough;¹ and threw her inspiring mantle over me. She bade me sing the loves, the joys, the rural scenes and rural pleasures of my native soil, in my native tongue. I tuned my wild, artless notes, as she inspired. She whispered me to come to this ancient metropolis of Caledonia and lay my songs under your honored protection: I now obey her dictates.

Though much indebted to your goodness, I do not approach you, my Lords and Gentlemen, in the usual style of dedication, to thank you for past favors; that path is so hackneyed by prostituted learning that honest rusticity is ashamed of it. Nor do I present this address with the venal soul of a servile author, looking for a continuation of those favors. I was bred to the plough, and am independent. I come to claim the common Scottish name with you, my illustrious countrymen; and to tell the world that I glory in the title. I come to congratulate my country, that the blood of her ancient heroes still runs uncontaminated; and that from your courage, knowledge, and public spirit, she may expect protection, wealth, and liberty. In the last place, I come to proffer my warmest wishes to the great fountain of honor, the monarch of the universe, for your welfare and happiness.

When you go forth to waken the echoes, in the ancient and favorite amusement of your forefathers, may pleasure ever be of your party, and may social joy await your return! When harassed in courts or camps with the jostlings of bad men and bad measures, may the honest consciousness of injured worth attend your return to your native seats; and may domestic happiness, with a smiling welcome, meet you at your gates! May corruption shrink at your kindling, indignant glance; and may tyranny in the ruler, and licentiousness in the people, equally find you an inexorable foe!

I have the honor to be, with the sincerest gratitude and highest respect,

My Lords and Gentlemen,

Your most devoted humble Servant,
ROBERT BURNS.

THE PLEASURES OF MEMORY

1792

1792

From PART I

Twilight's soft dew's steal o'er the village
green,
With magic tints to harmonize the scene.
Stilled is the hum that thro' the hamlet broke.
When round the ruins of their ancient oak 5 The peasants flocked to hear the minstrel
play,
And games and carols closed the busy day.
Her wheel at rest, the matron thrills no
more
With treasured tales, and legendary lore.
All, all are fled; nor mirth nor music flows 10 To chase the dreams of innocent repose.
All, all are fled; yet still I linger here!
What secret charms this silent spot en-
dear!
Mark yon old mansion frowning thro'
the trees,
Whose hollow turret woos the whistling
breeze.
15 That casement, arched with ivy's brownest
shade,
First to these eyes the light of heaven conveyed.
The mouldering gateway strews the grass-grown court,
Once the calm scene of many a simple sport;
When all things pleased, for life itself was new,
20 And the heart promised what the fancy drew.
As thro' the garden's desert paths I rove, 70 What fond illusions swarm in every grove!
How oft, when purple evening tinged the west.

We watched the emmet¹ to her grainy nest;
Welcomed the wild bee home on weary
wing,
Laden with sweets, the choicest of the
spring!
75 How oft inscribed, with Friendship's votive rhyme,
The bark now silvered by the touch of
Time;
Soared in the swing, half pleased and half afraid,
Thro' sister elms that waved their summer shade;
Or strewed with crumbs yon root-inwoven seat, 80 To lure the redbreast from his lone retreat!
Childhood's loved group revisits every
scene;
The tangled wood-walk and the tufted
green!
Indulgent Memory wakes, and lo, they live!
('lothed with far softer hues than Light can give.
85 Thou first, best friend that Heaven assigns below
To sooth and sweeten all the cares we
know;
Whose glad suggestions still each vain alarm,
When nature fades and life forgets to
charm;
Thee would the Muse invoke!—to thee belong 90 The sage's precept and the poet's song.
What softened views thy magic glass
reveals,
When o'er the landscape Time's meek twilight steals!
As when in ocean sinks the orb of day.
Long on the wave reflected lustres play; 95 Thy tempered gleams of happiness resigned Glance on the darkened mirror of the mind.

¹ ant

- The school's lone porch, with reverend mosses gray,
Just tells the pensive pilgrim where it lay Mute is the bell that rung at peep of dawn, 100 Quickening my truant feet across the lawn,
Unheard the shout that rent the noon-tide air,
When the slow dial gave a pause to care.
Up springs, at every step, to claim a
tear,
Some little friendship formed and cherished here, 105 And not the lightest leaf, but trembling teems
With golden visions and romantic
dreams!
Down by yon hazel copse, at evening, blazed
The Gipsy's fagot—there we stood and gazed.
Gazed on her sun-burnt face with silent
awe.
110 Her tattered mantle, and her hood of straw;
Her moving lips, her caldron humming
o'er,
The drowsy brood that on her back she bore, Imps, in the barn with mousing owl bred,
From rifled roost at nightly revel fed; 115 Whose dark eyes flashed thro' locks of blackest shade,
When in the breeze the distant watchdog bayed —
And heroes fled the Sibyl's muttered call, Whose elfin prowess scaled the orchard-wall
As o'er my palm the silver piece she
drew,
120 And traced the line of life with searching view,
How throbb'd my fluttering pulse with hopes and fears,
To learn the color of my future years!
Ah, then, what honest triumph flushed
my breast;
This truth once known—To bless is to be blest!
125 We led the bending beggar on his way.
(Bare were his feet, his tresses silver-gray)
Soothed the keen pangs his aged spirit
felt,
And on his tale with mute attention dwelt
As in his scrip we dropt our little store, 130 And sigh'd to think that little was no
more,
- He breathed his prayer, "Long may such goodness live!"
'Twas all he gave, 'twas all he had to
give.
Angels, when Mercy's mandate winged their flight,
Had stopt to dwell with pleasure on the
sight.
135 But hark! thro' those old firs, with sullen swell,
The church-clock strikes! ye tender scenes, farewell!
It calls me hence, beneath their shade, to trace
The few fond lines that Time may soon efface.
On yon gray stone, that fronts the chancel door, 140 Worn smooth by busy feet now seen no
more,
Each eve we shot the marble thro' the ring.
When the heart danced, and life was in its spring,
Alas! unconscious of the kindred earth
That faintly echoed to the voice of mirth 145 The glow-worm loves her emerald-light to shed
Where now the sexton rests his hoary
head
Oft, as he turned the greensward with his spade,
He lectured every youth that round him
played,
And, calmly pointing where our fathers
lay, 150 Roused us to rival each, the hero of his
day Hush, ye fond flutterings, hush! while here alone
I search the records of each mouldering
stone Guides of my life! Instructors of my youth!
Who first unveiled the hallowed form of Truth!
155 Whose every word enlightened and endeared;
In age beloved, in poverty revered,
In Friendship's silent register ye live, Nor ask the vain memorial Art can give But when the sons of peace, of pleasure sleep, 160 When only Sorrow wakes, and wakes to weep,
What spells entrance my visionary mind With sighs so sweet, with transports so refined?

AN ITALIAN SONG
1793

Dear is my little native vale,
The ring-dove builds and murmurs there,
Close by my cot she tells her tale
To every passing villager 5 The squirrel leaps from tree to tree.
And shells his nuts at liberty

In orange groves and myrtle bowers,
That breathe a gale of fragrance round
I charm the fairy-footed hours 10 With my loved lute's romantic sound.
Or crowns of living laurel weave.
For those that win the race at eve

The shepherd's horn at break of day,
The ballet danced in twilight glade 15 The canzonet¹ and roundelay² Sung in the silent green-wood shade
These simple joys, that never fail, Shall bind me to my native vale

WRITTEN AT MIDNIGHT

While thro' the broken pane the tempest sighs,
And my step falters on the faithless floor,
Shades of departed joys around me rise,
With many a face that smiles on me no

7 With many a voice that thrills of transport gave,
Now silent as the grass that tufts their grave¹

Blue was the loch,³ the clouds were gone, Ben-Lomond in his glory shone.
When, Luss, I left thee, when the breeze Bore me from thy silver sands, 7 Thy kirk-yard wall among the trees,
Where gray with age, the dial stands;
That dial so well known to me¹
--Tho' many a shadow it had shed.
Beloved sister,⁴ since with thee 10 The legend on the stone was read
The fairy isles fled far away;
That with its woods and uplands green,
Where shepherd huts are dimly seen,
And songs are heard at close of day, 15 That too, the deer's wild covert, fled,
And that, the asylum of the dead²

the sister Sarah

While, as the boat went merrily,
Much of Rob Roy the boat-man told,
His arm that fell below his knee, 20 His cattle-fold and mountain-hold Tarbat, thy shore I climbed at last.
And, thy shady region passed, Upon another shore I stood,
And looked upon another flood, 25 Great Ocean's self! ('Tis He who fills That vast and awful depth of hills.)
Where many an elf was playing round
Who treads unshod his classic ground,
And speaks, his native rocks among.
30 As Fingal spoke, and Ossian sung Night fell, and dark and darker grew That narrow sea, that narrow sky
As o'er the glimmering waves we flew,
The sea-bird rustling, waiting by 35 And now the giannus, half-deserted, Black and huge above the tide,
The cliffs and promontories there,
Front to front, and broad and bare,
Each beyond each, with giant feet 40 Advancing as in haste to meet;
The shattered fortress, whence the Dane Blew his shrill blast, nor rushed in vain, Tyrant of the dear domain.
All into midnight shadow sweep—45 When day springs upward from the deep Kindling the waters in its flight.
The prow wakes splendor, and the oar,
That rose and fell unseen before,
Flashes in a sea of light!
50 Glad sign, and sure¹ for now we hail Thy flowers, Glentinnart, in the gale And bright indeed the path should be That leads to friendship and to thee¹
Oh blest retreat, and sacred too!
55 Sacred as when the bell of prayer Tolled duly on the desert air,
And crosses decked thy summits blue Oft, like some loved romantic tale, Oft shall my weary mind recall, 60 Amid the hum and stir of men,
Thy beechen grove and waterfall,
Thy ferry with its gliding sail,
And her—the Lady of the Glen¹

THE BOY OF EGREMOND

1819

1819

"Say, what remains when Hope is fled?"
 She answered, "Endless weeping!"
 For in the herdsman's eve she read,
 Who in his shroud lay sleeping 5 At Embsay rung the matin bell,
 The stag was roused on Barden fell.
 The mingled sounds were swelling, dying.
 And down the Wharfe a hern² was flying,
 When near the cabin in the wood, 10 In tartan clad and forest-green,
 With hound in leash and hawk in hood,
 The Boy of Egremond was seen Blithe was his song, a song of yore,
 But where the rock is rent in two, 15 And the river rushes through,
 His voice was heard no more!
 'Twas but a step! the gulf he passed.
 But that step—it was his last!
 As through the mist he winged his way, 20 (A cloud that hovers night and day,)
 The hound hung back, and back he drew
 The master and his merlin³ too
 That narrow place of noise and strife Received their little all of life!
 25 There now the matin bell is rung,
 The "Miserere" duly sung;
 And holy men in cowl and hood
 Are wandering up and down the wood But what avail they? Ruthless Lord, 30 Thou didst not shudder when the sword Here on the young its fury spent.
 The helpless and the innocent.
 Sit now and answer, groan for groan
 The child before thee is thy own.
 35 And she who wildly wanders there,
 The mother in her long despair,

Shall oft remind thee, waking, sleeping, Of those who by the Wharfe were weeping;
 Of those who would not be consoled 40 When red with blood the river rolled.

THE LAKE OF GENEVA

Day glimmered in the east, and the white moon
 Hung like a vapor in the cloudless sky, Yet visible, when on my way I went,
 Glad to be gone, a pilgrim from the North, 5 Now more and more attracted as I drew Nearer and nearer. Ere the artisan Had from his window leant, drowsy, half-clad,
 To snuff the morn, or the caged lark poured forth,
 From his green sod upspringing as to
 heaven,
 10 (His tuneful bill o'erflowing with a song Old in the days of Homer, and his wings With transport quivering) on my way I went,
 Thy gates, Geneva, swinging heavily,
 Thy gates so slow to open, swift to shut, 15 As on that Sabbath eve when he arrived,¹ Whose name is now thy glory, now by thee, Such virtue dwells in those small syllables, Inscribed to consecrate the narrow street,
 His birth-place,—when, but one short step too late,
 20 In his despair, as though the die were cast, He flung him down to weep, and wept till
 dawn;
 Then rose to go, a wanderer through the
 world.

'Tis not a tale that every hour brings with it
 Yet at a city gate, from time to time, 25 Much may be learnt; nor, London, least at thine,
 Thy hive the busiest, greatest of them all, Gathering, enlarging still. Let us stand by,
 And note who passes. Here comes one,
 a youth, (Glowing with pride, the pride of conscious power, 30 A Chatterton—in thought admired, caressed,
 And crowned like Petrarch in the Capitol;
 Ere long to die, to fall by his own hand,
 And fester with the vilest. Here come two,

 1728, when sixteen years of age

25 Less feverish, less exalted—soon to part, A Garrick and a Johnson; Wealth and Fame
 Awaiting one, even at the gate; Neglect And Want the other. But what multitudes,
 Urged by the love of change, and, like myself,
 Adventurous, careless of tomorrow's fare, 40 Press on—though but a rill entering the sea, Entering and lost! Our task would never end.

Day glimmered and I went, a gentle
 breeze
 Ruffling the Leman Lake Wave after
 wave,
 If such they might be called, dashed as in sport,
 45 Not anger, with the pebbles on the beach Making wild music, and far westward caught
 The sunbeam—where, alone and as entranced,
 Counting the hours, the fisher in his skiff Lay with his circular and dotted line 50 On the bright waters. When the heart of man
 Is light with hope, all things are sure to please;
 And soon a passage-boat swept gaily by.
 Laden with peasant girls and fruits and
 flowers
 And many a chanticleer and parrulet¹ caged 55 For Vevey's market place—a motley group Seen through the silvery haze But soon
 'twas gone
 The shifting sail flapped idly to and fro, Then bore them off I am not one of

 So dead to all things in this visible world, 60 So wondrously profound, as to move on In the sweet light of heaven, like him of (His name is justly in the Calendar³), Who through the day pursued this pleasant path

 That winds beside the mirror of all beauty,
 65 And, when at eve his fellow pilgrims bade, Discoursing of the lake, asked where it was.
 They marvelled as they might; and so must all,
 Seeing what now I saw: for now 'twas day,
 And the bright sun was in the firmament, 70 A thousand shadows of a thousand hues

Chequering the clear expanse. Awhile his orb
 Hung o'er thy trackless fields of snow, Mont Blanc,
 Thy seas of ice and ice-built promontories,
 That change their shapes forever as in sport,
 75 Then travelled onward and went down behind
 The pine-clad heights of Jura, lighting up The woodman's casement, and perchance his axe Borne homeward through the forest in his hand;
 And, on the edge of some o'erhanging cliff, 80 That dungeon-fortress¹ never to be named,
 Where, like a lion taken in the toils, Toussaint breathed out his brave and generous spirit
 Little did he,² who sent him there to die, Think, when he gave the word, that he himself, 85 Great as he was, the greatest among men.
 Should in like manner be so soon conveyed Athwart the deep,—and to a rock so small Amid the countless multitude of waves, That ships have gone and sought it, and returned,
 90 Saying it was not!

THE GONDOLA

Boy, call the Gondola; the sun is set
 It came, and we embarked, but instantly.
 As at the waving of a magic wand, Though she had stept on board so light of foot, 5 So light of heart, laughing she knew not why,
 Sleep overcame her, on my arm she slept From time to time I waked her; but the boat Rocked her to sleep again. The moon was now
 Rising full-orbed, but broken by a cloud 10 The wind was hushed, and the sea mirror-like.
 A single zephyr, as enamored, played With her loose tresses, and drew more and more
 Her veil across her bosom Long I lay Contemplating that face so beautiful, with smiles,

 That neck but half-concealed, whiter

- 'Twas the sweet slumber of her early age
I looked and looked, and felt a flush of joy
I would express but cannot. Oft I wished 20 Gently—by stealth—to drop asleep myself, And to incline yet lower that sleep might come.
Oft closed my eyes as in forgetfulness
'Twas all in vain Love would not let me rest
But how delightful when at length she waked!
- 25 When, her light hair adjusting, and her veil
So rudely scattered, she resumed her place Beside me; and, as gaily as before, Sitting unconsciously nearer and nearer,
Poured out her innocent mind!
- So, not long since.
30 Sung a Venetian; and his lay of love.
Dangerous and sweet, charmed Venice
For myself,
(Less fortunate, if love be happiness)
No curtain drawn, no pulse beating alarm.
I went alone beneath the silent moon, 35 Thy square, St Mark, thy churches, palaces,
Glittering and frost-like and, as day drew on,
Melting away, an emblem of themselves Those porches passed, thro' which the water-breeze
Plays, though no longer on the noble forms 40 That moved there, sable-vested—and the quay,
Silent, grass-grown—adventurer-like I launched
Into the deep, ere long discovering Isles such as cluster in the southern seas.
All verdure Everywhere, from bush and brake.
- 45 The musky odor of the serpents came.
Their slimy tract across the woodman's path
Bright in the moonshine, and, as round
I went,
Dreaming of Greece, whither the waves were gliding.
I listened to the venerable pines 50 Then in close converse, and, if right I guessed,
Delivering many a message to the winds,
In secret, for their kindred on Mount Ida.
Nor when again in Venice, when again In that strange place, so stirring and so
still,
55 Where nothing comes to drown the human voice
But music, or the dashing of the tide, Ceased I to wander. Now a Jessica Sung to her lute, her signal as she sat
- At her half-open window Then, me-
thought,
60 A serenade broke silence, breathing hope Thro' walls of stone, and torturing the proud heart
Of some Priuli. Once, we could not err, (It was before an old Palladian house, As between night and day we floated by) 65 A gondolier lay singing; and he sung,
As in the time when Venice was herself, Of Tancred and Erminia On our oars
We rested, and the verse was verse divine!
We could not err—perhaps he was the
last—70 For none took up the strain, none answered him;
And, when he ceased, he left upon my ear
A something like the dying voice of Venice!
- The moon went down, and nothing now was seen
Save where the lamp of a Madonna shone 75 Faintly—or heard, but when he spoke, who stood
Over the lantern at the prow and cried, Turning the corner of some reverend pile,
Some school or hospital of old renown.
Tho' haply none were coming, none were
near,
80 "Hasten or slacken" But at length Night fled;
And with her fled, scattering, the sons of Pleasure
Star after star shot by, or, meteor-like, Crossed me and vanished—lost at once
among Those hundred isles that tower majestically, 85 That rise abruptly from the water-mark, Not with rough crag, but marble and the work
Of noblest architects I lingered still, Nor sought my threshold, till the hour was come
And past, when, flitting home in the gray
light,
90 The young Bianca found her father's door.
That door so often with a trembling hand.
So often—then so lately left ajar, Shut, and, all terror, all perplexity.
Now by her lover urged, now by her love.
95 Fled o'er the waters to return no more.

THE FOUNTAIN¹

It was a well

 perhaps 5 A tomb, and honored with a hero's ashes
 The water from the rock filled and o'er-flowed,
 Then dashed away, playing the prodigal,
 And soon was lost—stealing unseen, un-
 heard,
 Thro' the long grass, and round the twisted roots
 10 Of aged trees, discovering¹ where it ran
 By the fresh verdure Overcome with heat
 I threw me down, admiring, as I lay,
 That shady nook, a singing-place for birds,
 That grove so intricate, so full of flowers, 15 More than enough to please a child

The sun had set, a distant convent-bell Ringing the Angelus,—and now approached
 The hour for stu and village-gossip there,
 The hour Rebekah came, when from the 20 She drew with such alacrity to serve The stranger and his camels² Soon I

 heard
 Footsteps, and lo, descending by a path Trodden for ages, many a nymph appeared,
 Appeared and vanished, bearing on her
 head
 25 Her earthen pitcher It called up the day Ulysses landed there,⁴ and long I gazed, Like one awaking in a distant time

At length there came the loveliest of them all,
 Her little brother dancing down before her, 30 And ever as he spoke, which he did ever, Turning and looking up in warmth of
 heart
 And brotherly affection Stopping there, She joined her rosy hands and, filling them
 With the pure element, gave him to drink, 35 And, while he quenched his thirst, standing on tip-toe, Looked down upon him with a sister's
 smile,
 Nor stirred till he had done, fixed as a statue

Then hadst thou seen them as they stood, Canova, Thou hadst endowed them with immortal
 youth;
 40 And they had evermore lived undivided, Winning all hearts—of all thy works the fairest.

ENQUIRY CONCERNING POLITICAL JUSTICE

1793 1793

FROM BOOK I. OF THE POWERS OF MAN CONsidered in His Social Capacity

CHAPTER III SPIRIT OF POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

Additional perspicuity will be communicated to our view of the evils of political society, if we reflect with farther and closer attention upon what may be called 5 its interior and domestic history

Two of the greatest abuses relative to the interior policy of nations, which at this time prevail in the world, consist in the irregular transfer of property, either first by violence, or secondly by fraud 11 among the inhabitants of any country, there existed no desire in one individual to possess himself of the substance of another, or no desire so vehement and restless as to prompt him to acquire it by means inconsistent with order and justice, undoubtedly in that country guilt could scarcely be known but by report If every man could with perfect facility obtain the 20 necessaries of life, and, obtaining them, feel no uneasy craving after its super-fluites, temptation would lose its power Private interest would visibly accord with public good, and civil society become what poetry has feigned of the golden age 25 Let us enquire into the principles to which these evils are indebted for their existence

First, then, it is to be observed that in the most refined states of Europe, the inequality of property has arisen to an alarming height Vast numbers of their inhabitants are deprived of almost every accommodation that can render life tolerable or secure Their utmost industry 35 scarcely suffices for their support The women and children lean with an insupportable weight upon the efforts of the man, so that a large family has in the lower orders of life become a proverbial expression for an uncommon degree of poverty and wretchedness If sickness or some of those casualties which are per-

¹ disclosing² That is, the summons to the Angelus, a service petually incident to an active and laborious life be added to these burdens, the distress is yet greater.

It seems to be agreed that in England there is less wretchedness and distress than in most of the kingdoms of the continent. In England, the poor's rates¹ amount to the sum of two millions sterling per annum. It has been calculated that one person in seven of the inhabitants of this country derives at some period of his life assistance from this fund. If to this we add the persons who, from pride, a spirit of independence, or the want of a legal settlement, though in equal distress, receive no such assistance, the proportion will be considerably increased.

I lay no stress upon the accuracy of this calculation; the general fact is sufficient to give us an idea of the greatness of the abuse. The consequences that result are placed beyond the reach of contradiction. A perpetual struggle with the evils of poverty, if frequently ineffectual, must necessarily render many of the sufferers desperate. A painful feeling of their oppressed situation will itself deprive them of the power of surmounting it. The superiority of the rich, being thus unmercifully exercised, must inevitably expose them to reprisals; and the poor man will be induced to regard the state of society as a state of war, an unjust combination, not for protecting every man in his rights and securing to him the means of existence, but for engrossing all its advantages to a few favored individuals, and reserving for the portion of the rest want, dependence, and misery.

A second source of those destructive passions by which the peace of society is interrupted is to be found in the luxury, the pageantry, and magnificence with which enormous wealth is usually accompanied. Human beings are capable of encountering with cheerfulness considerable hardships, when those hardships are impartially shared with the rest of the society, and they are not insulted with the spectacle of indolence and ease in others, no way deserving of greater advantages than themselves. But it is a bitter aggravation of their own calamity to have the privileges of others forced on their observation, and, while they are perpetually and vainly endeavoring to secure for themselves and their families the poorest conveniences, to find others reveling in the fruits of their labors. This aggravation is assiduously administered to them under most of the political establishments at present in existence. There is a numerous class of individuals who, though rich, have neither brilliant talents nor sublime virtues, and however highly they may prize their education, their affability, their superior polish, and the elegance of their manners, have a secret consciousness that they possess nothing by which they can so securely assert their preeminence and keep their inferiors at a distance as the splendor of their equipage, the magnificence of their retinue, and the sumptuousness of their entertainments. The poor man is struck with this exultation; he feels his own miseries; he knows how unwearied are his efforts to obtain a slender pittance of this prodigal waste, and he mistakes opulence for felicity. He cannot persuade himself that an embroidered garment may frequently cover an aching heart.

A third disadvantage that is apt to connect poverty with discontent consists in the insolence and usurpation of the rich. If the poor man would in other respects compose himself in philosophic indifference, and, conscious that he possesses everything that is truly honorable to man as fully as his rich neighbor, would look upon the rest as beneath his envy, his neighbor would not permit him to do so. He seems as if he could never be satisfied with his possessions unless he can make the spectacle of them grating to others, and that honest self-esteem, by which his inferior might otherwise arrive at apathy, is rendered the instrument of galling him with oppression and injustice. In many countries justice is avowedly made a subject of solicitation, and the man of the highest rank and most splendid connections almost infallibly carries his cause against the unprotected and friendless. In countries where this shameless practice is not established, justice is frequently a matter of expensive purchase, and the man with the longest purse is proverbially victorious. A consciousness of these facts must be expected to render the rich little cautious of offence in his dealings with the poor, and to inspire him with a temper, overbearing, dictatorial, and tyrannical. Nor does this indirect oppression satisfy his despotism. The rich are in all such countries, directly or indirectly, the legislators of the state; and of consequence are perpetually reducing oppression into a system, and depriving the poor of that little commonage of nature, as it were, which might otherwise still have remained to them.

The opinions of individuals, and of consequence their desires, for desire is nothing but opinion maturing for action, will always be in a great degree regulated by the opinions of the community. But the manners prevailing in many countries are accurately calculated to impress a conviction that integrity, virtue, understanding, and industry are nothing, and that opulence is everything. Does a man whose exterior denotes indigence expect to be well received in society, and especially by those who would be understood to dictate to the rest? Does he find or imagine himself in want of their assistance and favor? He is presently taught that no merits can atone for a mean appearance. The lesson that is read to him is, "Go home; enrich yourself by whatever means; obtain those superfluities which are alone regarded as estimable; and you may then be secure of an amicable reception." Accordingly, poverty in such countries is viewed as the greatest of demerits. It is escaped from with an eagerness that has no leisure for the scruples of honesty. It is concealed as the most indelible disgrace. While one man chooses the path of undistinguishing accumulation, another plunges into expenses which are to impose him upon the world as more opulent than he is. He hastens to the reality of that penury, the appearance of which he dreads; and, together with his property, sacrifices the integrity, veracity, and character, which might have consoled him in his adversity.

Such are the causes that, in different degrees under the different governments of the world, prompt mankind openly or secretly to encroach upon the property of each other. Let us consider how far they admit either of remedy or aggravation from political institution. Whatever tends to decrease the injuries attendant upon poverty, decreases, at the same time, the inordinate desire and the enormous accumulation of wealth. Wealth is not pursued for its own sake, and seldom for the sensual gratification it can purchase, but for the same reasons that ordinarily prompt men to the acquisition of learning, eloquence, and skill, for the love of distinction and fear of contempt. How few would prize the possession of riches if they were condemned to enjoy their equipage, their palaces, and their entertainments in solitude, with no eye to wonder at their magnificence, and no sordid observer ready to convert that wonder into an adulation of the owner! If admiration were not generally deemed the exclusive property of the rich, and contempt the constant lackey of poverty, the love of gain would cease to be an universal passion. Let us consider in what respects political institution is rendered subservient to this passion.

First, then, legislation is in almost every country grossly the favorer of the rich against the poor. Such is the character of the game laws, by which the industrious rustic is forbidden to destroy the animal that preys upon the hopes of his future subsistence, or to supply himself with the food that unsought thrusts itself in his path. Such was the spirit of the late revenue laws of France, which in several of their provisions fell exclusively upon the humble and industrious, and exempted from their operation those who are best able to support it. Thus, in England, the land tax at this moment produces half a million less than it did a century ago, while the taxes on consumption have experienced an addition of thirteen millions per annum during the same period. This is an attempt, whether effectual or no, to throw the burden from the rich upon the poor, and as such is an exhibition of the spirit of legislation. Upon the same principle, robbery and other offences, which the wealthier part of the community have no temptation to commit, are treated as capital crimes, and attended with the most rigorous, often the most inhuman punishments. The rich are encouraged to associate for the execution of the most partial and oppressive positive laws: monopolies and patents are lavishly dispensed to such as are able to purchase them; while the most vigilant policy is employed to prevent combinations of the poor to fix the price of labor, and they are deprived of the benefit of that prudence and judgment which would select the scene of their industry.

Secondly, the administration of law is not less iniquitous than the spirit in which it is framed. Under the late government of France,¹ the office of judge was a matter of purchase, partly by an open price advanced to the crown, and partly by a secret *douceur*² paid to the minister. He who knew best how to manage this market in the retail trade of justice, could afford to purchase the good will of its functions at the highest price. To the client, justice was avowedly made an object of personal solicitation, and a powerful friend, a handsome woman, or a proper present, were articles of a much greater value than a good cause. In England, the criminal law is administered with greater impartiality so far as regards the trial itself, but the number of capital offences, and of consequence the frequency of pardons, open a wide door to favor and abuse. In causes relating to property, the practice of law is arrived at such a pitch as to render all justice ineffectual. The length of our chancery suits, the multiplied appeals from court to court, the enormous fees of counsel, attorneys, secretaries, clerks, the drawing of briefs, bills, replications, and rejoinders, and what has sometimes been called the glorious uncertainty of the law, render it frequently more advisable to resign a property than to contest it, and particularly exclude the impoverished claimant from the faintest hope of redress.

Thirdly, the inequality of conditions usually maintained by political institution is calculated greatly to enhance the imagined excellence of wealth. In the ancient monarchies of the East, and in Turkey at the present day, an eminent station could scarcely fail to excite implicit deference. The timid inhabitant trembled before his superior, and would have thought it little less than blasphemy to touch the veil drawn by the proud satrap over his inglorious origin. The same principles were extensively prevalent under the feudal system. The vassal, who was regarded as a sort of live stock upon the estate, and knew of no appeal from the arbitrary fiat of his lord, would scarcely venture to suspect that he was of the same species. This, however, constituted an unnatural and violent situation. There is a propensity in man to look farther than the outside, and to come with a writ of enquiry into the title of the upstart and the successful. By the operation of these causes, the insolence of wealth has been in some degree moderated. Meantime, it cannot be pretended that even among ourselves the inequality is not strained, so as to give birth to very unfortunate consequences. If, in the enormous degree in which it prevails in some parts of the world, it wholly debilitate and emasculate the human race, we shall see some reason to believe that, even in the milder state in which we are accustomed to behold it, it is still pregnant with the most mischievous effects.

FROM CHAPTER V THE VOLUNTARY ACTIONS OF MEN ORIGINATE IN THEIR OPINIONS

The corollaries respecting political truth, deducible from the simple proposition, which seems clearly established by the reasonings of the present chapter, that the voluntary actions of men are in all instances conformable to the deductions of their understanding, are of the highest importance. Hence, we may infer what are the hopes and prospects of human improvement. The doctrine which may be founded upon these principles may, perhaps, best be expressed in the five following propositions: sound reasoning and truth, when adequately communicated, must always be victorious over error, sound reasoning and truth are capable of being so communicated; truth is omnipotent, the vices and moral weakness of man are not invincible, man is perfectible, or, in other words, susceptible of perpetual improvement.

These propositions will be found in part synonymous with each other. But the time of the enquirer will not be unprofitably spent in copiously clearing up the foundations of moral and political system. It is extremely beneficial that truth should be viewed on all sides, and examined under different aspects. The propositions are even little more than so many different modes of stating the principal topic of this chapter. But if they will not admit each of a distinct train of arguments in its support, it may not, however, be useless to bestow upon each a short illustration.

The first of these propositions is so evident that it needs only be stated in order to the being universally admitted. Is there any one who can imagine that when sound argument and sophistry are fairly brought into comparison, the victory can be doubtful? Sophistry may assume a plausible appearance, and contrive to a certain extent to bewilder the understanding. But it is one of the prerogatives of truth to follow it in its mazes and strip it of disguise. Nor does any difficulty from this consideration interfere with the establishment of the present proposition. We suppose truth not merely to be exhibited, but adequately communicated; that is, in other words, distinctly apprehended by the person to whom it is addressed. In this case the victory is too sure to admit of being controverted by the most inveterate skepticism.

The second proposition is that sound reasoning and truth are capable of being adequately communicated by one man to another. This proposition may be understood of such communication, either as it affects the individual or the species. First of the individual.

In order to its due application in this point of view, opportunity for the communication must necessarily be supposed. The incapacity of human intellect at present requires that this opportunity should be of long duration or repeated recurrence. We do not always know how to communicate all the evidence we are capable of communicating, in a single conversation and much less in a single instant. But if the communicator be sufficiently master of his subject, and if the truth be altogether on his side, he must ultimately succeed in his undertaking. We suppose him to have sufficient urbanity to conciliate the good will, and sufficient energy to engage the attention of the party concerned. In that case there is no prejudice, no blind reverence for established systems, no false fear of the inferences to be drawn, that can resist him. He will encounter these one after the other, and he will encounter them with success. Our prejudices, our undue reverence and imaginary fears flow out of some views the mind has been induced to entertain; they are founded in the belief of some propositions. But every one of these propositions is capable of being refuted. The champion we describe proceeds from point to point; if in any his success have been doubtful, that he will retrace and put out of the reach of mistake; and it is evidently impossible that with such qualifications and such perseverance he should not ultimately accomplish his purpose.

Such is the appearance which this proposition assumes when examined in a loose and practical view. In strict consideration, it will not admit of debate. Man is a rational being. If there be any man who is incapable of making inferences for himself, or understanding, when stated in the most explicit terms, the inferences of another, him we consider as an abortive production, and not in strictness belonging to the human species. It is absurd, therefore, to say that sound reasoning and truth cannot be communicated by one man to another. Whenever in any case he fails, it is that he is not sufficiently laborious, patient, and clear. We suppose, of course, the person who undertakes to communicate the truth really to possess it, and be master of his subject, for it is scarcely worth an observation to say that that which he has not himself he cannot communicate to another.

If truth, therefore, can be brought home to the conviction of the individual, let us see how it stands with the public or the world. Now in the first place, it is extremely clear that if no individual can resist the force of truth, it can only be necessary to apply this proposition from individual to individual and we shall at length comprehend the whole. Thus the affirmation in its literal sense is completely established.

With respect to the chance of success this will depend, first, upon the precluding all extraordinary convulsions of nature and after this upon the activity and energy of those to whose hands the sacred cause of truth may be intrusted. It is apparent that if justice be done to its merits, it includes in it the indestructible germ of ultimate victory. Every new convert that is made to its cause, if he be taught its excellence as well as its reality, is a fresh apostle to extend its illuminations through a wider sphere. In this respect it resembles the motion of a falling body, which increases its rapidity in proportion to the squares of the distances. Add to which, that when a convert to truth has been adequately informed, it is barely possible that he should ever fail in his adherence, whereas error contains in it the principle of its own mortality. Thus the advocates of falsehood and mistake must continually diminish, and the well-informed adherents of truth incessantly multiply.

It has sometimes been affirmed that whenever a question is ably brought forward for examination, the decision of the human species must ultimately be on the right side. But this proposition is to be understood with allowances. Civil policy, magnificent emoluments, and sinister motives may upon many occasions, by distracting the attention, cause the worse reason to pass as if it were the better. It is not absolutely certain that in the controversy brought forward by Clarke and Wilson against the doctrine of the Trinity, or by Collins and Woolston against the Christian revelation, the innovators had altogether the worst of the argument. Yet fifty years after the agitation of these controversies, their effects could scarcely be traced, and things appeared on all sides as if the controversies had never existed. Perhaps it will be said that though the effects of truth may be obscured for a time, they will break out in the sequel with double lustre. But this, at least, depends upon circumstances. No comet must come in the meantime and sweep away the human species, no Attila must have it in his power once again to lead back the flood of barbarism to deluge the civilized world, and the disciples, or at least the books, of the original champions must remain, or their discoveries and demonstrations must be nearly lost upon the world.

The third of the propositions enumerated is that truth is omnipotent. This proposition, which is convenient for its brevity, must be understood with limitations. It would be absurd to affirm that truth unaccompanied by the evidence which proves it to be such, or when that evidence is partially and imperfectly stated, has any such property. But it has sufficiently appeared from the arguments already adduced, that truth, when adequately communicated, is, so far as relates to the conviction of the understanding, irresistible. There may, indeed, be propositions which, though true in themselves, may be beyond the sphere of human knowledge, or respecting which human beings have not yet discovered sufficient arguments for their support. In that case, though true in themselves, they are not truths to us. The reasoning by which they are attempted to be established, is not sound reasoning. It may, perhaps, be found that the human mind is not capable of arriving at absolute certainty upon any subject of enquiry; and it must be admitted that human science is attended with all degrees of certainty, from the highest moral evidence to the slightest balance of probability. But human beings are capable of apprehending and weighing all these degrees; and to know the exact quantity of probability which I ought to ascribe to any proposition, may be said to be in one sense the possessing certain knowledge. It would farther be absurd, if we regard truth in relation to its empire over our conduct, to suppose that it is not limited in its operations by the faculties of our frame. It may be compared to a connoisseur, who, however consummate be his talents, can extract from a given instrument only such tones as that instrument will afford. But within these limits the deduction which forms the principal substance of this chapter, proves to us that whatever is brought home to the conviction of the understanding, so long as it is present to the mind, possesses an undisputed empire over the conduct. Nor will he who is sufficiently conversant with the science of intellect be hasty in assigning the bounds of our capacity. There are some things which the structure of our bodies will render us forever unable to effect, but in many cases the lines which appear to prescribe a term to our efforts will, like the mists that arise from a lake, retire farther and farther, the more closely we endeavor to approach them.

Fourthly, the vices and moral weakness of man are not invincible. This is the preceding proposition with a very slight variation in the statement. Vice and weakness are founded upon ignorance and error; but truth is more powerful than any champion that can be brought into the field against it, consequently, truth has the faculty of expelling weakness and vice, and placing nobler and more beneficent principles in their stead.

Lastly, man is perfectible. This proposition needs some explanation.

By perfectible it is not meant that he is capable of being brought to perfection. But the word seems sufficiently adapted to express the faculty of being continually made better and receiving perpetual improvement, and in this sense it is here to be understood. The term perfectible, thus explained, not only does not imply the capacity of being brought to perfection, but stands in express opposition to it. If we could arrive at perfection, there would be an end of our improvement. There is, however, one thing of great importance that it does imply, every perfection or excellence that human beings are competent to conceive, human beings, unless in cases that are palpably and unequivocally excluded by the structure of their frame, are competent to attain.

This is an inference which immediately follows from the omnipotence of truth. Every truth that is capable of being communicated is capable of being brought home to the conviction of the mind. Every principle which can be brought home to the conviction of the mind will infallibly produce a correspondent effect upon the conduct. If there were not something in the nature of man incompatible with absolute perfection, the doctrine of the omnipotence of truth would afford no small probability that he would one day reach it. Why is the perfection of man impossible?

The idea of absolute perfection is scarcely within the grasp of human understanding. If science were more familiarized to speculations of this sort, we should perhaps discover that the notion itself was pregnant with absurdity and contradiction.

It is not necessary in this argument to dwell upon the limited nature of human faculties. We can neither be present to all places nor to all times. We cannot penetrate into the essences of things, or rather, we have no sound and satisfactory knowledge of things external to ourselves, but merely of our own sensations. We cannot discover the causes of things, or ascertain that in the antecedent which connects it with the consequent, and discern nothing but their contiguity. With what pretence can a being thus shut in on all sides lay claim to absolute perfection?

But not to insist upon these considerations, there is one principle in the human mind which must forever exclude us from arriving at a close of our acquisitions, and confine us to perpetual progress. The human mind, so far as we are acquainted with it, is nothing else but a faculty of perception. All our knowledge, all our ideas, every thing we possess as intelligent beings, comes from impression. All the minds that exist set out from absolute ignorance. They received first one impression, and then a second. As the impressions became more numerous, and were stored by the help of memory, and combined by the faculty of association; so the experience increased, and with the experience, the knowledge, the wisdom, every thing that distinguishes man from what we understand by a "clod of the valley."¹ This seems to be a simple and incontrovertible history of intellectual beings; and if it be true, then as our accumulations have been incessant in the time that is gone; so, as long as we continue to perceive, to remember or reflect, they must perpetually increase.

FROM BOOK V OF LEGISLATIVE AND EXECUTIVE POWER

CHAPTER IV OF A VIRTUOUS DESPOTISM

There is a principle frequently maintained upon this subject, which is well entitled to our impartial consideration. It is granted by those who espouse it, "that absolute monarchy, from the imperfection of those by whom it is administered, is most frequently attended with evil," but they assert, "that it is the best and most desirable of all forms under a good and virtuous prince. It is exposed," say they, "to the fate of all excellent natures, and from the best thing frequently, if corrupted, becomes the worst." This remark is certainly not very decisive of the general question, so long as any weight shall be attributed to the arguments which have been adduced to evince, what sort of character and disposition may be ordinarily expected in princes. It may, however, be allowed, if true, to create in the mind a sort of partial retrospect to this happy and perfect despotism, and if it can be shown to be false, it will render the argument for the abolition of monarchy, so far as it is concerned, more entire and complete.

Now, whatever dispositions any man may possess in favor of the welfare of others, two things are necessary to give them validity: discernment and power. I can promote the welfare of a few persons, because I can be sufficiently informed of their circumstances. I can promote the welfare of many in certain general articles, because for this purpose it is only necessary that I should be informed of the nature of the human mind as such, not of the personal situation of the individuals concerned. But for one man to undertake to administer the affairs of millions, to supply, not general principles and perspicuous reasoning, but particular application, and measures adapted to the necessities of the moment, is of all undertakings the most extravagant and absurd.

The most simple and obvious of all proceedings is for each man to be the sovereign arbiter of his own concerns. If the imperfection, the narrow views, and the mistakes of human beings render this in certain cases inexpedient and impracticable, the next resource is to call in the opinion of his peers, persons who from their vicinity may be presumed to have some general knowledge of the case, and who have leisure and means minutely to investigate the merits of the question. It cannot reasonably be doubted that the same expedient which men employed in their civil and criminal concerns, would by uninstructed mortals be adopted in the assessment of taxes, in the deliberations of commerce, and in every other article in which their common interests were involved, only generalizing the deliberative assembly or panel in proportion to the generality of the question to be decided.

Monarchy, instead of referring every question to the persons concerned or their neighbors, refers it to a single individual placed at the greatest distance possible from the ordinary members of the society. Instead of distributing the causes to be judged into as many parcels as they would conveniently admit for the sake of providing leisure and opportunities of examination, it draws them to a single centre, and renders enquiry and examination impossible. A despot, however virtuously disposed, is obliged to act in the dark, to derive his knowledge from other men's information, and to execute his behests by other men's instrumentality. Monarchy seems to be a species of government proscribed by the nature of man, and those persons who furnished their despot with integrity and virtue forgot to add omniscience and omnipotence, qualities not less necessary to fit him for the office they have provided.

Let us suppose this honest and incorruptible despot to be served by ministers, avaricious, hypocritical, and interested. What will the people gain by the good intentions of their monarch? He will mean them the greatest benefits, but he will be altogether unacquainted with their situation, their character, and their wants. The information he receives will frequently be found the very reverse of the truth. He will be taught that one individual is highly meritorious and a proper subject of reward, whose only merit is the profligate cruelty with which he has served the purposes of his administration. He will be taught that another is the pest of the community, who is indebted for this report to the steady virtue with which he has traversed and defeated the wickedness of government. He will mean the greatest benefits to his people; but when he prescribes something calculated for their advantage, his servants under pretence of complying shall in reality perpetrate danmetrically the reverse. Nothing will be more dangerous than to endeavor to remove the obscurity with which his ministers surround him. The man who attempts so hardy a task will become the incessant object of their hatred. However unalterable may be the justice of the sovereign, the time will come when his observation will be laid asleep, while malice and revenge are ever vigilant. Could he unfold the secrets of his prison houses of state, he would find men committed in his name whose crimes he never knew, whose names he never heard of, perhaps men whom he honored and esteemed. Such is the history of the benevolent and philanthropic despots whom memory has recorded; and the conclusion from the whole is, that wherever despotism exists, there it will always be attended with the evils of despotism,—capricious measures and arbitrary infliction.

“But will not a wise king take care to provide himself with good and virtuous servants?” Undoubtedly he will effect a part of this, but he cannot supersede the essential nature of things. He that executes any office as a deputy will never discharge it in the same perfection as if he were the principal. Either the minister must be the author of the plans which he carries into effect, and then it is of little consequence, except so far as relates to his integrity in the choice of his servants, what sort of mortal the sovereign shall be found, or he must play a subordinate part, and then it is impossible to transmute into his mind the perspicacity and energy of his master. Wherever despotism exists, it cannot remain in a single hand, but must be transmitted whole and entire through all the progressive links of authority. To render despotism auspicious and benign it is necessary, not only that the sovereign should possess every human excellence, but that all his officers should be men of penetrating genius and unspotted virtue. If they fall short of this, they will, like the ministers of Elizabeth, be sometimes specious profligates,¹ and sometimes men who, however admirably adapted for the technical emergencies of business, consult on many occasions exclusively their private advantage, worship the rising sun, enter into vindictive cabals, and cuff down new-fledged merit.² Wherever the continuity is broken, the flood of vice will bear down all before it. One weak or disingenuous man will be the source of unbounded mischief. It is the nature of monarchy under all its forms to confide greatly in the discretion of individuals. It provides no resource for maintaining and diffusing the spirit of justice. Everything rests upon the permanence and extent of personal virtue

Another position, not less generally asserted than that of the desirableness of a virtuous despotism, is, "that republicanism is a species of government, practicable only in a small state, while monarchy is best fitted to embrace the concerns of a vast and flourishing empire" The reverse of this, so far at least as relates to monarchy, appears at first sight to be the truth. The competence of any government cannot be measured by a purer standard than the extent and accuracy of its information. In this respect monarchy appears in all cases to be wretchedly deficient, but if it can ever be admitted, it must surely be in those narrow and limited instances where an individual can, with least absurdity, be supposed to be acquainted with the affairs and interests of the whole

CHAPTER VI MORAL EFFECTS OF ARISTOCRACY

There is one thing, more than all the rest, of importance to the well-being of mankind,—justice Can there be any thing problematrical or paradoxical in this fundamental principle,—that all injustice is injury, and a thousand times more injurious by its effects in perverting the understanding and overturning our calculations of the future, than by the immediate calamity it may produce?

All moral science may be reduced to this one head,—calculation of the future We cannot reasonably expect virtue from the multitude of mankind if they be induced by the perverseness of the conductors of human affairs to believe that it is not their interest to be virtuous. But this is not the point upon which the question turns. Virtue is nothing else but the pursuit of general good Justice is the standard which discriminates the advantage of the many and of the few, of the whole and a part. If this first and most important of all subjects be involved in obscurity, how shall the well-being of mankind be substantially promoted? The most benevolent of our species will be engaged in crusades of error, while the cooler and more phlegmatic spectators, discerning no evident clue that should guide them amidst the labyrinth, sit down in selfish neutrality, and leave the complicated scene to produce its own dénouement.

It is true that human affairs can never be reduced to that state of depravation as to reverse the nature of justice. Virtue will always be the interest of the individual as well as of the public Immediate virtue will always be beneficial to the present age, as well as to their posterity. But though the depravation cannot rise to this excess, it will be abundantly sufficient to obscure the understanding and mislead the conduct. Human beings will never be so virtuous as they might easily be made, till justice be the spectacle perpetually presented to their view, and injustice be wondered at as a prodigy

Of all the principles of justice there is none so material to the moral rectitude of mankind as this that no man can be distinguished but by his personal merit Why not endeavor to reduce to practice so simple and sublime a lesson? When a man has proved himself a benefactor to the public, when he has already by laudable perseverance cultivated in himself talents which need only encouragement and public favor to bring them to maturity, let that man be honored In a state of society where fictitious distinctions are unknown, it is impossible he should not be honored But that a man should be looked up to with servility and awe because the king has bestowed on him a spurious name or decorated him with a ribbon, that another should wallow in luxury because his ancestor three centuries ago bled in the quarrel of Lancaster or York,—do we imagine that these iniquities can be practiced without injury?

Let those who entertain this opinion converse a little with the lower orders of mankind. They will perceive that the unfortunate wretch, who with unremitted labor finds himself incapable adequately to feed and clothe his family, has a sense of injustice rankling at his heart.

One whom distress has spited with the world Is he whom tempting fiends would pitch upon To do such deeds as make the prosperous men Lift up their hands and wonder who could do them?

Such is the education of the human species Such is the fabric of political society

But let us suppose that their sense of injustice were less acute than it is here described. What favorable inference can be drawn from that? Is not the injustice real? If the minds of men be so withered and stupified by the constancy with which it is practiced, that they do not feel the rigor that grinds them into nothing, how does that improve the picture?

Let us for a moment give the reins to reflection, and endeavor accurately to conceive the state of mankind where justice should form the public and general principle. In that case our moral feelings would assume a firm and wholesome tone, for they would not be perpetually counteracted by examples that weakened their energy and confounded their clearness. Men would be fearless because they would know that there were no legal snares lying in wait for their lives. They would be courageous because no man would be pressed to the earth that another might enjoy immoderate luxury, because every one would be secure of the just reward of his industry and prize of his exertions. Jealousy and hatred would cease, for they are the offspring of injustice. Every man would speak truth with his neighbor, for there would be no temptation to falsehood and deceit. Mind would find its level, for there would be everything to encourage and to animate. Science would be unspeakably improved, for understanding would convert into a real power, no longer an ignis fatuus, shining and expiring by turns, and leading us into sloughs of sophistry, false science, and specious mistake. All men would be disposed to avow their dispositions and actions; none would endeavor to suppress the just eulogium of his neighbor, for so long as there were tongues to record, the suppression would be impossible; none fear to detect the misconduct of his neighbor, for there would be no laws converting the sincere expression of our convictions into a libel.

Let us fairly consider for a moment what is the amount of injustice included in the institution of aristocracy. I am born, suppose, a Polish prince, with an income of £300,000 per annum. You are born a manorial serf or a Creolian negro, attached to the soil and transferable by barter or otherwise to twenty successive lords. In vain shall be your most generous efforts and your unwearied industry to free yourself from the intolerable yoke. Doomed by the law of your birth, to wait at the gates of the palace you must never enter, to sleep under a ruined weather-beaten roof while your master sleeps under canopies of state, to feed on putrid offals while the world is ransacked for delicacies for his table, to labor without moderation or limit under a parching sun while he basks in perpetual sloth, and to be rewarded at last with contempt, reprimand, stripes, and mutilation. In fact the case is worse than this. I could endure all that injustice or caprice could inflict, provided I possessed in the resource of a firm mind the power of looking down with pity on my tyrant, and of knowing that I had that within, that sacred character of truth, virtue, and fortitude, which all his injustice could not reach. But a slave and a serf are condemned to stupidity and vice as well as to calamity.

Is all things nothing? Is all this necessary for the maintenance of civil order? Let it be recollected that, for this distinction, there is not the smallest foundation, in the nature of things, that, as we have already said, there is no particular mould for the construction of lords; and that they are born neither better nor worse than the poorest of their dependents. It is this structure of aristocracy in all its sanctuaries and fragments against which reason and philosophy have declared war. It is alike unjust, whether we consider it in the castes of India, the villainage of feudal system, or the despotism of the patricians of ancient Rome dragging their debtors into personal servitude to expiate loans they could not repay. Mankind will never be in an eminent degree virtuous and happy till each man shall possess that portion of distinction, and no more, to which he is entitled by his personal merits. The dissolution of aristocracy is equally the interest of the oppressor and the oppressed. The one will be delivered from the listlessness of tyranny, and the other from the brutalizing operation of servitude. How long shall we be told in vain, "that mediocrity of fortune is the true rampart of personal happiness?"

EXTRACT

FROM THE CONCLUSION OF A POEM, COMPOSED IN ANTICIPATION OF LEAVING SCHOOL 1786 1815

Dear native regions, I foretell,
From what I feel at this farewell, That, wheresoe'er my steps may tend.
And whensoe'er my course shall end
If in that hour a single tie Survive of local sympathy,
My soul will cast the backward view.
The longing look alone on you

Thus, while the sun sinks down to rest 10 Far in the regions of the west, Though to the vale no parting beam
Be given, not one memorial gleam.
A lingering light he fondly throws
On the dear hills where first he rose

WRITTEN IN VERY EARLY YOUTH 1786 1802

Calm is all nature as a resting wheel
The kine are couched upon the dewy grass,
The horse alone, seen dimly as I pass,
Is cropping audibly his later meal 5 Dark is the ground, a slumber seems to steal
O'er vale, and mountain, and the starless sky
Now, in this blank of things, a harmony,
Home-felt, and home-created, comes to heal That grief for which the senses still supply
10 Fresh food; for only then, when memory Is hushed, am I at rest My friends' restrain
Those busy cares that would allay my pain, Oh' leave me to myself, nor let me feel The officious touch that makes me droop
again.

From AN EVENING WALK
1787-89 1793

Dear Brook, farewell! Tomorrow's noon again
Shall hide me, wooing long thy wildwood strain;
But now the sun has gained his western road,
And eve's mild hour invites my steps
abroad.

90 While, near the midway cliff, the silvered kite
In many a whistling circle wheels her
flight;
Slant watery lights, from parting clouds, apace
Travel along the precipice's base, Cheering its naked waste of scattered stone.
95 By lichens gray, and scanty moss, o'er-
grown,
Where scarce the foxglove peeps, or thistle's beard,
And restless stone-chat,¹ all day long, is
heard

How pleasant, as the sun declines, to view
The spacious landscape change in form and hue!
100 Here, vanish, as in mist, before a flood Of bright obscurity, hill, lawn, and wood.
There, objects, by the searching beams betrayed,
Come forth, and here retire in purple
shade,
Even the white stems of birch, the cottage white.
105 Soften then glare before the mellow light,
The skiffs, at anchor where with umbrage wide Yon chestnuts half the latticed boathouse hide,
Shed from their sides, that face the sun's slant beam,
Strong flakes of radiance on the tremulous stream 110 Raised by yon travelling flock, a dusty cloud Mounts from the road, and spreads its moving shroud.
The shepherd, all involved in wreaths of flee,
Now shows a shadowy speck, and now is lost entire

Nay, traveller! rest This lonely yew-tree stands
Far from all human dwelling what if here No sparkling rivulet spread the verdant herb?

10 First covered, and here taught this aged
tree
With its dark arms to form a circling
bower,
I well remember.¹—He was one who owned No common soul In youth by science nursed,
And led by Nature into a wild scene 15 Of lofty hopes, he to the world went forth A favored Being, knowing no desire Which genius did not hallow, 'gainst the taint
Of dissolute tongues, and jealousy, and hate,
And scorn,—against all enemies prepared.
20 All but neglect The world, for so it
thought.
Owed him no service, wherefore he at once With indignation turned himself away.
And with the food of pride sustained his soul
In solitude — Stranger! these gloomy boughs

to sit,
His only visitants a straggling sheep.
The stone-chat,² or the glancing sandpiper
And on these barren rocks, with fern and heath,
And juniper and thistle, sprinkled o'er.
30 Fixing his downcast eye, he many an hour
A morbid pleasure nourished, tracing here An emblem of his own unfruitful life And, lifting up his head, he then would gaze
On the more distant scene,—how lovely 'tis 35 Thou seest,—and he would gaze till it became Far lovelier, and his heart could not sustain
The beauty, still more beauteous! Nor,
that time,

The world and human life appeared a scene
Of kindred loveliness: then he would sigh, Inly disturbed, to think that others felt What he must never feel: and so, lost

THE REVERIE OF POOR SUSAN

1797

1800

At the corner of Wood Street, when daylight appears,
Hangs a thrush that sings loud, it has sung for three years:
Poor Susan has passed by the spot, and has heard In the silence of morning the song of the bird.
5 'Tis a note of enchantment; what ails her? She sees
A mountain ascending, a vision of
trees;
Bright volumes of vapor through Lothbury glide,
And a river flows on through the vale of Cheapside

Green pastures she views in the midst of the dale,
10 Down which she so often has tripped with her pail;
And a single small cottage, a nest like a dove's,
The one only dwelling on earth that she loves.

She looks, and her heart is in heaven but they fade,
The mist and the river, the hill and the
shade:
15 The stream will not flow, and the hill will not rise,
And the colors have all passed away from her eyes!

WE ARE SEVEN 1798 1798

—A simple child,
That lightly draws its breath,
And feels its life in every limb,
What should it know of death?

5 I met a little cottage girl
She was eight years old, she said, Her hair was thick with many a curl
That clustered round her head

She had a rustic, woodland air, 10 And she was wildly clad.
Her eyes were fair, and very fair.
—Her beauty made me glad “Sisters and brothers, little maid, How many may you be?”

15 “How many? Seven in all,” she said,
And wondering looked at me

“And where are they? I pray you tell” She answered, “Seven are we;
And two of us at Conway dwell,
20 And two are gone to sea

“Two of us in the churchyard lie,
My sister and my brother;
And, in the churchyard cottage, I Dwell near them with my mother”

25 “You say that two at Conway dwell,
And two are gone to sea,
Yet ye are seven! I pray you tell.
Sweet maid, how this may be”

Then did the little maid reply, 30 “Seven boys and girls are we,
Two of us in the churchyard lie,
Beneath the churchyard tree”

“You run about, my little maid,
Your limbs they are alive, 35 If two are in the churchyard laid, Then ye are only five.”

“Their graves are green, they may be seen,”
The little maid replied, “Twelve steps or more from my mother's
door,
40 And they are side by side

“My stockings there I often knit,
My kerchief there I hem,
And there upon the ground I sit,
And sing a song to them

45 “And often after sunset, sir,
When it is light and fair,
I take my little porringer,
And eat my supper there

“The first that died was sister Jane, 50 In bed she moaning lay,
Till God released her of her pain.
And then she went away

“So in the churchyard she was laid
And, when the grass was dry, 55 Together round her grave we played,
My brother John and I.

“And when the ground was white with
snow,
And I could run and slide,
My brother John was forced to go, 60 And he lies by her side”

“How many are you, then,” said I.
“If they two are in heaven!”
Quick was the little maid's reply, “O master! we are seven”

65 But they are dead; those two are dead!
Their spirits are in heaven!”
’Twas throwing words away; for still The little maid would have her will,
And said, “Nay, we are seven”

THE THORN
1798 1798

“There is a Thorn—it looks so old.
In truth, you'd find it hard to say How it could ever have been young.
It looks so old and gray.

5 Not higher than a two years' child
It stands erect, this aged Thorn;
No leaves it has, no prickly points;
It is a mass of knotted joints,

A wretched thing forlorn.

- 10 It stands erect, and like a stone With lichens is it overgrown.

- "Like rock or stone, it is o'ergrown, With lichens to the very top,
And hung with heavy tufts of moss, 15 A melancholy crop
Up from the earth these mosses creep,
And this poor Thorn they clasp it round
So close, you'd say that they are bent With plain and manifest intent 20 To drag it to the ground,
And all have joined in one endeavor To bury this poor Thorn forever

- "High on a mountain's highest ridge, Where oft the stormy winter gale 25 Cuts like a scythe, while through the clouds It sweeps from vale to vale,
Not five yards from the mountain path.
This Thorn you on your left espy,
And to the left, three yards beyond, 30 You see a little muddy pond
Of water—never dry.
Though but of compass small and bare To thirsty suns and parching air

- "And, close beside this aged Thorn, 35 There is a fresh and lovely sight,
A beauteous heap, a hill of moss,
Just half a foot in height
All lovely colors there you see,
All colors that were ever seen, 40 And mossy network too is there,
As if by hand of lady fair
The work had woven been,
And cups, the darlings of the eye,
So deep is then vermilion dye

- 45 "Ah me! what lovely tints are there
Of olive green and scarlet bright,
In spikes, in branches, and in stars,
Green, red, and pearly white!
This heap of earth o'ergrown with moss, 50 Which close beside the Thorn you see,
So fresh in all its beauteous dyes,
Is like an infant's grave in size,
As like as like can be
But never, never anywhere, 55 An infant's grave was half so fair

- "Now would you see this aged Thorn,
This pond, and beauteous hill of moss,
You must take care and choose your time
The mountain when to cross 60 For oft there sits between the heap,
So like an infant's grave in size,
And that same pond of which I spoke,

A woman in a scarlet cloak,
And to herself she cries,
65 'Oh misery! oh misery!
Oh woe is me! oh misery!'

- "At all times of the day and night
This wretched woman thither goes,
And she is known to every star,
70 And every wind that blows,
And there, beside the Thorn, she sits
When the blue daylight's in the skies,
And when the whirlwind's on the hill,
Or frosty air is keen and still,
75 And to herself she cries,
'Oh misery! oh misery!
Oh woe is me! oh misery!'

- "Now wherefore, thus, by day and night,
In rain, in tempest, and in snow, 80 Thus to the dreary mountain-top Does this poor woman go?
And why sits she beside the Thorn
When the blue daylight's in the sky
Or when the whirlwind's on the hill, 85 Or frosty air is keen and still,
And wherefore does she cry?— (O wherefore? wherefore? tell me why Does she repeat that doleful cry?)"

- "I cannot tell, I wish I could, 90 For the true reason no one knows But would you gladly view the spot,
The spot to which she goes,
The hillock like an infant's grave,
The pond—and Thorn, so old and gray, 95 Pass by her door—'tis seldom shut—
And if you see her in her hut
Then to the spot away!
I never heard of such a dare Approach the spot when she is there."

- 100 "But wherefore to the mountain-top Can this unhappy woman go, Whatever star is in the skies, Whatever wind may blow?"
"Full twenty years are past and gone 105 Since she (her name is Martha Ray) Gave with a maiden's true good-will Her company to Stephen Hill
And she was blithe and gay, While friends and kindred all approved 110 Of him whom tenderly she loved.

- "And they had fixed the wedding day,
The morning that must wed them both,
But Stephen to another maid
Had sworn another oath.
115 And, with this other maid, to church Unthinking Stephen went—

Poor Martha! on that woeful day
 A pang of pitiless dismay Into her soul was sent;
 120 A fire was kindled in her breast,
 Which might not burn itself to rest.
 "They say, full six months after this,
 While yet the summer leaves were green,
 She to the mountain-top would go, 125 And there was often seen.
 What could she seek?—or wish to hide?
 Her state to any eye was plain,
 She was with child, and she was mad,
 Yet often was she sober sad 130 From her exceeding pain.
 O guilty father—would that death
 Had saved him from that breach of faith!

"Sad case for such a brain to hold Communion with a stirring child!
 135 Sad case, as you may think, for one Who had a brain so wild!
 Last Christmas-eve we talked of this,
 And gray-haired Wilfred of the glen Held that the unborn infant wrought 140 About its mother's heart, and brought Her senses back again
 And, when at last her time drew near,
 Her looks were calm, her senses clear

"More know I not, I wish I did, 145 And it should all be told to you;
 For what became of this poor child
 No mortal ever knew,
 Nay—if a child to her was born
 No earthly tongue could ever tell, 150 And if 'twas born alive or dead,
 Far less could this with proof be said,
 But some remember well
 That Martha Ray about this time
 Would up the mountain often climb

"And all that winter, when at night
 The wind blew from the mountain-peak,
 'Twas worth your while, though in the dark,
 The churchyard path to seek.
 For many a time and oft were heard 160 Cries coming from the mountain head Some plainly living voices were,
 And others, I've heard many swear,
 Were voices of the dead.
 I cannot think, whate'er they say, 165 They had to do with Martha Ray.

"But that she goes to this old Thorn,
 The Thorn which I described to you.
 And there sits in a scarlet cloak.
 I will be sworn is true.

170 For one day with my telescope,
 To view the ocean wide and bright,
 When to this country first I came,
 Ere I had heard of Martha's name,
 I climbed the mountain's height—175 A storm came on, and I could see No object higher than my knee.

"'Twas mist and rain, and storm and rain
 No screen, no fence could I discover, And then the wind! in sooth, it was 180 A wind full ten times over.
 I looked around, I thought I saw A jutting crag,—and off I ran,
 Head-foremost, through the driving rain
 The shelter of the crag to gain, 185 And, as I am a man,
 Instead of jutting crag I found A woman seated on the ground

"I did not speak—I saw her face,
 Her face!—it was enough for me, 190 I turned about and heard her cry.
 'Oh misery! oh misery!'
 And there she sits, until the moon Through half the clear blue sky will go
 And when the little breezes make 195 The waters of the pond to shake,
 As all the country know,
 She shudders, and you hear her cry.
 'Oh misery! oh misery!'"

"But what's the Thorn? and what the pond?
 200 And what the hill of moss to her?
 And what the creeping breeze that comes The little pond to stir?"
 "I cannot tell, but some will say She hanged her baby on the tree; 205 Some say she drowned it in the pond,
 Which is a little step beyond
 But all and each agree,
 The little babe was buried there,
 Beneath that hill of moss so fair

"I've heard, the moss is spotted red With drops of that poor infant's blood.
 But kill a new-born infant thus,
 I do not think she could;
 Some say if to the pond you go, 215 And fix on it a steady view,
 The shadow of a babe you trace,
 A baby and a baby's face,
 And that it looks at you;
 Whene'er you look on it, 'tis plain 220 The baby looks at you again.

"And some had sworn an oath that she Should be to public justice brought;

And for the little infant's bones
 With spades they would have sought.
 225 But instantly the hill of moss Before their eyes began to stir!
 And, for full fifty yards around,
 The grass—it shook upon the ground!
 Yet all do still aver 230 The little babe lies buried there,
 Beneath that hill of moss so fair

“I cannot tell how this may be,
 But plain it is the Thorn is bound With heavy tufts of moss that strive 235 To drag it to the ground,
 And this I know, full many a time,
 When she was on the mountain high.
 By day, and in the silent night,
 When all the stars shone clear and bright, 240 That I have heard her cry.
 ‘Oh misery! oh misery!’
 Oh woe is me! oh misery!’”

GOODY BLAKE AND HARRY GILL

A TRUE STORY
 1798 1798

Oh! what's the matter? what's the matter?
 What is't that ails young Harry Gill?
 That evermore his teeth they chatter, Chatter, chatter, chatter still!
 5 Of waistcoats Harry has no lack,
 Good duffle¹ gray, and flannel fine,
 He has a blanket on his back,
 And coats enough to smother nine

In March, December, and in July, 10 'Tis all the same with Harry Gill,
 The neighbors tell, and tell you truly,
 His teeth they chatter, chatter still At night, at morning, and at noon,
 'Tis all the same with Harry Gill,
 15 Beneath the sun, beneath the moon,
 His teeth they chatter, chatter still!

Young Harry was a lusty drover,
 And who so stout of limb as he?
 His cheeks were red as ruddy clover; 20 His voice was like the voice of three.
 Old Goody Blake was old and poor;
 Ill fed she was, and thinly clad,
 And any man who passed her door Might see how poor a hut she had.

25 All day she spun in her poor dwelling:
 And then her three hours' work at night,
 Alas! 'twas hardly worth the telling.
 It would not pay for candle-light.
 Remote from sheltered village-green, 30 On a hill's northern side she dwelt,

¹ A kind of coarse woollen cloth having a thick nap.

Where from sea-blasts the hawthorns lean,
 And hoary dews are slow to melt.

By the same fire to boil their pottage,
 Two poor old dames, as I have known, 35 Will often live in one small cottage;
 But she, poor woman! housed alone.
 'Twas well enough, when summer came,
 The long, warm, lightsome summer-day,
 Then at her door the canty¹ dame 40 Would sit, as any linnet, gay

But when the ice our streams did fetter.
 Oh then how her old bones would shake!
 You would have said, if you had met her,
 'Twas a hard time for Goody Blake 45 Her evenings then were dull and dead Sad case it was, as you may think,
 For very cold to go to bed,
 And then for cold not sleep a wink.

O joy for her! whene'er in winter 50 The winds at night had made a rout,
 And scattered many a lusty splinter
 And many a rotten bough about Yet never had she, well or sick,
 As every man who knew her says, 55 A pile beforehand, turf or stick,
 Enough to warm her for three days

Now, when the frost was past enduring,
 And made her poor old bones to ache,
 Could anything be more alluring 60 Than an old hedge to Goody Blake?
 And, now and then, it must be said,
 When her old bones were cold and chill,
 She left her fire, or left her bed,
 To seek the hedge of Harry Gill.

65 Now Harry he had long suspected This trespass of old Goody Blake,
 And vowed that she should be detected—That he on her would vengeance take
 And oft from his warm fire he'd go, 70 And to the fields his road would take,
 And there, at night, in frost and snow,
 He watched to seize old Goody Blake.

And once, behind a rick of barley,
 Thus looking out did Harry stand.
 75 The moon was full and shining clearly,
 And crisp with frost the stubble land —He hears a noise—he's all awake—
 Again?—on tip-toe down the hill
 He softly creeps—'tis Goody Blake:
 80 She's at the hedge of Harry Gill!

Right glad was he when he beheld her:
 Stick after stick did Goody pull:

¹ cheerful

He stood behind a bush of elder,
Till she had filled her apron full 85 When with her load she turned about,
The by-way back again to take;
He started forward, with a shout,
And sprang upon poor Goody Blake

And fiercely by the arm he took her, 90 And by the arm he held her fast,
And fiercely by the arm he shook her,
And cried, "I've caught you then at last!"
Then Goody, who had nothing said,
Her bundle from her lap let fall, 95 And, kneeling on the sticks, she prayed To God that is the judge of all

She prayed, her withered hand uprearing, While Harry held her by the arm—
"God! who art never out of hearing.
100 O may he never more be warm!"
The cold, cold moon above her head.
Thus on her knees did Goody pray, Young Harry heard what she had said
And icy cold he turned away.

105 He went complaining all the morrow
That he was cold and very chill:
His face was gloom, his heart was sorrow, Alas! that day for Harry Gill!
That day he wore a riding-coat.
110 But not a whit the warmer he Another was on Thursday brought,
And ere the Sabbath he had three.

'Twas all in vain, a useless matter,
And blankets were about him pinned, 115 Yet still his jaws and teeth they clatter, Like a loose casement in the wind
And Harry's flesh it fell away,
And all who see him say, 'tis plain,
That, live as long as live he may.
120 He never will be warm again.

No word to any man he utters,
A-bed or up, to young or old;
But ever to himself he mutters,
"Poor Harry Gill is very cold." 125 A-bed or up, by night or day;
His teeth they chatter, chatter still Now think, ye farmers all, I pray,
Of Goody Blake and Harry Gill!

HER EYES ARE WILD
1798 1798

Her eyes are wild, her head is bare,
The sun has burnt her coal-black hair;
Her eyebrows have a rusty stain,
And she came far from over the main 5 She had a baby on her arm.

Or else she were alone.
And underneath the hay-stack warm,
And on the greenwood stone,
She talked and sung the woods among,
10 And it was in the English tongue

"Sweet babe! they say that I am mad, But nay, my heart is far too glad,
And I am happy when I sing Full many a sad and doleful thing 15 Then, lovely baby, do not fear!
I pray thee have no fear of me,
But safe as in a cradle, here,
My lovely baby! thou shalt be To thee I know too much I owe;
20 I cannot work thee any woe.

"A fire was once within my brain,
And in my head a dull, dull pain,
And fiendish faces, one, two, three,
Hung at my breast, and pulled at me.
25 But then there came a sight of joy,
It came at once to do me good,
I waked, and saw my little boy.
My little boy of flesh and blood.
Oh joy for me that sight to see!
30 For he was here, and only he.

"Suck, little babe, oh suck again!
It cools my blood, it cools my brain,
Thy lips I feel them, baby! they Draw from my heart the pain away
35 Oh! press me with thy little hand,
It loosens something at my chest;
About that tight and deadly band
I feel thy little fingers press
The breeze I see is in the tree
40 It comes to cool my babe and me

"Oh! love me, love me, little boy!
Thou art thy mother's only joy,
And do not dread the waves below,
When o'er the sea-rock's edge we go.
45 The high crag cannot work me harm.
Nor leaping torrents when they howl.
The babe I carry on my arm,
He saves for me my precious soul.
Then happy lie; for blest am I;
50 Without me my sweet babe would die

"Then do not fear, my boy! for thee Bold as a lion will I be;
And I will always be thy guide,
Through hollow snows and rivers wide 55 I'll build an Indian bower; I know
The leaves that make the softest bed:
And if from me thou wilt not go,
But still be true till I am dead,
My pretty thing! then thou shalt sing 60 As merry as the birds in spring

"Thy father cares not for my breast,
 'Tis thine, sweet baby, there to rest;
 'Tis all thine own!—and if its hue
 Be changed, that was so fair to view, 65 'Tis fair enough for thee, my dove!
 My beauty, little child, is flown,
 But thou wilt live with me in love;
 And what if my poor cheek be brown?
 'Tis well for me thou canst not see 70 How pale and wan it else would be.

 "Dread not their taunts, my little life,
 I am thy father's wedded wife;
 And underneath the spreading tree
 We two will live in honesty.
 75 If his sweet boy he could forsake,
 With me he never would have stayed:
 From him no harm my babe can take,
 But he, poor man! is wretched made.
 And every day we two will pray 80 For him that's gone and far away

 "I'll teach my boy the sweetest things.
 I'll teach him how the owl sings—
 My little babe! thy lips are still,
 And thou hast almost sucked thy fill 85 —Where art thou gone, my own dear child?
 What wicked looks are those I see?
 Alas! Alas! that look so wild,
 It never, never came from me
 If thou art mad, my pretty lad, 90 Then I must be forever sad

 "Oh! smile on me, my little lamb!
 For I thy own dear mother am.
 My love for thee has well been tried I've sought thy father far and wide 95 I know the poisons of the shade,
 I know the earth-nuts fit for food
 Then, pretty dear, be not afraid We'll find thy father in the wood Now laugh and be gay, to the woods away!
 100 And there, my babe, we'll live for aye."

SIMON LEE

THE OLD HUNTSMAN, WITH AN INCIDENT IN WHICH HE WAS CONCERNED
 1798 1798

In the sweet shire of Cardigan.
 Not far from pleasant Ivor-hall,
 An old man dwells, a little man,—
 'Tis said he once was tall.
 5 Full five and thirty years he lived A running huntsman merry;
 And still the centre of his cheek
 Is red as a ripe cherry.

 No man like him the horn could sound, 10 And hill and valley rang with glee

When Echo bandied, round and round,
 The halloo of Simon Lee.

In those proud days, he little cared For husbandry or tillage, 15 To blither tasks did Simon rouse
 The sleepers of the village.

 He all the country could outrun,
 Could leave both man and horse behind,
 And often, ere the chase was done, 20 He reeled, and was stone-blind
 And still there's something in the world
 At which his heart rejoices.
 For when the chiming hounds are out,
 He dearly loves their voices!

 But, oh the heavy change!—bereft Of health, strength, friends, and kindred, see!
 Old Simon to the world is left In liveried poverty.
 His master's dead,—and no one now 30 Dwells in the Hall of Ivor, Men, dogs, and horses, all are dead.
 He is the sole survivor

 And he is lean, and he is sick,
 His body, dwindled and awry, 35 Rests upon ankles swollen and thick:
 His legs are thin and dry
 One prop he has, and only one,
 His wife, an aged woman,
 Lives with him, near the waterfall, 40 Upon the village common

 Beside their moss-grown hut of clay,
 Not twenty paces from the door,
 A scrap of land they have, but they Are poorest of the poor 45 This scrap of land he from the heath Enclosed when he was stronger,
 But what to them avails the land
 Which he can till no longer?

 Oft, working by her husband's side 50 Ruth does what Simon cannot do,
 For she, with scanty cause for pride Is stouter of the two And, though you with your utmost skill
 From labor could not wean them, 55 'Tis little, very little—all That they can do between them

 Few months of life has he in store
 As he to you will tell,
 For still, the more he works, the more 60 Do his weak ankles swell.
 My gentle reader, I perceive

How patiently you've waited,
And now I fear that you expect Some tale will be related

- 65 O reader! had you in your mind
Such stores as silent thought can bring,
O gentle reader! you would find
A tale in every thing
What more I have to say is short.
70 And you must kindly take it It is no tale, but, should you think,
Perhaps a tale you'll make it

- One summer-day I chanced to see This old man doing all he could 75 To unearth the root of an old tree,
A stump of rotten wood
The mattock tottered in his hand,
No vain was his endeavor,
That at the root of the old tree 80 He might have worked forever

- "You're overtasked, good Simon Lee, Give me your tool," to him I said,
And at the word right gladly he Received my proffered aid 85 I struck, and with a single blow
The tangled root I severed,
At which the poor old man so long And vainly had endeavored

- The tears into his eyes were brought 90 And thanks and praises seemed to run
So fast out of his heart, I thought They never would have done
—I've heard of hearts unkind, kind deeds
With coldness still returning.
95 Alas! the gratitude of men Hath oftener left me mourning

LINES WRITTEN IN EARLY SPRING
1798 1798

I heard a thousand blended notes,
While in a grove I sat reclined,
In that sweet mood when pleasant thoughts Bring sad thoughts to the mind

- 5 To her fair works did Nature link
The human soul that through me ran.
And much it grieved my heart to think
What man has made of man

- Through primrose tufts, in that green
bower,
10 The periwinkle trailed its wreaths,
And 'tis my faith that every flower Enjoys the air it breathes

- The birds around me hopped and played,
Their thoughts I cannot measure.— 15 But the least motion which they made,
It seemed a thrill of pleasure.

- The budding twigs spread out their fan,
To catch the breezy air,
And I must think, do all I can,
20 That there was pleasure there

If this belief from heaven be sent,
If such be Nature's holy plan,
Have I not reason to lament
What man has made of man?

TO MY SISTER
1798 1798

It is the first mild day of March Each minute sweeter than before,
The redbreast sings from the tall larch That stands beside our door

- ' There is a blessing in the air,
Which seems a sense of joy to yield To the bare trees, and mountains bare And grass in the green field

- My sister! ('tis a wish of mine) 10 Now that our morning meal is done, Make haste, your morning task resign Come forth and feel the sun

- Edward will come with you,—and, pray
Put on with speed your woodland dress 15 And bring no book for this one day
We'll give to idleness

- No joyless forms shall regulate Our living calendar
We from today, my friend, will date 20 The opening of the year

Love, now a universal birth,
From heart to heart is stealing From earth to man, from man to earth
—It is the hour of feeling

- 25 One moment now may give us more Than years of toiling season
Our minds shall drink at every pore
The spirit of the season

- Some silent laws our hearts will make, 30 Which they shall long obey.
We for the year to come may take Our temper from today

And from the blessed power that rolls
About, below, above, 35 We'll frame the measure of our souls.
They shall be tuned to love.

Then come, my sister! come, I pray,
With speed put on your woodland dress;
And bring no book for this one day
40 We'll give to idleness.

A WHIRL-BLAST FROM BEHIND THE HILL

1800

A whirl-blast from behind the hill
Rush'd o'er the wood with startling sound, Then—all at once the air was still,
And showers of hailstones pattered round 5 Where leafless oaks towered high above,
I sat within an undergrove
Of tallest holies, tall and green;
A fairer bower was never seen.
From year to year the spacious floor 10 With withered leaves is covered o'er,
And all the year the bower is green.
But see! where'er the hailstones drop
The withered leaves all skip and hop;
There's not a breeze—no breath of air—15 Yet here, and there, and everywhere Along the floor, beneath the shade
By those embowering holies made,
The leaves in myriads jump and spring,
As if with pipes and music rare 20 Some Robin Good-fellow were there.
And all those leaves, in festive glee,
Were dancing to the minstrelsy.

EXPOSTULATION AND REPLY

1798

1798

"Why, William, on that old gray stone,
Thus for the length of half a day,
Why, William, sit you thus alone,
And dream your time away?

5 "Where are your books?—that light bequeathed
To beings else forlorn and blind!
Up! up! and drink the spirit breathed From dead men to their kind.

"You look round on your Mother Earth, 10 As if she for no purpose bore you;
As if you were her first-born birth,
And none had lived before you!"

One morning thus, by Esthwaite lake.
When life was sweet, I knew not why.

15 To me my good friend Matthew¹ spake,
And thus I made reply:

"The eye—it cannot choose but see;
We cannot bid the ear be still;
Our bodies feel, where'er they be, 20 Against or with our will.

"Nor less I deem that there are Powers Which of themselves our minds impress;
That we can feed this mind of ours
In a wise passiveness.

25 "Think you, 'mid all this mighty sum Of things forever speaking,
That nothing of itself will come.
But we must still be seeking?

"—Then ask not wherefore, here, alone, 30 Conversing as I may,
I sit upon this old gray stone,
And dream my time away."

THE TABLES TURNED

AN EVENING SCENE ON THE SAME SUBJECT

1798

1798

Up! up! my friend, and quit your books,
Or surely you'll grow double.
Up! up! my friend, and clear your looks;
Why all this toil and trouble?

5 The sun, above the mountain's head,
A freshening lustre mellow Through all the long green fields has
spread,
His first sweet evening yellow

'Books! 'tis a dull and endless strife.' 10 Come, hear the woodland linnet, How sweet his music! on my life,
There's more of wisdom in it.

And hark! how blithe the throstle sings!
He, too, is no mean preacher:
15 Come forth into the light of things, Let Nature be your teacher.

She has a world of ready wealth,
Our minds and hearts to bless—Spontaneous wisdom breathed by health, 20 Truth breathed by cheerfulness.

One impulse from a vernal wood May teach you more of man,
Of moral evil and of good,
Than all the sages can.

¹ "A friend who was somewhat unreasonably attached to modern books of moral philosophy" Wordsworth

25 Sweet is the lore which Nature brings;
 Our meddling intellect Misshapes the beauteous forms of things:—
 We murder to dissect Enough of Science and of Art.
 30 Close up those barren leaves, Come forth, and bring with you a heart That watches and receives

LINES

COMPOSED A FEW MILES ABOVE TINTERA ABBEY, ON REVISITING THE BANKS OF THE WYE DURING A TOUR, JULY 11, 1798
 1798 1798

Five years have past; five summers, with the length Of five long winters! and again I hear These waters, rolling from their mountain-springs
 With a soft inland murmur—Once again 5 Do I behold these steep and lofty cliffs, That on a wild secluded scene impress Thoughts of more deep seclusion; and connect
 The landscape with the quiet of the sky
 The day is come when I again repose 10 Here, under this dark sycamore, and view These plots of cottage-ground, these orchard-tufts,
 Which at this season, with their unripe fruits,
 Are clad in one green hue, and lose themselves
 'Mid groves and copses. Once again I see 15 These hedgerows, hardly hedgerows, little lines
 Of sportive wood run wild: these pastoral farms,
 Green to the very door, and wreaths of smoke
 Sent up, in silence, from among the trees, With some uncertain notice, as might seem 20 Of vagrant dwellers in the houseless woods, Or of some hermit's cave, where by his fire
 The hermit sits alone

These beauteous forms, Through a long absence, have not been
 to me
 25 As is a landscape to a blind man's eye
 But oft, in lonely rooms, and 'mid the din
 Of towns and cities, I have owed to them,
 In hours of weariness, sensations sweet,
 Felt in the blood, and felt along the heart,
 And passing even into my purer mind.
 30 With tranquil restoration:—feelings too
 Of unremembered pleasure: such, perhaps,
 As have no slight or trivial influence

On that best portion of a good man's life,
 His little, nameless, unremembered acts 35 Of kindness and of love. Nor less, I trust, To them I may have owed another gift,
 Of aspect more sublime, that blessed mood,
 In which the burthen of the mystery,
 In which the heavy and the weary weight 40 Of all this unintelligible world, Is lightened—that serene and blessed
 mood,
 In which the affections gently lead us on,— Until, the breath of this corporeal frame And even the motion of our human blood 45 Almost suspended, we are laid asleep In body, and become a living soul.
 While with an eye made quiet by the power Of harmony, and the deep power of joy,
 We see into the life of things.

If this 50 Be but a vain belief, yet, oh! how oft—In darkness and amid the many shapes Of joyless daylight, when the fretful stir
 Unprofitable, and the fever of the world, Have hung upon the beatings of my
 heart—
 55 How oft, in spirit, have I turned to thee, O sylvan Wye! thou wanderer thro' the woods,
 How often has my spirit turned to thee!

And now, with gleams of half-extinguished thought,
 With many recognitions dim and faint, 60 And somewhat of a sad perplexity,
 The picture of the mind revives again
 While here I stand, not only with the sense Of present pleasure, but with pleasing
 thoughts
 That in this moment there is life and food 65 For future years. And so I dare to hope, Though changed, no doubt, from what I was when first
 I came among these hills, when like a roe
 I bounded o'er the mountains, by the sides Of the deep rivers, and the lonely streams, 70 Wherever nature led more like a man Flying from something that he dreads than one Who sought the thing he loved. For nature then (The coarser pleasures of my boyish days,
 And their glad animal movements all gone by)
 75 To me was all in all.—I cannot paint What then I was. The sounding cataract Haunted me like a passion: the tall rock,
 The mountain, and the deep and gloomy
 wood,

- Their colors and their forms, were then
 to me
 80 An appetite; a feeling and a love,
 That had no need of a remoter charm,
 By thought supplied, nor any interest Unborrowed from the eye.—That time is
 past, 85 And all its aching joys are now no more.
 And all its dizzy raptures Not for this Faint I, nor mourn nor murmur, other gifts
 Have followed; for such loss, I would believe,
 Abundant recompense For I have learned To look on nature, not as in the hour 90 Of thoughtless youth; but hearing oftentimes
 The still, sad music of humanity, Nor harsh nor grating, though of ample
 power
 To chasten and subdue And I have felt A presence that disturbs me with the joy 95 Of elevated thoughts, a sense sublime Of something far more deeply interfused, Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
 And the round ocean and the living air,
 And the blue sky, and in the mind of man 100 A motion and a spirit, that impels All thinking things, all objects of all
 thought,
 And rolls through all things Therefore am I still
 A lover of the meadows and the woods,
 And mountains; and of all that we behold 105 From this green earth, of all the mighty
 world
 Of eye, and ear,—both what they half create,
 And what perceive: well pleased to recognize
 In nature and the language of the sense The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse, 110 The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul
 Of all my moral being.
 Nor perchance,
 If I were not thus taught, should I the more Suffer my genial spirits to decay
 For thou art with me here upon the banks 115 Of this fair river; thou my dearest friend, My dear, dear friend; and in thy voice
 I catch
 The language of my former heart, and read My former pleasures in the shooting lights Of thy wild eyes Oh! yet a little while 120 May I behold in thee what I was once, My dear, dear sister! and this prayer
 I make,
 Knowing that Nature never did betray
 The heart that loved her; 'tis her privilege, Through all the years of this our life, to lead
 125 From joy to joy: for she can so inform The mind that is within us, so impress With quietness and beauty, and so feed With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues,
 Rash judgments, nor the sneers of selfish
 men, 130 Nor greetings where no kindness is, nor all The dreary intercourse of daily life, Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb Our cheerful faith, that all which we behold
 Is full of blessings Therefore let the moon 135 Shine on thee in thy solitary walk;
 And let the misty mountain-winds be free
 To blow against thee and, in after years
 When these wild ecstasies shall be matured Into a sober pleasure; when thy mind 140 Shall be a mansion for all lovely forms Thy memory be as a dwelling-place For all sweet sounds and harmonies—oh! then,
 If solitude, or fear, or pain, or grief,
 Should be thy portion, with what healing thoughts
 145 Of tender joy wilt thou remember me, And these my exhortations! Nor, perchance—
 If I should be where I no more can hear Thy voice, nor catch from thy wild eyes these gleams
 Of past existence—wilt thou then forget 150 That on the banks of this delightful stream
 We stood together, and that I, so long A worshipper of Nature, hither came Unwearied in that service rather say With warmer love—oh! with far deeper zeal
 155 Of holier love Nor wilt thou then forget That after many wanderings, many years Of absence, these steep woods and lofty cliffs,
 And this green pastoral landscape, were
 to me
 More dear, both for themselves and for thy sake!

THE OLD CUMBERLAND BEGGAR

1798

1800

- I saw an aged beggar in my walk;
 And he was seated, by the highway side,
 On a low structure of rude masonry Built at the foot of a huge hill, that they 5 Who lead their horses down the steep rough road

May thence remount at ease. The aged man Had placed his staff across the broad smooth stone That overlays the pile, and, from a bag
 All white with flour, the dole of village 10 dames,
 He drew his scraps and fragments, one by one,
 And scanned them with a fixed and serious look
 Of idle computation In the sun,
 Upon the second step of that small pile, Surrounded by those wild unpeopled hills, 15 He sat, and ate his food in solitude
 And ever scattered from his palsied hand.
 That, still attempting to prevent the waste, Was baffled still, the crumbs in little
 showers
 Fell on the ground, and the small mountain birds, 20 Not venturing yet to peck their destined meal, Approached within the length of half his staff

 Him from my childhood have I known and then
 He was so old, he seems not older now.
 He travels on, a solitary man
 25 So helpless in appearance, that for him
 The sauntering horseman throws not with a slack
 And careless hand his alms upon the ground,
 But stops,—that he may safely lodge the coin Within the old man's hat, nor quits him so, 30 But still, when he has given his horse
 the rein,
 Watches the aged beggar with a look Sidelong, and half-reverted She who tends
 The toll-gate, when in summer at her door
 She turns her wheel, if on the road she sees 35 The aged beggar coming, quits her work, And lifts the latch for him that he may pass
 The post-boy, when his rattling wheels o'ertake
 The aged beggar in the woody lane, Shouts to him from behind, and, if thus warned 40 The old man does not change his course.
 the boy
 Turns with less noisy wheels to the roadside,
 And passes gently by, without a curse
 Upon his lips or anger at his heart.

He travels on, a solitary man, 45 His age has no companion. On the ground His eyes are turned, and, as he moves
 along,
 They move along the ground, and, ever-
 more,
 Instead of common and habitual sight
 Of fields with rural works, of hill and dale, 50 And the blue sky, one little span of earth is all his prospect. Thus, from day to day, Bow-bent, his eyes forever on the ground,
 He plies his weary journey, seeing still,
 And seldom knowing that he sees, some
 straw, 55 Some scattered leaf, or marks which, in one track,
 The nails of cart or chariot-wheel have left Impressed on the white road,—in the same line,
 At distance still the same. Poor traveller!
 His staff trails with him; scarcely do his feet 60 Disturb the summer dust; he is so still In look and motion, that the cottage eurs, Ere he has passed the door, will turn away, Weary of barking at him Boys and girls,
 The vacant and the busy, maids and youths,
 65 And urchins newly breeched—all pass him by Him even the slow-paced wagon leaves behind

 But deem not this man useless —
 Statesmen! ye
 Who are so restless in your wisdom, ye
 Who have a broom still ready in your hands 70 To rid the world of nuisances, ye proud, Heart-sworn, while in your pride ye contemplate
 Your talents, power, or wisdom, deem him not
 A burthen of the earth! 'Tis Nature's law
 That none, the meanest of created things, 75 Of forms created the most vile and brute,
 The dullest or most noxious, should exist Divorced from good—a spirit and pulse of good,
 A life and soul, to every mode of being Inseparably linked Then be assured 80 That least of all can aught—that ever owned
 The heaven-regarding eye and front sublime
 Which man is born to—sink, howe'er depressed,
 So low as to be scorned without a sin;
 Without offence to God cast out of view;

- 85 Like the dry remnant of a garden flower Whose seeds are shed, or as an implement Worn out and worthless. While from door to door,
This old man creeps, the villagers in him Behold a record which together binds
- 90 Past deeds and offices of charity,
Else unremembered, and so keeps alive
The kindly mood in hearts which lapse of years,
And that half-wisdom half-experience gives.
Make slow to feel, and by sure steps resign
- 95 To selfishness and cold oblivious cares.
Among the farms and solitary huts,
Hamlets and thinly-scattered villages,
Where'er the aged beggar takes his rounds,
The mild necessity of use compels
- 100 To acts of love; and habit does the work Of reason; yet prepares that after-joy Which reason cherishes. And thus the soul,
By that sweet taste of pleasure unpursued, Doth find herself insensibly disposed
- 105 To virtue and true goodness
- Some there are,
By their good works exalted, lofty minds,
And meditative, authors of delight
And happiness, which to the end of time Will live, and spread, and kindle even such minds
- 110 In childhood, from this solitary being,
Or from like wanderer haply have received (A thing more precious far than all that books
Or the solitudes of love can do!)
- That first mild touch of sympathy and
thought,
- 115 In which they found their kindred with a world Where want and sorrow were The easy
man
Who sits at his own door.—and, like the pear
That overhangs his head from the green
wall,
Feeds in the sunshine; the robust and young,
- 120 The prosperous and unthinking, they who live
Sheltered, and flourish in a little grove
Of their own kindred;—all behold in him
A silent monitor, which on their minds Must needs impress a transitory thought
- 125 Of self-congratulation, to the heart
Of each recalling his peculiar boons, His charters and exemptions; and, perchance,
Though he to no one give the fortitude
And circumspection needful to preserve
- 130 His present blessings, and to husband up The respite of the season, he, at least,
And 'tis no vulgar service, makes them felt
- Yet further.—Many, I believe, there are Who live a life of virtuous decency,
- 135 Men who can hear the Decalogue and feel No self-reproach; who of the moral law Established in the land where they abide Are strict observers, and not negligent In acts of love to those with whom they dwell,
- 140 Their kindred, and the children of their blood.
Praise be to such, and to their slumbers
peace!
—But of the poor man ask, the abject
poor;
- (io, and demand of him, if there be here
In this cold abstinence from evil deeds,
And these inevitable charities,
- 145 Wherewith to satisfy the human soul?
No—man is dear to man; the poorest poor Long for some moments in a weary life When they can know and feel that they have been,
- 150 Themselves, the fathers and the dealers-out Of some small blessings, have been kind to such
As needed kindness, for this single cause,
That we have all of us one human heart —Such pleasure is to one kind being known,
- 155 My neighbor, when with punctual care,
each week,
Duly as Friday comes, though pressed herself
By her own wants, she from her store of meal
Takes one unsparing handful for the scrip
Of this old mendicant, and, from her door
- 160 Returning with exhilarated heart, Sits by her fire, and builds her hope in
heaven
- Then let him pass, a blessing on his head!
And while in that vast solitude to which The tide of things has borne him, he appears
- 165 To breathe and live but for himself alone, Unblamed, uninjured, let him bear about The good which the benignant law of
Heaven
Has hung around him and, while life is his,
Still let him prompt the unlettered villagers To tender offices and pensive thoughts
—Then let him pass, a blessing on his head!
And, long as he can wander, let him breathe

The freshness of the valleys; let his blood Struggle with frosty air and winter snows, 175 And let the chartered¹ wind that sweeps the heath
 Beat his gray locks against his withered
 face
 Reverence the hope whose vital anxiousness Gives the last human interest to his heart May never House, misnamed of Industry,² 180 Make him a captive!—for that pent-up din,
 Those life-consuming sounds that clog
 the air,
 Be his the natural silence of old age!
 Let him be free of mountain solitudes,
 And have around him, whether heard or not,
 185 The pleasant melody of woodland birds Few are his pleasures: if his eyes have now Been doomed so long to settle upon earth
 That not without some effort they behold
 The countenance of the horizontal sun, 190 Rising or setting, let the light at least Find a free entrance to their languid orbs, And let him, where and when he will, sit down
 Beneath the trees, or on a grassy bank
 Of highway side, and with the little birds 195 Share his chance-gathered meal; and finally.
 As in the eve of Nature he has lived,
 So in the eve of Nature let him die!

NUTTING

1799 1800

 It seems a day
 (I speak of one from many singled out) One of those heavenly days that cannot die.
 When, in the eagerness of boyish hope, 5 I left our cottage threshold, sallying forth With a huge wallet o'er my shoulders slung,
 A nutting crook in hand; and turned my steps Tow'rd some far-distant wood, a figure quant, Tricked out in proud disguise of cast-off weeds.³
 10 Which for that service had been husbanded.
 By exhortation of my frugal dame—Motley accoutrement, of power to smile At thorns, and brakes, and brambles,— and in truth
 More ragged than need was! O'er path-less rocks,

15 Through beds of matted fern, and tangled thickets,
 Forcing my way, I came to one dear nook Unvisited, where not a broken bough Drooped with its withered leaves, un-gracious sign
 Of devastation; but the hazels rose 20 Tall and erect, with tempting clusters hung,
 A virgin scene!—A little while I stood, Breathing with such suppression of the
 heart
 As joy delights in; and with wise restraint Voluptuous, fearless of a rival, eyed 25 The banquet,—or beneath the trees I sat Among the flowers, and with the flowers
 I played;
 A temper known to those who, after long
 And weary expectation, have been blest With sudden happiness beyond all hope 30 Perhaps it was a bower beneath whose leaves
 The violets of five seasons reappear
 And fade, unseen by any human eye, Where fairy water-breaks¹ do murmur on Forever, and I saw the sparkling foam.
 35 And—with my cheek on one of those green stones
 That, fleeced with moss, under the shady
 trees,
 Lay round me, scattered like a flock of
 sleep—
 I heard the murmur and the murmuring
 sound,
 In that sweet mood when pleasure loves to pay 40 Tribute to ease, and, of its joy secure.
 The heart luxuriates with indifferent
 things,
 Wasting its kindness on stocks and stones.
 And on the vacant air. Then up I rose.
 And dragged to earth both branch and bough, with crash
 45 And merciless ravage: and the shady nook
 Of hazels, and the green and mossy bower, Deformed and sullied, patiently gave up Their quiet being: and unless I now Confound my present feelings with the
 past, 50 Ere from the mutilated bower I turned Exulting, rich beyond the wealth of kings,
 I felt a sense of pain when I beheld The silent trees, and saw the intruding
 sky.—
 Then, dearest maiden, move along these shades
 55 In gentleness of heart; with gentle hand Touch—for there is a spirit in the woods ripples

STRANGE FITS OF PASSION HAVE I KNOWN

1799 1800

Strange fits of passion have I known
And I will dare to tell,
But in the lover's ear alone.
What once to me befell

- 5 When she I loved looked every day
Fresh as a rose in June,
I to her cottage bent my way.
Beneath an evening moon

- Upon the moon I fixed my eye 10 All over the wide lea,
With quickening pace my horse drew nigh
Those paths so dear to me

- And now we reached the orchard-plot.
And, as we climbed the hill.
15 The sinking moon to Lucy's cot Came near, and nearer still

- In one of those sweet dreams I slept.
Kind Nature's gentlest boon!
And all the while my eyes I kept 20 On the descending moon

My horse moved on, hoof after hoof
He raised, and never stopped
When down behind the cottage roof
At once, the bright moon dropped

- 25 What fond and wayward thoughts will shide Into a lover's head!
"O mercy!" to myself I cried.
"If Lucy should be dead!"

SHE DWELT AMONG THE UNTRODDEN WAYS

1799 1800

She dwelt among the untrodden ways
Beside the springs of Dove,
A maid whom there were none to praise
And very few to love

- 5 A violet by a mossy stone Half hidden from the eye!
—Fair as a star, when only one Is shining in the sky.

- She lived unknown, and few could know 10 When Lucy ceased to be;
But she is in her grave, and, oh,
The difference to me!

I TRAVELLED AMONG UNKNOWN MEN

1799 1807

I travelled among unknown men,
In lands beyond the sea;
Nor, England! did I know till then What love I bore to thee

- 5 'Tis past, that melancholy dream!
Nor will I quit thy shore
A second time; for still I seem To love thee more and more

- Among thy mountains did I feel 10 The joy of my desire;
And she I cherished turned her wheel Beside an English fire

- Thy mornings showed, thy nights concealed,
The bowers where Lucy played:
15 And thine too is the last green field That Lucy's eyes surveyed

THREE YEARS SHE GREW IN SUN AND SHOWER

1799 1800

Three years she grew in sun and shower
Then Nature said, "A lovelier flower
On earth was never sown,
This child I to myself will take,
She shall be mine, and I will make A lady of my own

- "Myself will to my darling be Both law and impulse and with me
The girl, in rock and plain, 10 In earth and heaven, in glade and bowel, Shall feel an overseeing power To kindle or restrain

- "She shall be sportive as the fawn That wild with glee across the lawn 15 Or up the mountain springs,
And hers shall be the breathing balmy And hers the silence and the calm Of mute insensate things.

- "The floating clouds their state shall lend 20 To her; for her the willow bend, Nor shall she fail to see Even in the motions of the storm
Grace that shall mould the maiden's form
By silent sympathy

- 25 "The stars of midnight shall be dear
To her; and she shall lean her ear
In many a secret place Where rivulets dance their wayward round,
And beauty's horn of murmuring sound 30 Shall pass into her face.

“And vital feelings of delight Shall rear her form to stately height,
Her virgin bosom swell, Such thoughts to Lucy I will give 35 While she and I together live Here in this happy dell”

Thus Nature spake—The work was done—How soon my Lucy's race was run!
She died, and left to me
40 This heath, this calm, and quiet scene
The memory of what has been,
And never more will be

A SLUMBER DID MY SPIRIT SEAL.
1799 1800

A slumber did my spirit seal,
I had no human fears
She seemed a thing that could not feel
The touch of earthly years

5 No motion has she now, no force
She neither hears nor sees,
Rolled round in earth's diurnal course,
With rocks, and stones, and trees

A POET'S EPITAPH
1799 1800

Art thou a statish in the van
Of public conflicts framed and bled?
First learn to love one living man Then may'st thou think upon the dead

5 A lawyer art thou?—draw not nigh!
Go, carry to some fitter place
The keenness of that practiced eye,
The hardness of that sallow face

Art thou a man of purple cheer?
10 A rosy man, right plump to see?
Approach, yet, doctor,¹ not too near.
This grave no cushion is for thee

Or art thou one of gallant pride
A soldier and no man of chaff?
15 Welcome!—but lay thy sword aside,
And lean upon a peasant's staff

Physician art thou?—one, all eyes, Philosopher!—a lingering slave,
One that would peep and botanize 20 Upon his mother's grave?

Wrapt closely in thy sensual fleece,
O turn aside,—and take, I pray,
That he below may rest in peace,
Thy ever-dwindling soul, away!

25 A moralist¹ perchance appears.
Led, Heaven knows how¹ to this poor sod
And he has neither eyes nor ears, Himself his world, and his own God,

One to whose smooth-rubbed soul can cling 10 Not form, nor feeling, great or small,
A reasoning, self-sufficing thing,
An intellectual all-in-all!

Shut close the door, press down the latch,
Sleep in thy intellectual crust, 15 Nor lose ten tickings of thy watch Near this unprofitable dust

But who is he, with modest looks,
And clad in homely russet brown?
He mumbles near the running brooks 40 A music sweeter than their own

He is retired as noontide dew,
Or tombston in a noon-day grove,
And you must love him, ere to you
He will seem worthy of your love

45 The outward shows of sky and earth.
Of hill and valley, he has viewed,
And impulses of deeper truth
Have come to him in solitude

In common things that round us lie 50 Some random truths he can impart.
The harvest of a quiet eye
That broods and sleeps on his own heart

But he is weak, both man and boy Hath been an idler in the land, 55 Contented if he might enjoy The things which others understand —Come hither in thy hour of strength.

Come, weak as is a breaking wave!
Here stretch thy body at full length.
60 Or build thy house upon this grave

MATTHEW
1799 1800

If Nature, for a favorite child,
In thee hath tempered so her clay,
That every hour thy heart runs wild,
Yet never once doth go astray.

5 Read o'er these lines; and then review
This tablet, that thus humbly rears
In such diversity of hue Its history of two hundred years

—When through this little wreck of fame 10 Cipher and syllable¹ thine eye

¹ One who teaches moral duties

Has travelled down to Matthew's name, Pause with no common sympathy.

And if a sleeping tear should wake,
Then be it neither checked nor stayed.

15 For Matthew a request I make Which for himself he had not made.

Poor Matthew, all his frolics o'er,
Is silent as a standing pool;
Far from the chimney's merry roar, 20 And murmur of the village school

The sighs which Matthew heaved were sighs
Of one tired out with fun and madness,
The tears which came to Matthew's eyes Were tears of light, the dew of gladness

25 Yet sometimes, when the secret cup Of still and serious thought went round,
It seemed as if he drank it up—
He felt with spirit so profound —Thou soul of God's best earthly mould!

30 Thou happy Soul! and can it be That these two words of glittering gold
Are all that must remain of thee?

THE TWO APRIL MORNINGS 1799 1800

We walked along, while bright and red Uprose the morning sun,
And Matthew stopped, he looked, and said,
"The will of God be done!"

5 A village schoolmaster was he,
With hair of glittering gray,
As blithe a man as you could see
On a spring holiday

And on that morning, through the grass, 10 And by the steaming rills,
We travelled merrily, to pass
A day among the hills

"Our work," said I, "was well begun, Then from thy breast what thought, 15 Beneath so beautiful a sun, So sad a sigh has brought?"

A second time did Matthew stop,
And fixing still his eye
Upon the eastern mountain-top, 20 To me he made reply:

"You cloud with that long purple cleft Brings fresh into my mind
A day like this which I have left Full thirty years behind.

25 "And just above you slope of corn Such colors, and no other,
Were in the sky, that April morn,
Of this the very brother.

"With rod and line I sued' the sport 30 Which that sweet season gave,
And, to the churchyard come, stopped short,
Beside my daughter's grave

"Nine summers had she scarcely seen,
The pride of all the vale;
35 And then she sang,—she would have been A very nightingale.

"Six feet in earth my Emma lay,
And yet I loved her more,
For so it seemed, than till that day 40 I e'er had loved before.

"And, turning from her grave, I met,
Beside the churchyard yew,
A blooming girl, whose hair was wet
With points of morning dew.

45 "A basket on her head she bare,
Her brow was smooth and white:
To see a child so very fair,
It was a pure delight!

"No fountain from its rocky cave 50 E'er tripped with foot so free, She seemed as happy as a wave
That dances on the sea.

"There came from me a sigh of pain Which I could ill confine, 55 I looked at her, and looked again
And did not wish her mine!"

Matthew is in his grave, yet now,
Methinks, I see him stand,
As at that moment, with a bough 60 Of wilding in his hand

THE FOUNTAIN

A CONVERSATION 1799 1800

We talked with open heart, and tongue Affectionate and true,
A pair of friends, though I was young,
And Matthew seventy-two

5 We lay beneath a spreading oak, Beside a mossy seat;
And from the turf a fountain broke,
And gurgled at our feet.
'pursued

“Now, Matthew!” said I, “let us match 10 This water’s pleasant tune With some old border-song, or catch That suits a summer’s noon,

“Or of the church-clock and the chimes Sing here beneath the shade, 15 That half-mad thing of witty rhymes Which you last April made!”

In silence Matthew lay, and eyed
The spring beneath the tree,
And thus the dear old man replied, 20 The gray-haired man of glee

“No cheek, no stay, this streamlet fears.
How merrily it goes!
’Twill murmur on a thousand years,
And flow as now it flows

25 “And here on this delightful day, I cannot choose but think How oft, a vigorous man, I lay Beside this fountain’s brink

“My eyes are dim with childish tears.
30 My heart is idly stung,
For the same sound is in my ears
Which in those days I heard

“Thus fares it still in our decay
And yet the wiser mind
35 Mourns less for what age takes away
Than what it leaves behind

“The blackbird amid leafy trees,
The lark above the hill,
Let loose their carols when they please.
40 Are quiet when they will

“With Nature never do they wage
A foolish strife, they see
A happy youth, and then old age
Is beautiful and free

45 “But we are pressed by heavy laws.
And often, glad no more,
We wear a face of joy, because
We have been glad of yore

“If there be one who need bemoan 50 His kindred laid in earth,
The household hearts that were his own,
It is the man of mirth

“My days, my friend, are almost gone,
My life has been approved,
55 And many love me! but by none
Am I enough beloved ”

“Now both himself and me he wrongs,
The man who thus complains!
I live and sing my idle songs 60 Upon these happy plains,

“And, Matthew, for thy children dead I’ll be a son to thee!”
At this he grasped my hand, and said “Alas! that cannot be ”

65 We rose up from the fountain-side,
And down the smooth descent
Of the green sheep-track did we glide,
And through the wood we went,

And, ere we came to Leonard’s rock, 70 He sang those witty rhymes
About the crazy old church-clock,
And the bewildered chimes.

LUCY GRAY

OR, SOLITUDE
1799 1800

Oft I had heard of Lucy Gray
And, when I crossed the wild,
I chanced to see at break of day
The solitary child

5 No mate, no comrade Lucy knew,
She dwelt on a wide moor,
—The sweetest thing that ever grew Beside a human door!

You yet may spy the tawn at play, 10 The hair upon the green;
But the sweet face of Lucy Gray
Will never more be seen.

“Tonight will be a stormy night—
You to the town must go, 15 And take a lantern, child, to light Your mother through the snow.”

“That, father! will I gladly do
’Tis scarcely afternoon—
The minister-clock has just struck two 20 And yonder is the moon!”

At this the father raised his hook,
And snapped a faggot-band;
He plied his work;—and Lucy took The lantern in her hand.

25 Not blither is the mountain roe With many a wanton stroke
Her feet disperse the powdery snow,
That rises up like smoke

The storm came on before its time 30 She wandered up and down;
 And many a hill did Lucy climb
 But never reached the town

The wretched parents all that night Went shouting far and wide, 15 But there was neither sound nor sight
 To serve them for a guide

At daybreak on a hill they stood That overlooked the moor,
 And thence they saw the bridge of wood, 10 A furlong from their door

They wept—and, turning homeward, cried “In heaven we all shall meet,” —When in the snow the mother spied
 The print of Lucy’s feet

Then downwards from the steep hill’s edge 15 They tracked the footmarks small,
 And through the broken hawthorn hedge
 And by the long stone wall,

And then an open field they crossed 50 The marks were still the same,
 They tracked them on, nor ever lost,
 And to the bridge they came

They followed from the snowy bank Those footmarks, one by one, 55 Into the middle of the plank,
 And further there were none!

—Yet some maintain that to this day
 She is a living child,
 That you may see sweet Lucy Gray 60 Upon the lonesome wild

O’er rough and smooth she trips along,
 And never looks behind,
 And sings a solitary song
 That whistles in the wind

THE PRELUDE

1799-1805

1850

From BOOK I INTRODUCTION—CHILDHOOD AND SCHOOL-TIME

Fair seed-time had my soul, and I grew up Fostered alike by beauty and by fear Much favored in my birthplace, and no less In that beloved Vale¹ to which ere long 305 We were transplanted—there were we let lose
 For sports of wider range Ere I had told

¹ Eathwaite Lancashire, in which the village of Hawkshead, where Wordsworth attended school, was situated

Ten birthdays, when among the mountain slopes
 Frost, and the breath of frosty wind, had snapped

The last autumnal crocus, ’twas my joy 310 With store of springes¹ o’er my shoulder
 hung

To range the open heights where wood-cocks run

Among the smooth green turf Through half the night,

Scudding away from snare to snare, I plied
 That anxious visitation,—moon and stars 315 Were shining o’er my head I was alone,
 And seemed to be a trouble to the peace That dwelt among them Sometimes it befell

In these night wanderings, that a strong desire

O’erpowered my better reason, and the bird 320 Which was the captive of another’s toil Became my prey, and when the deed was done

I heard among the solitary hills Low breathings coming after me, and
 sounds

Of undistinguishable motion, steps 325 Almost as silent as the turf they trod

Nor less when Spring had warmed the cultured Vale,²

Moved we as plunderers where the mother-bird

Had in high places built her lodge, though mean

Our object and inglorious, yet the end 330 Was not ignoble Oh! when I have hung Above the raven’s nest, by knots of grass And half-inch fissures in the slippery rock But ill-sustained, and almost (so it seemed)

Suspended by the blast that blew amain, 335 Shouldering the naked crag, oh, at that time While on the perilous ridge I hung alone, With what strange utterance did the loud dry wind

Blow through my ear! the sky seemed not a sky

Of earth—and with what motion moved the clouds!

Dust as we are, the immortal spirit grows 340 Like harmony in music, there is a dark Inscrutable workmanship that reconciles Discordant elements, makes them cling together

In one society How strange that all 345 The terrors, pains, and early miseries,

¹ snares; traps

² Yewdale, a vale near Hawkshead

Regrets, vexations, lassitudes interfused Within my mind, should e'er have borne a part,
 And that a needful part, in making up The calm existence that is mine when I 350 Am worthy of myself! Praise to the end!
 Thanks to the means which Nature deigned to employ,
 Whether her fearless visitings, or those That came with soft alarm, like huttless
 light
 Opening the peaceful clouds, or she may use 355 Severer interventions, ministry
 More palpable, as best might suit her aim

One summer evening (led by her) I found A little boat tied to a willow tree Within a rocky cove, its usual home 360 Straight I unloosed her chain, and stepping in Pushed from the shore It was an act of stealth
 And troubled pleasure, nor without the voice
 Of mountain echoes did my boat move on,
 Leaving behind her still, on either side, 365 Small circles glittering idly in the moon, Until they melted all into one track Of sparkling light But now, like one who rows
 Proud of his skill, to reach a chosen point
 With an unswerving line, I fixed my view 370 Upon the summit of a craggy ridge,
 The horizon's utmost boundary, far above
 Was nothing but the stars and the gray sky
 She was an elfin pinnace, lustily
 I dipped my oars into the silent lake, 375 And, as I rose upon the stroke, my boat Went heaving through the water like a swan.
 When, from behind that craggy steep till
 then
 The horizon's bound, a huge peak, black and huge,
 As if with voluntary power instinct 380 Upreared its head I struck and struck
 again,
 And growing still in stature the grim shape Towered up between me and the stars, and still.
 For so it seemed, with purpose of its own
 And measured motion like a living thing, 385 Strode after me With trembling oars
 I turned,
 And through the silent water stole my way Back to the covert of the willow tree;
 There in her mooring-place I left my bark,—

And through the meadows homeward went, in grave
 390 And serious mood, but after I had seen That spectacle, for many days, my brain Worked with a dim and undetermined sense Of unknown modes of being, o'er my
 thoughts
 There hung a darkness, call it solitude 395 Or blank desertion No familiar shapes Remained, no pleasant images of trees,
 Of sea or sky, no colors of green fields,
 But huge and mighty forms, that do not live Like living men, moved slowly through the
 mind
 400 By day, and were a trouble to my dreams

Wisdom and Spirit of the universe!
 Thon Soul that art the eternity of thought That givest to forms and images a breath
 And everlasting motion, not in vain 405 By day or star-light thus from my first dawn
 Of childhood didst thou intertwine for me
 The passions that build up our human soul, Not with the mean and vulgar works of
 man,
 But with high objects, with enduring
 things—410 With life and nature—purifying thus The elements of feeling and of thought,
 And sanctifying, by such discipline, Both pain and fear, until we recognize A grandeur in the beatings of the heart 415 Nor was this fellowship vouchsafed to me With stinted kindness In November days,
 When vapors rolling down the valley made A lonely scene more lonesome, among woods,
 At noon and 'mid the calm of summer
 nights,
 420 When, by the margin of the trembling lake, Beneath the gloomy hills homeward I went In solitude, such intercourse was mine,
 Mine was it in the fields both day and night,
 And by the waters, all the summer long

And in the frosty season, when the sun Was set, and visible for many a mile
 The cottage windows blazed through twilight gloom,
 I heeded not their summons happy time
 It was indeed for all of us—for me 430 It was a time of rapture! Clear and loud
 The village clock tolled six.—I wheeled about,
 Proud and exulting like an untamed horse That cares not for his home All shod with steel,
 We hissed along the polished ice in games

435 Confederate, imitative of the chase And woodland pleasures,—the resounding
 horn,
 The pack loud chiming, and the hunted hare
 So through the darkness and the cold we flew,
 And not a voice was idle; with the din 440 Smitten, the precipices rang aloud;
 The leafless trees and every icy crag
 Tinkled like iron, while far distant hills
 Into the tumult sent an alien sound Of melancholy not unnoticed, while the stars 445 Eastward were sparkling clear, and in the west
 The orange sky of evening died away
 Not seldom from the uproar I retired Into a silent bay, or sportively Glanced sideways, leaving the tumultuous
 throng,
 450 To cut across the reflex of a star That fled, and, flying still before me gleamed
 Upon the glassy plain, and oftentimes,
 When we had given our bodies to the wind,
 And all the shadowy banks on either side 455 Came sweeping through the darkness spinning still
 The rapid line of motion, then at once Have I, reclining back upon my heels, Stopped short, yet still the solitary cliffs Wheeled by me—even as if the earth had rolled 460 With visible motion her diurnal round!
 Behind me did they stretch in solemn tram, Feebler and feebler, and I stood and watched
 Till all was tranquil as a dreamless sleep

Ye Presences of Nature in the sky 465 And on the earth! Ye Visions of the hills!
 And Souls of lonely places! can I think A vulgar hope was yours when ye employed
 Such ministry, when ye through many a year
 Haunting me thus among my boyish sports, 470 On caves and trees, upon the woods and hills,
 Impressed upon all forms the characters Of danger or desire; and thus did make The surface of the universal earth With triumph and delight, with hope and fear, 475 Work like a bee?
 Not uselessly employed.
 Might I pursue this theme through every change

Of exercise and play, to which the year
 Did summon us in his delightful round.

Nor, sedulous as I have been to trace 545 How Nature by extrinsic passion first Peopled the mind with forms sublime or
 fair,
 And made me love them, may I here omit How other pleasures have been mine, and joys
 Of subtler origin, how I have felt, 550 Not seldom even in that tempestuous time, Those hallowed and pure motions of the sense
 Which seem, in their simplicity, to own An intellectual charm, that calm delight Which, if I err not, surely must belong 555 To those first-born affinities that fit
 Our new existence to existing things,¹ And, in our dawn of being, constitute The bond of union between life and joy

Yes, I remember when the changeful
 earth,
 560 And twice five summers on my mind had stamped
 The faces of the moving year, even then I held unconscious intercourse with beauty Old as creation, drinking in a pure Organic pleasure from the silver wreaths 565 Of curling mist, or from the level plain Of waters colored by impending clouds

The sands of Westmoreland, the creeks and bays
 Of Cumbria's rocky limits, they can tell How, when the Sea threw off his evening
 shade
 570 And to the shepherd's hut on distant hills Sent welcome notice of the rising moon, How I have stood, to fancies such as these A stranger, linking with the spectacle
 No conscious memory of a kindred sight.
 575 And bringing with me no peculiar sense Of quietness or peace, yet have I stood, Even while mine eye hath moved o'er many a league
 Of shining water, gathering as it seemed,
 Through every hair-breadth in that field of light,
 580 New pleasure like a bee among the flowers

Thus oft amid those fits of vulgar joy Which, through all seasons, on a child's pursuits
 Are prompt attendants, 'mid that giddy
 bliss
 Which, like a tempest, works along the

585 And is forgotten; even then I felt Gleams like the flashing of a shield,— the earth
 And common face of Nature spake to me Rememberable things; sometimes, 'tis true,
 By chance collisions and quaint accidents 590 (Like those ill-sorted unions, work supposed
 Of evil-minded fairies), yet not vain Nor profitless, if haply they impressed Collateral objects and appearances, Albert lifeless then, and doomed to sleep 595 Until maturer seasons called them forth To impregnate and to elevate the mind —And if the vulgar joy by its own weight Worned itself out of the memory,
 The scenes which were a witness of that joy 600 Remained in their substantial lineaments Depleted on the brain, and to the eye Were visible, a daily sight, and thus By the impressive discipline of fear,
 By pleasure and repeated happiness, 605 So frequently repeated, and by force Of obscure feelings representative Of things forgotten, these same scenes so
 bright,
 So beautiful, so majestic in themselves, Though yet the day was distant, did become 610 Habitually dear, and all then forms And changeful colors by invisible links Were fastened to the affections.

FROM BOOK II SCHOOL TIME

665 From early days, Beginning not long after that first time
 In which, a babe, by intercourse of touch I held mute dialogues with my mother's
 heart,
 I have endeavored to display the means 670 Whereby this infant sensibility, (Great birthright of our being, was in me Augmented and sustained. Yet is a path More difficult before me, and I fear That in its broken windings we shall need 675 The chamois' sinews, and the eagle's wing For now a trouble came into my mind From unknown causes. I was left alone Seeking the visible world, nor knowing why The props of my affections were removed, 680 And yet the building stood, as if sustained By its own spirit! All that I beheld Was dear, and hence to finer influxes
 The mind lay open, to a more exact And close communion. Many are our joys 685 In youth, but oh! what happiness to live When every hour brings palpable access Of knowledge, when all knowledge is de-
 light,

And sorrow is not there! The seasons came,
 And every season wheresoe'er I moved 290 Unfolded transitory qualities, Which, but for this most watchful power
 of love,
 Had been neglected, left a register
 Of permanent relations, else unknown Hence life, and change, and beauty, solitude 295 More active even than "best society"— Society made sweet as solitude
 By silent obtrusive sympathies,
 And gentle agitations of the mind
 From manifold distinctions, difference 300 Perceived in things, where, to the unwatch-ful eye,
 No difference is, and hence, from the same source,
 Sublimed joy! for I would walk alone,
 Under the quiet stars, and at that time Have felt whate'er there is of power in
 sound
 305 To breathe an elevated mood, by form Or image unprofaned, and I would stand,
 If the night blackened with a coming storm, Beneath some rock, listening to notes that are
 The ghostly language of the ancient earth.
 310 Or make then dim abode in distant winds Thence did I drink the visionary power.
 And deem not profitless those fleeting moods
 Of shadowy exultation not for this,
 That they are kindred to our purer mind 315 And intellectual life, but that the soul, Remembering how she felt, but what she felt Remembering not, retains an obscure sense Of possible sublimity, whereto
 With growing faculties she doth aspire.
 320 With faculties still growing, feeling still That whatsoever point they gain, they yet Have something to pursue
 And not alone.
 'Mid gloom and tumult, but no less 'mid
 fair
 And tranquil scenes, that universal power 325 And fitness in the latent qualities And essences of things, by which the mind Is moved with feelings of delight, to me Came strengthened with a superadded soul,
 A virtue not its own 346 How shall I seek the origin? where find Faith in the marvellous things which then I felt?
 Oft in these moments such a holy calm Would overspread my soul, that bodily eyes 350 Were utterly forgotten, and what I saw

- Appeared like something in myself, a dream,
 A prospect in the mind
 'Twere long to tell What spring and autumn, what the winter snows,
 And what the summer shade, what day
 and night,
 355 Evening and morning, sleep and waking,
 thought
 From sources inexhaustible, poured forth
 To feed the spirit of religious love In which I walked with Nature. But let this Be not forgotten, that I still retained 360 My first creative sensibility, That by the regular action of the world
 My soul was unsubdued A plastic power Abode with me, a forming hand, at times 365 Rebelious, acting in a devious mood,
 A local spirit of his own, at war With general tendency, but, for the most, Subservient strictly to external things
 With which it communed An auxiliary light Came from my mind which on the setting
 sun 370 Bestowed new splendor, the melodious birds,
 The fluttering breezes, fountains that run
 on Mumbling so sweetly in themselves, obeyed
 A like dominion, and the midnight storm 375 Grew darker in the presence of my eye Hence my obeisance, my devotion hence,
 And hence my transport
 Nor should this, perchance, Pass unrecorded, that I still had loved
 The exercise and produce of a toil, Than analytic industry to me 380 More pleasing, and whose character I deem Is more poetic as resembling more Creative agency The song would speak Of that interminable building reared By observation of affinities 385 In objects where no brotherhood exists To passive minds My seventeenth year
 was come,
 And, whether from this habit rooted now
 So deeply in my mind, or from excess
 In the great social principle of life 390 Coercing all things into sympathy, To unorganic natures were transferred My own enjoyments; or the power of truth Coming in revelation, did converse With things that really are, I, at this time, 395 Saw blessings spread around me like a sea Thus while the days flew by, and years passed on,
 From Nature and her overflowing soul
- I had received so much, that all my
 thoughts
 Were steeped in feeling; I was only then 400 Contented, when with bliss ineffable
 I felt the sentiment of Being spread O'er all that moves and all that seemeth
 still,
 O'er all that, lost beyond the reach of
 thought
 And human knowledge, to the human eye 405 Invisible, yet liveth to the heart, O'er all that leaps and runs, and shouts and sings,
 Or beats the gladsome air, o'er all that glides
 Beneath the wave, yea, in the wave itself,
 And mighty depth of waters Wonder not 410 If high the transport, great the joy I felt Communing in this sort through earth and
 heaven
 With every form of creature, as it looked Towards the Uncreated with a countenance Of adoration, with an eye of love 415 One song they sang, and it was audible Most audible, then, when the fleshly ear O'ercome by humblest prelude of that
 strain,
 Forgot her functions, and slept undisturbed
- If this be error, and another faith 420 Find easier access to the pious mind Yet were I grossly destitute of all Those human sentiments that make this
 earth
 So dear, if I should fail with grateful voice To speak of you, ye mountains, and ye lakes
 425 And sounding cataracts, ye mists and winds That dwell among the hills where I was born
 If in my youth I have been pure in heart
 If, mingling with the world, I am content With my own modest pleasures, and have lived 430 With God and Nature communing, removed
 From little enmities and low desires
 The gift is yours, if in these times of tem-¹ This melancholy waste of hopes o'er
 thrown,
 If, 'mid indifference and apathy, 435 And wicked exultation when good men On every side fall off, we know not how,
 To selfishness, disguised in gentle names
 Of peace and quiet and domestic love,
¹ During the War of the Second Coalition, 1799 1801, when England feared an invasion by Napoleon See Coleridge's Fears in Solitude
 (p. 351)

Yet mingled not unwillingly with sneers 440 On visionary minds; if, in this time Of dereliction and dismay, I yet Despair not of our nature, but retain A more than Roman confidence, a faith That fails not, in all sorrow my support, 145 The blessing of my life, the gift is yours, Ye winds and sounding cataracts! 'tis yours Ye mountains' thine, O Nature! Thou hast fed
 My lofty speculations, and in thee,
 For this uneasy heart of ours, I find 450 A never-failing principle of joy
 And purest passion

From BOOK III RESIDENCE AT CAMBRIDGE

90 Oft when the dazzling show no longer new Had ceased to dazzle, oft-times did I quit My comrades, leave the crowd, buildings
 and groves,
 And as I paced alone the level fields Far from those lovely sights and sounds
 sublime
 95 With which I had been conversant, the mind Drooped not, but there into herself returning,
 With prompt rebound seemed fresh as heretofore
 At least I more distinctly recognized Her native instincts: let me dare to speak 100 A higher language, say that now I felt What independent solaces were mine,
 To mitigate the injurious sway of place Or circumstance, how far soever changed In youth, or to be changed in after years 105 As if awakened, summoned, roused, constrained,
 I looked for universal things, perused
 The common countenance of earth and sky Earth, nowhere unembellished by some trace
 Of that first Paradise whence man was driven.
 110 And sky, whose beauty and bounty are expressed By the proud name she bears—the name of Heaven
 I called on both to teach me what they might,
 Or turning the mind in upon herself, Pored, watched, expected, listened, spread my thoughts
 115 And spread them with a wider creeping, felt Inembarcures more awful, visitings
 Of the Upholder of the tranquil soul.
 That tolerates the indignities of Time,
 And, from the centre of Eternity

All finite motions overruling, lives
 In glory immutable But peace! enough Here to record that I was mounting now
 To such community with highest truth—
 A track pursuing, not untrod before, 125 From strict analogies by thought supplied On consciousnesses not to be subdued To every natural form, rock, fruit, or flower.
 Even the loose stones that cover the high-
 way,
 I gave a moral life I saw them feel, 130 Or linked them to some feeling the great mass
 Lay bedded in a quickening soul, and all That I beheld respired with inward meaning
 Add that whate'er of Terror or of Love On Beauty, Nature's daily face put on 135 From transitory passion, unto this I was as sensitive as waters are To the sky's influence in a kindred mood
 Of passion, was obedient as a lute
 That waits upon the touches of the wind 140 Unknown, unthought of, yet I was most rich—
 I had a world about me—'twas my own,
 I made it, for it only lived to me,
 And to the God who sees into the heart

From BOOK IV SUMMER VACATION

'Mid a throng
 310 Of maids and youths, old men, and nations stand,
 A medley of all tempers, I had passed
 The night in dancing, gaiety, and mirth, With din of instruments and shuffling
 feet,
 And glancing forms, and tapers glittering, 315 And unnam'd prattle flying up and down, Spirits upon the stretch, and here and there Slight shocks of young love-liking interspersed,
 Whose transient pleasure mounted to the
 head,
 And tingled through the veins Ere we retired, 320 The cock had crowed, and now the eastern sky
 Was kindling, not unseen, from humble copse
 And open field, through which the path way wound,
 And homeward led my steps Magnificent
 The morning rose, in memorable pomp.
 325 Glorious as e'er I had beheld—in front,
 The sea lay laughing at a distance, near,

The solid mountains shone, bright as the
clouds,
Gram-tinctured,¹ drenched in empyrean
light;
And in the meadows and the lower grounds 350 Was all the sweetness of a common dawn—Dews, vapors, and the melody of birds,
And laborers going forth to till the fields Ah! need I say, dear friend! that to the brim
My heart was full, I made no vows, but vows 355 Were then made for me; bond unknown
to me
Was given, that I should be, else sinning greatly,
A dedicated Spirit On I walked
In thankful blessedness, which yet survives

From BOOK V Books

These mighty workmen of our later age, Who, with a broad highway, have overbridged
The froward chaos of futurity, 360 Tamed to their bidding, they who have the skill
To manage books, and things, and make them act
On infant minds as surely as the sun Deals with a flower, the keepers of our
time,
The guides and wardens of our faculties, 365 Sages who in their presence would control
All accidents, and to the very road Which they have fashioned would confine us down,
Like engines; when will their presumption learn,
That in the unreasoning progress of the
world
360 A wiser spirit is at work for us,
A better eye than theirs, most prodigal Of blessings, and most studious of our good,
Even in what seem our most unfruitful
hours?

There was a Boy: ye knew him well, ye cliffs
365 And islands of Winander!—many a time
At evening, when the earliest stars began To move along the edges of the hills, Rising or setting, would he stand alone Beneath the trees or by the glimmering
lake, 370 And there, with fingers interwoven, both hands

Pressed closely palm to palm, and to his mouth
Uplifted, he, as through an instrument, Blew mimic hootings to the silent owls, That they might answer him; and they would shout 375 Across the watery vale, and shout again.
Responsive to his call, with quivering peaks.
And long halloos and screams, and echoes loud,
Redoubled and redoubled, concourse wild Of jocund din; and, when a lengthened pause
380 Of silence came and baffled his best skill, Then sometimes, in that silence while he hung
Listening, a gentle shock of mild surprise
Has carried far into his heart the voice Of mountain torrents; or the visible scene 385 Would enter unawares into his mind,
With all its solemn imagery, its rocks,
Its woods, and that uncertain heaven, received
Into the bosom of the steady lake

This Boy was taken from his mates and died
390 In childhood, ere he was full twelve years old.
Fair is the spot, most beautiful the vale Where he was born; the grassy churchyard hangs
Upon a slope above the village school;²
And through that churchyard when my way has led 395 On summer evenings, I believe that there A long half hour together I have stood Mute, looking at the grave in which he lies!
Even now appears before the mind's clear
eye
That self-same village church; I see her sit 400 (The thronèd Lady whom erewhile we hailed)
On her green hill, forgetful of this Boy Who slumbers at her feet,—forgetful, too,
Of all her silent neighborhood of graves,
And listening only to the glad sounds 405 That, from the rural school ascending, play Beneath her and about her. May she long Behold a race of young ones like to those With whom I herded!—(easily, indeed, We might have fed upon a fatter soil 410 Of arts and letters—but be that forgiven)—
A race of real children, not too wise, Too learned, or too good; but wanton,
fresh,

And bandied up and down by love and
hate;
Not unresentful where self-justified, 415 Pierce, moody, patient, venturous, modest,
shy;
Mad at their sports like withered leaves

Though doing wrong and suffering, and full oft Bending beneath our life's mysterious weight

It comes, to works of unproved delight.
And tendency benign, directing those 495 Who care not, know not, think not what they do.
The tales that charm away the wakeful
night
In Araby, romances, legends penned For solace by dim light of monkish lamps, Fictions, for ladies of their love, devised 500 By youthful squires, adventures endless, spun
By the dismantled warrior in old age,
Out of the bowels of those very schemes
In which his youth did first extravagate,¹ These spread like day, and something in the shape
505 Of these will live till man shall be no more.
Dumb yearnings, hidden appetites, are ours,
And they must have their food. Our childhood sits,
(Our simple childhood, sits upon a throne That hath more power than all the elements.
510 I guess not what this tells of being past.
Nor what it augurs of the life to come;
But so it is, and, in that dubious hour,
That twilight when we first begin to see This dawning earth, to recognize, expect, 615 And, in the long probation that ensues,
The time of trial, ere we learn to live
In reconciliation with our stunted powers;
¹ wander about

To endure this state of meagre vassalage, Unwilling to forego, confess, submit 520 Uneasy and unsettled, yoke-fellows To custom, mettlesome, and not yet tamed And humbled down,—oh! then we feel, we feel,
We know where we have friends Ye dreamers, then,
Forgers of daring tales! we bless you then, 525 Impostors, drivellers, dotards, as the ape Philosophy will call you; then we feel With what, and how great might ye are in league,
Who make our wish, our power, our thought a deed,
An empire, a possession,—ye whom time 530 And seasons serve, all Faculties to whom Earth crouches, the elements are potter's clay,
Space like a heaven filled up with northern lights,
Here, nowhere, there, and everywhere at once.

FROM BOOK VI CAMBRIDGE AND THE ALPS

The poet's soul was with me at that time, Sweet meditations, the still overflow
Of present happiness, while future years 45 Lacked not anticipations, tender dreams,
No few of which have since been realized,
And some remain, hopes for my future
life.
Four years and thirty, told this very week,
Have I been now a sojourner on earth, 50 By sorrow not unsmitten, yet for me Life's morning radiance hath not left the
hills,
Her dew is on the flowers Those were the days
Which also first emboldened me to trust
With firmness, hitherto but slightly touched 55 By such a daring thought, that I might leave Some monument behind me which pure hearts
Should reverence. The instinctive humbleness, Maintained even by the very name and
thought
Of printed books and authorship, began 60 To melt away; and further, the dread awe Of mighty names was softened down and seemed Approachable, admitting fellowship
Of modest sympathy. Such aspect now, Though not familiarly, my mind put on, 65 Content to observe, to achieve, and to enjoy.

All winter long, whenever free to choose,
 Did I by night frequent the College groves
 And tributary walks; the last, and oft
 The only one, who had been lingering there 70 Through hours of silence, till the porter's bell,
 A punctual follower on the stroke of nine,
 Rang with its blunt unceremonious voice, Inexorable summons! Lofty elms, 75 Inviting shades of opportune recess, Bestowed composure on a neighborhood Unpeaceful in itself A single tree With sinuous trunk, boughs exquisitely wreathed,
 Grew there; an ash which Winter for himself Decked as in pride, and with outlandish grace 80 Up from the ground, and almost to the top,
 The trunk and every master branch were
 green
 With clustering ivy, and the lightsome twigs
 And outer spray profusely tipped with seeds
 That hung in yellow tassels, while the air 85 Stirred them, not voiceless Often have I stood Foot-bound uplooking at this lovely tree Beneath a frosty moon The hemisphere Of magic fiction, verse of mine perchance May never tread, but scarcely Spenser's self 90 Could have more tranquil visions in his youth,
 Or could more bright appearances create
 Of human forms with superhuman powers,
 Than I beheld loitering on calm clear nights Alone, beneath this fairy work of earth

 Imagination—here the Power so called Through sad incompetence of human speech,
 That awful Power rose from the mind's abyss
 95 Like an unfathered vapor that enwraps,
 At once, some lonely traveller I was lost, Halted without an effort to break through.
 But to my conscious soul I now can say—
 "I recognize thy glory—" in such strength 600 Of usurpation, when the light of sense Goes out, but with a flash that has revealed The invisible world, doth greatness make abode,
 There harbors; whether we be young or old,
 Our destiny, our being's heart and home, 605 Is with infinitude, and only there;
 With hope it is, hope that can never die.

Effort, and expectation, and desire,
 And something evermore about to be.
 Under such banners militant, the soul 610 Seeks for no trophies, struggles for no spoils
 That may attest her prowess, blest in
 thoughts
 That are their own perfection and reward, Strong in herself and in beatitude That hides her, like the mighty flood of Nile
 615 Poured from his fount of Abyssinian
 clouds
 To fertilize the whole Egyptian plain

 The melancholy slackening that ensued Upon those tidings by the peasant given Was soon dislodged Downwards we hurried fast, 620 And with the half-shaped road which we had missed,
 Entered a narrow chasm The brook and road
 Were fellow-travellers in this gloomy strait,
 And with them did we journey several
 hours
 At a slow pace The immeasurable height 625 Of woods decaying, never to be decayed,
 The stationary blasts of waterfalls,
 And in the narrow rent at every turn Winds thwarting winds, bewildered and foiled,
 The torrent shooting from the clear blue
 sky, 630 The rocks that muttered close upon our ears, Black dizzling crags that spake by the way-side
 As it a voice were in them, the sick sight
 And giddy prospect of the raving stream, The unfettered clouds and region of the heavens,
 635 Tumult and peace, the darkness and the
 light—
 Were all like workings of one mind, the features
 Of the same face, blossoms upon one tree Characters of the great Apocalypse,
 The types and symbols of Eternity, 640 Of first, and last, and midst, and without end

BOOK VIII. RETROSPECT—LOVE OF NATURE
 LEADING TO LOVE OF MAN

What sounds are those, Helvellyn, that are heard
 Up to thy summit, through the depth of an Ascending, as if distance had the power

- To make the sounds more audible? What crowd 5 'Covers, or sprinkles o'er, yon village green?
 Crowd seems it, solitary hill¹ to thee,
 Though but a little family of men, Shepherds and tillers of the ground—be-
 times Assembled with their children and their wives,
 10 And here and there a stranger interspersed They hold a rustic fair—a festival.
 Such as, on this side now, and now on that,
 Repeated through his tributary vales, Helvellyn, in the silence of his rest, 15 Sees annually, if clouds towards either ocean
 Blown from their favorite resting-place, or mists Dissolved, have left him an unshrouded
 head
 Delightful day it is for all who dwell
 In this secluded glen, and eagerly 20 They give it welcome—Long ere heat of noon,
 From byre¹ or field the kine were brought,
 the sheep
 Are penned in cotes, the chaffering is begun
 The herder lows, uneasy at the voice Of a new master, bleat the flocks aloud 25 Booths are there none, a stall or two is here.
 A lame man or a blind, the one to beg,
 The other to make music, hither, too,
 From far, with basket, slung upon her arm,
 Of hawker's wares—books, pictures, combs, and pins—
 30 Some aged woman finds her way again,
 Year after year, a punctual visitant¹
 There also stands a speech-maker by rote, Pulling the strings of his boxed rare-show;²
 And in the lapse of many years may come 35 Prouder itinerant, mountebank, or he Whose wonders in a covered wain he had But one there is, the loveliest of them all,
 Some sweet lass of the valley, looking out For gains, and who that sees her would not buy?
 40 Fruits of her father's orchard are her wares,
 And with the ruddy produce she walks
 round
 Among the crowd, half pleased with, half ashamed
 Of her new office, blushing restlessly
 The children now are rich, for the old today 45 Are generous as the young, and, it content With looking on, some ancient wedded pair Sit in the shade together, while they gaze,
 "A cheerful smile unbends the wrinkled
 brow,
 The days departed start again to life, 50 And all the scenes of childhood reappear.
 Faint, but more tranquil, like the changing
 sun
 To him who slept at noon and wakes at eve"
 Thus gaily and cheerfulness prevail, Spreading from young to old, from old to young,
 55 And no one seems to want his share—
 Immense
 Is the recess, the circumambient world Magnificent, by which they are embraced They move about upon the soft green turf
 How little they, they and their domes,
 seem,
 60 And all that they can further or obstruct¹ Through utter weakness pitifully dear,
 As tender infants are—and yet how great¹
 For all things serve them, them the morning light
 Loves, as it glistens on the silent rocks.
 65 And then the silent rocks, which now from high Look down upon them, the reposing
 clouds,
 The wild brooks prattling from invisible haunts,
 And old Helvellyn, conscious of the sun
 Which animates this day their calm abode 70 With deep devotion, Nature, did I feel,
 In that enormous City's turbulent world
 Of men and things, what benefit I owed To thee, and those domains of rural peace Where to the sense of beauty first my heart 75 Was opened, tract more exquisitely fan-Than that famed paradise of ten thousand
 trees,
 Or Gehol's matchless gardens;² for delight
 Of the Tartarian dynasty composed (Beyond that mighty wall, not fabulous, 80 China's stupendous mound) by patient toil Of myriads and boon Nature's lavish help.
 There, in a clime from widest empire chosen, Fulfilling (could enchantment have done
 more?)
 A sumptuous dream of flowery lawns, with domes
 85 Of pleasure sprinkled over, shady dells
 For eastern monasteries, sunny mounts

 The Hanging Gardens of Babylon

² cow barn ³ cheap street show

With temples crested, bridges, gondolas, Rocks, dens, and groves of foliage taught to melt

Into each other their obsequious hues, 90 Vanished and vanishing in subtle chase, Too fine to be pursued; or standing forth In no discordant opposition, strong And gorgeous as the colors side by side Bedded among rich plumes of tropic birds; 95 And mountains over all, embracing all;
And all the landscape, endlessly enriched With waters running, falling, or asleep.

But lovelier far than this, the paradise
Where I was reared, in Nature's primitive gifts

100 Favored no less, and more to every sense Delicious, seeing that the sun and sky,
The elements, and seasons as they change.
Do find a worthy fellow-laborer there—Man free, man working for himself, with choice 105 Of time, and place, and object, by his wants,
His comforts, native occupations, cares, Cheerfully led to individual ends Or social, and still followed by a train Unwooded, unthought-of even—simplicity, 110 And beauty, and inevitable grace

Yea, when a glimpse of those imperial
bowers

Would to a child be transport over-great, When but a half-hour's roam through such a place

Would leave behind a dance of images.

115 That shall break in upon his sleep for weeks.

Even then the common haunts of the green
earth.

And ordinary interests of man,
Which they embosom, all without regard As both may seem, are fastening on the
heart

120 Insensibly, each with the other's help For me, when my affections first were led From kindred, friends, and playmates, to partake

Love for the human creature's absolute self.
That noticeable kindness of heart

125 Sprang out of fountains, there abounding most,

Where sovereign Nature dictated the tasks
And occupations which her beauty adorned, And shepherds were the men that pleased me first;¹

¹ These shepherds lived close to Nature and were intensely real. They appealed to Wordsworth's imagination infinitely more than the artificial shepherds in the pastoral literature of the ancients and of Shakespeare and Spenser.

Not such as Saturn ruled 'mid Latian wilds, 130 With arts and laws so tempered, that their lives

Left, even to us toiling in this late day,
A bright tradition of the golden age,
Not such as, 'mid Arcadian fastnesses Sequestered, handed down among themselves

135 Felicity, in Grecian song renowned,¹ Nor such as—when an adverse fate had
driven,
From house and home, the courtly band whose fortunes Entered, with Shakespeare's genius, the wild woods

Of Arden—amid sunshine or in shade Culled the best fruits of Time's uncounted
hours,

Ere Phœbe sighed for the false Ganymede;²

Or there where Perdita and Florizel Together danced, Queen of the feast, and
'King';³

Nor such as Spenser fabled.⁴ True it is, 145 That I had heard (what he perhaps had seen)

Of maids at sunrise bringing in from far Their May-bush, and along the street in flocks

Parading with a song of taunting rhymes, Aimed at the laggards slumbering within doors,

150 Had also heard, from those who yet remembered,

Tales of the May-pole dance, and wreaths that decked

Porch, doorway, or knick pillar, and of youths,

Each with his maid, before the sun was up,
By annual custom, issuing forth in troops,

155 To drink the waters of some sainted well.
And hang it round with garlands Love survives,

But, for such purpose, flowers no longer grow

The times, too sage, perhaps too proud, have dropped

These lighter graces, and the rural ways And manners which my childhood looked upon

160 Were the unluxuriant produce of a life Intent on little but substantial needs, Yet rich in beauty, beauty that was felt
But images of danger and distress,

165 Man suffering among awful Powers and Forms;

⁴ The Shepherden's Calendar

- Of this I heard, and saw enough to make Imagination restless; nor was free Myself from frequent perils; nor were tales
 Wanting,—the tragedies of former times, 170 Hazards and strange escapes, of which the rocks
 Immutable, and everflowing streams, Where'er I roamed, were speaking monuments
- Smooth life had flock and shepherd in old time,
 Long springs and tepid winters, on the banks
 175 Of delicate Galesus, and no less Those scattered along Adria's myrtle shores
 Smooth life had herdsman, and his snow-white herd
 To triumphs and to sacrificial rites Devoted, on the inviolable stream 180 Of rich Clitumnus, and the goat-herd lived As calmly, underneath the pleasant brows Of cool Lucretius, where the pipe was heard
 Of Pan, invisible god, thrilling the rocks
 With tutelary music, from all harm 185 The fold protecting I myself, mature In manhood then, have seen a pastoral tract¹
 Like one of these, where Fancy might run
 wild,
 Though under skies less generous less
 serene
 There, for her own delight had Nature framed 190 A pleasure-ground, diffused a fair expanse Of level pasture, islanded with groves And banked with woody risings, but the plain
 Endless, here opening widely out, and there Shut up in lesser lakes or beds of lawn 195 And intricate recesses, creek or bay Sheltered within a shelter, where at large The shepherd strays, a rolling but his
 home Thither he comes with spring-time, there abides
 All summer, and at sunrise ye may hear 200 His flageolet to liquid notes of love Attuned, or sprightly fife resounding far Nook is there none, nor tract of that vast space Where passage opens, but the same shall have
 In turn its visitant, telling there his hours
- 205 In unlaborious pleasure, with no task
 More toilsome than to carve a beechen bowl For spring or fountain, which the traveller finds,
 When through the region he pursues at will His devious course A glimpse of such sweet life
 210 I saw when, from the melancholy walls Of Goslar, once imperial, I renewed My daily walk along that wide champaign.¹
 That, reaching to her gates spreads east and west,
 And northwards, from beneath the mountainous verge 215 Of the Hercynian forest Yet, hail to you Moors, mountains, headlands, and ye hollow vales,
 Ye long deep channels for the Atlantic's
 voice,
 Powers of my native region! Ye that seize The heart with finer grasp! Your snows and streams
 220 Ungovernable, and your terrifying winds That howl so dismally for him who treads Companionless your awful solitudes!
 There, 'tis the Shepherd's task the winter long
 To wait upon the storms of then approach
 225 Sagacious, into sheltering coves he drives His flock, and thither from the homestead bears
 A toilsome burden up the craggy ways,
 And deals it out, then regular nourishment Strewn on the frozen snow And when the
 spring
 230 Looks out, and all the pastures dance with lambs,
 And when the flock, with warmer weather, climbs Higher and higher, him his office leads To watch their gongs, whatsoever track
 The wanderers choose For this he quits his home
 235 At day-spring, and no sooner doth the sun Begin to strike him with a fire-like heat,
 Than he lies down upon some shining rock,
 And breakfasts with his dog When they have stolen,
 As is then wont, a pittance from strict tune,
 240 For rest not needed or exchange of love, Then from his couch he starts; and now his feet
 Crush out a hvelier fragrance from the
 flowers

¹ At Goslar near the Harz Mountains¹ level field

- Of lowly thyme, by Nature's skill en-
wrought
In the wild turf: the lingering dews of morn 245 Smoke round him, as from hill to hill he hies,
His staff pretending like a hunter's spear.
Or by its aid leaping from crag to crag.
And o'er the brawling beds of unbridged
streams
Philosophy, methinks, at Fancy's call, 250 Might deign to follow him through what he does Or sees in his day's march; himself he feels,
In those vast regions where his service lies,
A freeman, wedded to his life of hope And hazard, and hard labor interchanged 255 With that majestic indolence so dear To native man A rambling schoolboy, thus I felt his presence in his own domain.
As of a lord and master, or a power,
Or genius, under Nature, under God.
260 Presiding, and severest solitude Had more commanding looks when he was
there
When up the lonely brooks on rainy days Angling I went, or trod the trackless hills
By mists bewildered, suddenly mine eyes 265 Have glanced upon him distant a few steps.
In size a giant, stalking through thick fog.
His sheep like Greenland bears; or, as he stepped Beyond the boundary line of some hill shadow,
His form hath flashed upon me, glorified 270 By the deep radiance of the setting sun.
Or him have I deserved in distant sky,
A solitary object and sublime,
Above all height! like an aerial cross Stationed alone upon a spiry rock 275 Of the Chartreuse, for worship Thus was
man
Ennobled outwardly before my sight,
And thus my heart was early introduced To an unconscious love and reverence
Of human nature; hence the human form 280 To me became an index of delight,
Of grace and honor, power and worthiness Meanwhile this creature—spiritual almost As those of books, but more exalted far.
Far more of an imaginative form 285 Than the gay Corin of the groves, who lives For his own fancies, or to dance by the
hour,
In coronal, with Phyllis in the midst—
Was, for the purposes of kind, a man With the most common; husband, father;
learned,
- 290 Could teach, admonish; suffered with the rest
From vice and folly, wretchedness and
fear;
Of this I little saw, cared less for it,
But something must have felt Call ye these appearances—
Which I beheld of shepherds in my youth.
295 This sanctity of Nature given to man—A shadow, a delusion, ye who poise On the dead letter, miss the spirit of
things,
Whose truth is not a motion or a shape Instinct with vital functions, but a block 300 Or waxen image which yourselves have made,
And ye adore! But blessed be the God
Of Nature and of Man that this was so.
That men before my inexperienced eyes Did first present themselves thus purified.
305 Removed, and to a distance that was fit And so we all of us in some degree Are led to knowledge, wheresoever led,
And howsoever, were it otherwise,
And we found evil fast as we find good 310 In our first years, or think that it is found, How could the innocent heart bear up and
live!
But doubly fortunate my lot, not here Alone, that something of a better life Perhaps was round me than it is the privilege 315 Of most to move in, but that first I looked At man through objects that were great or
fair;
First communed with him by their help
And thus Was founded a sure safeguard and defence
Against the weight of meanness, selfish cares,
320 Coarse manners, vulgar passions, that beat in
On all sides from the ordinary world In which we traffic Starting from this point,
I had my face turned toward the truth,
began
With an advantage furnished by that kind 325 Of prepossession, without which the soul Receives no knowledge that can bring forth
good,
No genuine insight ever comes to her.
From the restraint of over-watchful eyes Preserved, I moved about, year after year.
330 Happy, and now most thankful that my walk
Was guarded from too early intercourse

- With the deformities of crowded life,
And those ensuing laughters and contempt,
Self-pleasing, which, if we would wish to think 15 With a due reverence on earth's rightful lord,
Here placed to be the inheritor of heaven,
Will not permit us, but pursue the mind,
That to devotion willingly would rise.
Into the temple and the temple's heart
- 310 Yet deem not, friend! that human kind with me
Thus early took a place pre-eminent.
Nature herself was, at this unripe time,
But secondary to my own pursuits
And animal activities, and all 345 Then trivial pleasures, and when these had drooped
And gradually expired, and Nature, prized For her own sake became my joy, even
then—
And upwards through late youth, until not less Than two-and-twenty summers had been told—
- 150 Was Man in my affections and regards Subordinate to her, her visible forms And viewless agencies—a passion, she,
A rapture often, and immediate love Ever at hand; he, only a delight 55 Occasional, an accidental grace, His hom being not yet come—Far less had
then
The inferior creatures, beast or bird, attuned
My spirit to that gentleness of love (Though they had long been carefully observed),
- 160 Won from me those minute obeisances
Of tenderness, which I may number now With my first blessings—Nevertheless on these
The light of beauty did not fall in vain Or grandeur enmesh them to no end
- 365 But when that first poetic faculty Of plain Imagination and severe,
No longer a mute influence of the soul,
Ventured, at some rash muse's earnest call To try her strength among harmonious
words,
170 And to book-notions and the rules of art Did knowingly conform itself, there came Among the simple shapes of human life
A wilfulness of fancy and conceit
And Nature and her objects beautified 375 These fictions, as in some sort, in their turn,
- They burnished her. From touch of this new power
Nothing was safe: the elder-tree that grew Beside the well-known charnel-house had
then
A dismal look, the yew-tree had its ghost, 380 That took his station there for ornament
The dignities of plain occurrence then Were tasteless, and truth's golden mean, a point Where no sufficient pleasure could be found
Then, if a widow, staggering with the blow 185 Of her distress, was known to have turned her steps,
To the cold grave in which her husband slept,
One night, or haply more than one,
through pain
Or half-insensate impotence of mind,
The fact was caught at greedily, and there 390 She must be visitant the whole year
through,
Wetting the turf with never-ending tears—Through quaint obliquities¹ I might pursue These cravings, when the foxglove, one by one,
Upwards through every stage of the tall stem,
395 Had shed beside the public way its bells, And stood of all dismantled, save the last left at the tapering ladder's top, that seemed
To bend as doth a slender blade of grass Tipped with a rain-drop, Fancy loved to seat,
400 Beneath the plant despoiled, but crested still
With this last relic, soon itself to fall, Some vagrant mother, whose arch little ones,
All unconcerned by her dejected plight,
Laughed as with rival eagerness their hands 405 Gathered the purple cups that round them
lay,
Strewing the turf's green slope
A diamond light (Where'er the summer sun, declining, smote
A smooth rock wet with constant springs) was seen Sparkling from out a copse-clad bank that
rose
410 Fronting our cottage—Oft beside the hearth Seated, with open door, often and long Upon this restless lustre have I gazed, ² deviations

That made my fancy restless as itself.

'Twas now for me a burnished silver shield

415 Suspended over a knight's tomb, who lay

Inglorious, buried in the dusky wood

An entrance now into some magic cave

Or palace built by faeries of the rock,

Nor could I have been bribed to disenchant

420 The spectacle by visiting the spot.

Thus wilful Fancy, in no hurtful mood,

Engraved far-fetched shapes on feelings

bred

By pure Imagination · busy Power

She was, and with her ready pupil turned 425 Instinctively to human passions, then

Least understood Yet, 'mid the fervent swarm

Of these vagaries, with an eye so rich

As mine was through the bounty of a grand

And lovely region, I had forms distinct

430 To steady me each airy thought revolved

Round a substantial centre, which at once

Incited it to motion, and controlled.

I did not pine like one in cities bred,¹

As was thy melancholy lot, dear friend!

435 Great Spirit as thou art, in endless dreams

Of sickness, disjoining, joining, things

Without the light of knowledge. Where the harm,

If, when the woodman languished with disease

Induced by sleeping nightly on the ground

440 Within his sod-built cabin, Indian-wise,

I called the pangs of disappointed love,

And all the sad etcetera of the wrong,

To help him to his grave? Meanwhile the

man,

If not already from the woods retired

445 To die at home, was haply as I knew,

Withering by slow degrees, 'mid gentle airs,

Birds, running streams, and hills so beautiful

On golden evenings, while the charcoal pile

Breathed up its smoke, an image of his ghost

450 Or spirit that full soon must take her

flight

Nor shall we not be tending towards that point

Of sound humanity to which our tale

Leads, though by sinuous ways, if here I

show

How Fancy, in a season when she wove

455 Those slender cords, to guide the unconscious Boy

For the Man's sake, could feed at Nature's call

Some pensive musings which might well besem

Maturer years.

A grove there is whose boughs

Stretch from the western marge of Thunston-mere,

460 With length of shade so thick, that whose glides

Along the line of low-roofed water, moves

As in a cloister. Once—while, in that shade

Loitering, I watched the golden beams of

light

Flung from the setting sun, as they reposed

465 In silent beauty on the naked ridge

Of a high eastern hill—thus flowed my

thoughts

In a pure stream of words fresh from the

heart:

Dear native Regions,¹ whereso'er shall

close

My mortal course, there will I think on you

470 Dying, will cast on you a backward look

Even as this setting sun (albeit the vale

Is nowhere touched by one memorial gleam)

Doth with the fond remains of his last

power

Still linger, and a farewell lustre sheds

475 On the dear mountain-tops where first he

rose.

Enough of humble arguments; recall,

My song! those high emotions which thy

voice

Has heretofore made known; that bursting forth

Of sympathy, inspiring and inspired,

480 When everywhere a vital pulse was felt,

And all the several frames of things, like

stars,

Through every magnitude distinguishable,

Shone mutually indebted, or half lost

Each in the other's blaze, a galaxy

485 Of life and glory. In the midst stood Man,

Outwardly, inwardly contemplated,

As, of all visible natures, crown, though

born

Of dust, and kindred to the worm; a

Being,

Both in perception and discernment, first

490 In every capability of rapture,

Through the divine effect of power and

love;

As, more than anything we know, instinct

With godhead, and, by reason and by will,

Acknowledging dependency sublime.

- 495 Ere long, the lonely mountains left, I
moved,
Begirt, from day to day, with temporal shapes
Of vice and folly thrust upon my view,
Objects of sport, and ridicule, and scorn, Manners and characters discriminate, 500 And little bustling passions that eclipse, As well they might, the impersonated
thought,
The idea, or abstraction of the kind.
- An idler among academic bowers, Such was my new condition, as at large 505 Has been set forth, yet here the vulgar
light
Of present, actual, superficial life, Gleaning, through coloring of other times,
Old usages and local privilege,
Was welcome, softened, if not solemnized.
510 This notwithstanding, being brought more near
To vice and guilt, forerunning wretched-
ness,
I trembled,—thought, at times, of human
life
With an indefinite terror and dismay,
Such as the storms and angry elements 515 Had bred in me, but gloomier far, a dim Analogy to uproar and misrule, Disquiet, danger, and obscurity
- It might be told (but wherefore speak of things Common to all?) that, seemg, I was led 520 Gravely to ponder—judging between good And evil, not as for the mind's delight But for her guidance—one who was to act,
As sometimes to the best of feeble means
I did, by human sympathy impelled.
525 And, through dislike and most offensive pain,
Was to the truth conducted, of this faith
Never forsaken, that, by acting well.
And understanding, I should learn to love
The end of life, and everything we know.
- 530 Grave teacher, stern preceptress! for at times
Thou canst put on an aspect most severe,
London, to thee I willingly return.
Erewhile my verse played idly with the
flowers
Enwrought upon thy mantle; satisfied 535 With that amusement, and a simple look Of child-like inquisition now and then Cast upwards on thy countenance, to detect Some inner meanings which might harbor
there.
But how could I in mood so light indulge, 540 Keeping such fresh remembrance of the
day,
When, having thridded the long labyrinth
Of the suburban villages, I first Entered thy vast dominion? On the roof Of an itinerant vehicle I sate, 545 With vulgar men about me, trivial forms Of houses, pavement, streets, of men and
things,— Mean shapes on every side: but, at the instant,
When to myself it fairly might be said,
The threshold now is overpast, (how strange 550 That aught external to the living mind Should have such mighty sway! yet so it was),
A weight of ages did at once descend Upon my heart; no thought embodied, no Distinct remembrances, but weight and
power,— 555 Power growing under weight: alas! I feel That I am trifling 'twas a moment's pause,—
All that took place within me came and went
As in a moment; yet with Time it dwells,
And grateful memory, as a thing divine.
- 560 The curious traveller, who, from open
day,
Hath passed with torches into some huge cave,
The Grotto of Antiparos, or the den¹
In old time haunted by that Danish witch, Yordas, he looks around and sees the vault 565 Widening on all sides, sees, or thinks he sees,
Erelong, the massy roof above his head,
That instantly unsettles and recedes,— Substance and shadow, light and darkness,
all Commungled, making up a canopy 570 Of shapes and forms and tendencies to shape
That shift and vanish, change and interchange
Like spectres,—ferment silent and sublime!
That after a short space works less and less,
Till, every effort, every motion gone, 575 The scene before him stands in perfect view Exposed, and lifeless as a written book!—
But let him pause awhile, and look again,
And a new quickening shall succeed, at first

Beginning timidly, then creeping fast, 580 Till the whole cave, so late a senseless mass, Buses the eye with images and forms Boldly assembled,—here is shadowed forth
 From the projections, wrinkles, cavities,
 A variegated landscape,—there the shape 585 Of some gigantic warrior clad in mail,
 The ghostly semblance of a hooded monk,
 Veiled nun, or pilgrim resting on his staff—Strange congregation! yet not slow to meet Eyes that perceive through minds that can inspire.

590 Even in such sort had I at first been moved,
 Nor otherwise continued to be moved,
 As I explored the vast metropolis, Fount of my country's destiny and the world's;
 That great emporium, chronicle at once 595 And burial-place of passions, and their home
 Imperial, their chief living residence.

With strong sensations teeming as it did Of past and present, such a place must needs
 Have pleased me, seeking knowledge at that time 600 Far less than craving power; yet knowledge came,
 Sought or unsought, and influxes of power Came, of themselves, or at her call derived In fits of kindest apprehensiveness,
 From all sides, when what'er was in itself 605 Capacious found, or seemed to find, in me
 A correspondent amplitude of mind, Such is the strength and glory of our youth!
 The human nature unto which I felt That I belonged, and revered with love, 610 Was not a punctual presence, but a spirit Diffused through time and space, with aid derived
 Of evidence from monuments, erect, Prostrate, or leaning towards their common rest
 In earth, the widely scattered wreck sublime
 615 Of vanished nations, or more clearly drawn From books and what they picture and record.

'Tis true, the history of our native land,
 With those of Greece compared and popular Rome,
 And in our high-wrought modern narratives

620 Stript of their harmonizing soul, the life Of manners and familiar incidents, Had never much delighted me. And less Than other intellects had mine been used To lean upon extrinsic circumstance 625 Of record or tradition; but a sense Of what in the great City had been done And suffered, and was doing, suffering,
 still,
 Weighed with me, could support the test of thought;
 And, in despite of all that had gone by, 630 Or was departing never to return,
 There I conversed with majesty and power Like independent natures. Hence the place
 Was thronged with impregnations like the wilds
 In which my early feelings had been nursed—635 Bare hills and valleys, full of caverns,
 rocks,
 And audible seclusions, dashing lakes, Echoes and waterfalls, and pointed crags—
 That into music touch the passing wind Here then my young imagination found 640 No uncongenial element, could here Among new objects serve or give command,
 Even as the heart's occasions might require,
 To forward reason's else too scrupulous march.
 The effect was, still more elevated views 645 Of human nature Neither vice nor guilt.
 Debasement undergone by body or mind
 Nor all the misery forced upon my sight, Misery not lightly passed, but sometimes scanned
 Most feelingly, could overthrow my trust 650 In what we may become; induce belief That I was ignorant, had been falsely taught,
 A solitary, who with vain conceits Had been inspired, and walked about in dreams.
 From those sad scenes when meditation
 turned,
 655 Lo! everything that was indeed divine Retained its purity inviolate, Nay brighter shone, by this portentous
 gloom
 Set off; such opposition as aroused
 The mind of Adam, yet in Paradise 660 Though fallen from bliss, when in the east he saw Darkness ere day's mid course, and morning light
 More orient in the western cloud, that drew

O'er the blue firmament a radiant white, Descending slow with something heavenly fraught.

665 Add also, that among the multitudes
 Of that huge city, oftentimes was seen Affectingly set forth, more than elsewhere Is possible, the unity of man,
 One spirit over ignorance and vice 670 Predominant in good and evil hearts,
 One sense for moral judgments, as one eye For the sun's light. The soul when smitten
 thus
 By a sublime idea, whence so'er Vouchsafed for union or communion, feeds 675 On the pure bliss, and takes her rest with God.

Thus from a very early age, O friend!
 My thoughts by slow gradations had been drawn
 To human-kind, and to the good and ill Of human life. Nature had led me on, 680 And oft amid the "busy hum" I seemed To travel independent of her help,
 As if I had forgotten her, but no,
 The world of human-kind outweighed not hers
 In my habitual thoughts; the scale of love, 685 Though filling daily, still was light, compared With that in which her mighty objects lay

FROM BOOK XI FRANCE

105 O pleasant exercise of hope and joy!
 For mighty were the auxiliars which then stood
 Upon our side, us who were strong in love!
 Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive, But to be young was very Heaven! O
 times,
 110 In which the meagre, stale, forbidding ways
 Of custom, law, and statute, took at once
 The attraction of a country in romance!
 When Reason seemed the most to assert her rights
 When most intent on making of herself 115 A prime enchantress—to assist the work, Which then was going forward in her
 name!
 Not favored spots alone, but the whole
 Earth,
 The beauty wore of promise—that which sets
 (As at some moments might not be unfelt 120 Among the bowers of Paradise itself)
 The budding rose above the rose full blown.

¹ To "Meditate with ardor on the rule and management of nations"—190

What temper at the prospect did not wake To happiness unthought of! The inert Were roused, and lively natures rapt away!
 125 They who had fed their childhood upon
 dreams,
 The play-fellows of fancy, who had made All powers of swiftness, subtilty, and strength
 Their ministers,—who in lordly wise had stirred
 Among the grandest objects of the sense, 130 And dealt with whatsoever they found
 there
 As if they had within some lurking right
 To wield it,—they, too, who of gentle mood Had watched all gentle motions, and to these Had fitted their own thoughts, schemers more mild, 135 And in the region of their peaceful selves,—
 Now was it that both found, the meek and lofty
 Did both find, helpers to their hearts' desire,
 And stuff at hand, plastic as they could wish,—
 Were called upon to exercise their skill, 140 Not in Utopia,—subterranean fields,— Or some secreted island,¹ Heaven knows where!
 But in the very world, which is the world
 Of all of us,—the place where, in the end,
 We find our happiness, or not at all!

145 Why should I not confess that Earth was then
 To me, what an inheritance, new-fallen, Seems, when the first time visited, to one Who thither comes to find in it his home?
 He walks about and looks upon the spot 150 With cordial transport, moulds it and remoulds,
 And is half-pleased with things that are amiss,
 'Twill be such joy to see them disappear.

An active partisan, I thus convoked
 From every object pleasant circumstance To suit my ends, I moved among mankind 155 With genial feelings still predominant, When erring, erring on the better part,
 And in the kinder spirit, placable, Indulgent, as not uninformed that men 160 See as they have been taught—Antiquity Gives rights to error, and aware, no less,
 That throwing off oppression must be work
 As well of License as of Liberty, And above all—for this was more than all—

¹ Such as Bacon's New Atlantis

- 165 Not caring if the wind did now and then Blow keen upon an eminence that gave Prospect so large into futurity;
 In brief, a child of Nature, as at first, Diffusing only those affections wider 170 That from the cradle had grown up with
 me,
 And losing, in no other way than light
 Is lost in light, the weak in the more strong.
 In the main outline, such it might be said
 Was my condition, till with open war 175 Britain opposed the liberties of France.¹
 This threw me first out of the pale of love, Soured and corrupted, upwards to the source,
 My sentiments; was not, as hitherto,
 A swallowing up of lesser things in great, 180 But change of them into their contraries,
 And thus a way was opened for mistakes
 And false conclusions, in degree as gross, In kind more dangerous What had been a pride,
 Was now a shame, my likings and my loves 185 Ran in new channels, leaving old ones dry,
 And hence a blow that, in maturer age,
 Would but have touched the judgment, struck more deep Into sensations near the heart meantime,
 As from the first, wild theories were afloat, 190 To whose pretensions, sedulously urged,
 I had but lent a careless ear, assured That time was ready to set all things right,
 And that the multitude, so long oppressed,
 Would be oppressed no more
 But when events 195 Brought less encouragement, and unto these The immediate proof of principles no more Could be entrusted, while the events themselves,
 Worn out in greatness, stripped of novelty, Less occupied the mind, and sentiments 200 Could through my understanding's natural growth
 No longer keep their ground, by faith maintained Of inward consciousness, and hope that
 laid
 Her hand upon her object—evidence Safer, of universal application, such 205 As could not be impeached, was sought elsewhere.
 But now, become oppressors in their
 turn,
 Frenchmen had changed a war of self-defense
 For one of conquest, losing sight of all ¹In 1793
- Which they had struggled for: up mounted now, 210 Openly in the eye of earth and heaven,
 The scale of liberty. I read her doom, With anger vexed, with disappointment sore,
 But not dismayed, nor taking to the shame
 Of a false prophet. While resentment rose 215 Striving to hide, what nought could heal, the wounds
 Of mortified presumption, I adhered More firmly to old tenets, and, to prove Their temper, strained them more; and thus, in heat
 Of contest, did opinions every day 220 Grow into consequence, till round my mind They clung, as if they were its life, nay
 more,
 The very being of the immortal soul

 270 A strong shock
 Was given to old opinions, all men's minds
 Had felt its power, and mine was both let loose, Let loose and goaded After what hath been Already said of patriotic love, 275 Suffice it here to add, that, somewhat stern
 In temperament, withal a happy man, And therefore bold to look on painful
 things,
 Free likewise of the world, and thence more bold,
 I summoned my best skill, and toiled, intent 280 To anatomize the frame of social life.
 Yea, the whole body of society Searched to its heart. Share with me, friend! the wish That some dramatic tale, endued with shapes
 Livelier, and flinging out less guarded
 words 285 Than suit the work we fashion, might set forth
 What then I learned, or think I learned, of truth,
 And the errors into which I fell, betrayed
 By present objects, and by reasonings false
 From their beginnings, inasmuch as drawn 290 Out of a heart that had been turned aside From Nature's way by outward accidents, And which was thus confounded, more
 and more Misguided, and misguiding. So I fared.
 Dragging all precepts, judgments, maxims, creeds,
 295 Like culprits to the bar; calling the mind, Suspiciously, to establish in plain day

Her titles and her honors, now believing, Now disbelieving, endlessly perplexed With impulse, motive, right and wrong,
 the ground
 800 Of obligation, what the rule and whence The sanction; till, demanding formal proof,
 And seeking it in everything, I lost
 All feeling of conviction, and, in fine, Sick, wearied out with contraries, 305 Yielded up moral questions in despair

Then it was—

Thanks to the bounteous Giver of all good!— 335 That the beloved sister¹ in whose sight Those days were passed, now speaking in a voice
 Of sudden admonition—like a brook
 That did but cross a lonely road, and now Is seen, heard, felt, and caught at every turn.
 340 Companion never lost through many a league—
 Maintained for me a saving intercourse With my true self, for, though bedimmed and changed
 Much, as it seemed, I was no further changed
 Than as a clouded and a waning moon 345 She whispered still that brightness would return,
 She, in the midst of all, preserved me still A poet, made me seek beneath that name,
 And that alone, my office upon earth.
 And, lastly, as hereafter will be shown, 350 If willing audience fail not, Nature's self,
 By all varieties of human love Assisted, led me back through opening day To those sweet counsels between head and
 heart
 Whence grew that genuine knowledge, fraught with peace, 355 Which, through the later sinkings of this cause,
 Hath still upheld me, and upholds me now

From BOOK XII IMAGINATION AND TASTE.
 HOW IMPAIRED AND RESTORED

Long time have human ignorance and guilt Detained us, on what spectacles of woe Compelled to look, and inwardly oppressed With sorrow, disappointment, vexing
 thoughts,
 5 Confusion of the judgment, zeal decayed, ¹ Wordsworth joined his sister Dorothy at Hall fax in the winter of 1794

And, lastly, utter loss of hope itself And things to hope for! Not with these began
 Our song, and not with these our song must end—
 Ye motions of delight, that haunt the sides 10 Of the green hills; ye breezes and soft airs, Whose subtle intercourse with breathing
 flowers,
 Feelingly watched, might teach Man's haughty race
 How without injury to take, to give Without offence, ye who, as if to show 15 The wondrous influence of power gently used,
 Bend the complying heads of lordly pines,
 And, with a touch, shift the stupendous
 clouds
 Through the whole compass of the sky, ye brooks,
 Muttering along the stones, a busy noise 20 By day, a quiet sound in silent night, Ye waves, that out of the great deep steal
 forth
 In a calm hour to kiss the pebbly shore.
 Not mute, and then retire, fearing no
 storm,
 And you, ye groves, whose ministry it is 25 To interpose the covert of your shades, Even as a sleep, between the heart of man And outward troubles, between man himself,
 Not seldom, and his own uneasy heart
 Oh! that I had a music and a voice 30 Harmonious as your own, that I might tell What ye have done for me The mourning shunes,
 Nor heedeth Man's perverseness, Spring returns,—
 I saw the Spring return, and could rejoice,
 In common with the children of her love, 35 Piping on boughs, or sporting on fresh fields,
 On boldly seeking pleasure nearer heaven
 On wings that navigate cerulean skies
 So neither were complacency, nor peace, Nor tender yearnings, wanting for my good 40 Through these distracted times; in Nature still Glorifying, I found a counterpoise in her,
 Which, when the spirit of evil reached its height,
 Maintained for me a secret happiness

Before I was called forth 175 From the retirement of my native hills,
 I loved whate'er I saw nor lightly loved,
 But most intensely; never dreamt of aught

- More grand, more fair, more exquisitely framed
Than those few nooks to which my happy
feet 180 Were limited. I had not at that time Lived long enough, nor in the least survived
The first diviner influence of this world,
As it appears to unaccustomed eyes.
Worshipping then among the depth of
things, 185 As piety ordained; could I submit To measured admiration, or to aught
That should preclude humility and love?
I felt, observed, and pondered, did not judge.
Yea, never thought of judging, with the gift 190 Of all this glory filled and satisfied And afterwards, when through the goi-geous Alps
Roaming, I carried with me the same heart.
In truth, the degradation—howsoe'er Induced, effect, in whatsoe'er degree, 195 Of custom that prepares a partial scale
In which the little oft outweighs the great,
Or any other cause that hath been named,
Or lastly, aggravated by the times And their impassioned sounds, which well might make 200 The milder minstrelsy of rural scenes Inaudible—was transient, I had known Too forcibly, too early in my life, Visitings of imaginative power
For this to last: I shook the habit off 205 Entirely and forever, and again In Nature's presence stood, as now I stand,
A sensitive being, a creative soul

BOOK XIII. IMAGINATION AND TASTE, HOW IMPAIRED AND RESTORED—(Concluded)

- From Nature doth emotion come, and moods
Of calmness equally are Nature's gift
This is her glory; these two attributes Are sister horns that constitute her
strength.
5 Hence Genius, born to thrive by interchange
Of peace and excitation, finds in her His best and purest friend; from her receives
That energy by which he seeks the truth.
From her that happy stillness of the mind 10 Which fits him to receive it when unsought.

Such benefit the humblest intellects Partake of, each in their degree; 'tis mine

- To speak what I myself have known and
felt;
Smooth task! for words find easy way, inspired 15 By gratitude, and confidence in truth.
Long time in search of knowledge did I range
The field of human life, in heart and mind Benighted, but, the dawn beginning now To reappear, 'twas proved that not in vain 20 I had been taught to reverence a Power That is the visible quality and shape
And image of right reason; that matures Her processes by steadfast laws; gives birth
To no impatient or fallacious hopes, 25 No heat of passion or excessive zeal, No vain conceits, provokes to no quick turns
Of self-applauding intellect, but trains
To meekness, and exalts by humble faith, Holds up before the mind intoxicate 30 With present objects, and the busy dance Of things that pass away, a temperate show Of objects that endure, and by this course Disposes her, when over-fondly set On throwing off incumbrances, to seek 35 In man, and in the frame of social life, Whate'er there is desirable and good Of kindred permanence, unchanged in form
And function, or, through strict vicissitude
Of life and death, revolving Above all 40 Were re-established now those watchful
thoughts
Which, seeming little worthy or sublime In what the historian's pen so much delights
To blazon—power and energy detached From moral purpose—early intored me 45 To look with feelings of fraternal love Upon the unassuming things that hold A silent station in this beauteous world

- Thus moderated, thus composed, I found Once more in Man an object of delight, 50 Of pure imagination, and of love;
And, as the horizon of my mind enlarged, Again I took the intellectual eye For my instructor, studious more to see Great truths, than touch and handle little ones.
55 Knowledge was given accordingly, my trust
Became more firm in feelings that had stood
The test of such a trial; clearer far My sense of excellence—of right and wrong.
The promise of the present time retired 60 Into its true proportion; sanguine schemes,

 Ambitious projects, pleased me less, I sought
 For present good in life's familiar face, And built thereon my hopes of good to come.

With settling judgments now of what would last 65 And what would disappear, prepared to find Presumption, folly, madness, in the men Who thrust themselves upon the passive
 world

As Rulers of the world, to see in these,
 Even when the public welfare is their aim, 70 Plans without thought, or built on theories Vague and unsound, and having brought the books

(Of modern statist to their proper test, Life, human life, with all its sacred claims Of sex and age, and heaven-descended
 rights,

75 Mortal, or those beyond the reach of death.

And having thus discerned how due a thing Is worshipped in that idol proudly named "The Wealth of Nations,"¹ where alone that wealth

Is lodged, and how increased, and having gained

80 A more judicious knowledge of the worth And dignity of individual man,
 No composition of the brain, but man Of whom we read, the man whom we behold

With our own eyes—I could not but enquire—

85 Not with less interest than heretofore, But greater, though in spirit more subdued—

Why is this glorious creature to be found One only in ten thousand? What one is, Why may not millions be? What bars are thrown

90 By Nature in the way of such a hope?
 Our animal appetites and daily wants,
 Are these obstructions insurmountable?
 If not, then others vanish into air
 "Inspect the basis of the social pile."

95 Enquire," said I, "how much of mental power
 And genuine virtue they possess who live

¹ A reference to the works of Adam Smith, the famous political economist, who was charged with treating man, in his Wealth of Nations, as merely a wealth-seeking animal devoid of altruistic motives

By bodily toil, labor exceeding far Their due proportion, under all the weight Of that injustice which upon ourselves 100 Ourselves entail." Such estimate to frame I chiefly looked (what need to look beyond?)

Among the natural abodes of men, Fields with their rural works; recalled to mind

My earliest notices, with these compared 105 The observations made in later youth,
 And to that day continued—For, the time Had never been when throes of mighty Nations

And the world's tumult unto me could yield,

How far soe'er transported and possessed, 110 Full measure of content, but still I craved An intermingling of distinct regards
 And truths of individual sympathy

Nearer ourselves. Such often might be gleaned

From the great City, else it must have proved

115 To me a heart-depressing wilderness; But much was wanting therefore did I
 turn

To you, ye pathways, and ye lonely roads, Sought you enriched with everything I prized,

With human kindnesses and simple joys

120 Oh! next to one dear state of bliss, vouchsafed

Alas! to few in this untoward world,
 The bliss of walking daily in life's prime Through field or forest with the maid we
 love,

While yet our hearts are young, while yet we breathe

125 Nothing but happiness, in some lone nook, Deep vale, or anywhere, the home of both,
 From which it would be misery to stir:

Oh! next to such enjoyment of our youth,
 In my esteem, next to such dear delight,

130 Was that of wandering on from day to day Where I could meditate in peace, and cull Knowledge that step by step might lead me on

To wisdom; or, as lightsome as a bird Wafted upon the wind from distant lands,

135 Sing notes of greeting to strange fields or groves,

Which lacked not voice to welcome me in turn.

And, when that pleasant toil had ceased to please,

Converse with men, where if we meet a face
 We almost meet a friend, on naked heaths

140 With long long ways before, by cottage bench,
Or well-spring where the weary traveller rests.

Who doth not love to follow with his eye
The windings of a public way? the sight, Familiar object as it is, hath wrought 145 On my imagination since the morn
Of childhood, when a disappearing line,
One daily present to my eyes, that crossed The naked summit of a far-off hill
Beyond the limits that my feet had trod, 150 Was like an invitation into space Boundless, or guide into eternity Yes, something of the grandeur which invests
The mariner who sails the roaring sea Through storm and darkness, early in my
mind 155 Surrounded, too, the wanderers of the
earth;
Grandeur as much, and loveliness far more Awed have I been by strolling Bedlamites, From many other uncouth vagrants (passed In fear) have walked with quicker step, but why 160 Take note of this? When I began to enquire,
To watch and question those I met, and
speak
Without reserve to them, the lonely roads Were open schools in which I daily read With most delight the passions of mankind, 165 Whether by words, looks, sighs, or tears.
revealed,
There saw into the depth of human souls, Souls that appear to have no depth at all To careless eyes. And—now convinced at heart
How little those formalities, to which 170 With overweening trust alone we give The name of Education, have to do With real feeling and just sense, how vain
A correspondence with the talking world Proves to the most; and called to make good search 175 If man's estate, by doom of Nature yoked With toil, be therefore yoked with ignorance,
If virtue be indeed so hard to rear,
And intellectual strength so rare a boon—
I prized such walks still more, for there I found 180 Hope to my hope, and to my pleasure
peace
And steadiness, and healing and repose
To every angry passion. There I heard,

From mouths of men obscure and lowly, truths
Replete with honor; sounds in unison 185 With loftiest promises of good and fair.

There are who think that strong affection, love
Known by whatever name, is falsely deemed
A gift, to use a term which they would use,
Of vulgar nature; that its growth requires 190 Retirement, leisure, language purified
By manners studied and elaborate, That whoso feels such passion in its strength
Must live within the very light and air
Of courteous usages refined by art.
195 True is it, where oppression worse than
death
Salutes the being at his birth, where grace
Of culture hath been utterly unknown,
And poverty and labor in excess From day to day preoccupy the ground 200 Of the affections, and to Nature's self Oppose a deeper nature; there, indeed, Love cannot be; nor does it thrive with ease
Among the close and overcrowded haunts
Of cities, where the human heart is sick, 205 And the eye feeds it not, and cannot feed.
—Yes, in those wanderings deeply did I
feel
How we mislead each other, above all, How books mislead us, seeking their reward
From judgments of the wealthy Few, who see 210 By artificial lights, how they debase
The Many for the pleasure of those Few, Effeminately level down the truth
To certain general notions, for the sake Of being understood at once, or else 215 Through want of better knowledge in the heads
That framed them; flattering self-conceit with words,
That, while they most ambitiously set forth Extrinsic differences, the outward marks Whereby society has parted man 220 From man, neglect the universal heart.

Here, calling up to mind what then I saw,
A youthful traveller, and see daily now In the familiar circuit of my home, Here might I pause, and bend in reverence 225 To Nature, and the power of human minds, To men as they are men within themselves How oft high service is performed within.

- When all the external man is rude in
show,—
Not like a temple rich with pomp and gold, 230 But a mere mountain chapel, that protects Its simple worshippers from sun and shower
Of these, said I, shall be my song, of these,
If future years mature me for the task,
Will I record the praises, making verse 235 Deal boldly with substantial things, in truth
And sanctity of passion, speak of these,
That justice may be done, obeisance paid
Where it is due thus haply shall I teach.
Inspire, through unadulterated ears 240 Pour rapture, tenderness, and hope,—my theme
No other than the very heart of man, As found among the best of those who live—
Not unexalted by religious faith, Nor uninformed by books, good books, though few—245 In Nature's presence thence may I select Sorrow, that is not sorrow, but delight,
And miserable love, that is not pain
To hear of, for the glory that redounds Therefrom to human kind, and what we are.
250 Be mine to follow with no timid step Where knowledge leads me it shall be my pride
That I have dared to tread this holy
ground,
Speaking no dream, but things oracular, Matter not lightly to be heard by those 255 Who to the letter of the outward promise Do read the invisible soul, by men adroit In speech, and for communion with the
world
Accomplished, minds whose faculties are then
Most active when they are most eloquent, 260 And elevated most when most admired.
Men may be found of other mould than
these,
Who are their own upholders, to themselves
Encouragement, and energy, and will, Expressing liveliest thoughts in lively
words 265 As native passion dictates. Others, too, There are among the walks of homely
life
Still higher, men for contemplation
framed,
Shy, and unpractised in the strife of phrase;
- Meek men, whose very souls perhaps would sink 270 Beneath them, summoned to such intercourse:
Theirs is the language of the heavens, the
power,
The thought, the image, and the silent joy:
Words are but under-agents in their souls;
When they are grasping with their greatest strength, 275 They do not breathe among them: this I speak
In gratitude to God, Who feeds our hearts
For His own service; knoweth, loveth us, When we are unregarded by the world.
- Also, about this time did I receive 280 Convictions still more strong than heretofore,
Not only that the inner frame is good,
And graciously composed, but that, no less,
Nature for all conditions wants not power To consecrate, if we have eyes to see, 285 The outside of her creatures, and to breathe
Grandeur upon the very humblest face
Of human life I felt that the array Of act and circumstance, and visible form,
Is mainly to the pleasure of the mind 290 What passion makes them; that meanwhile the forms
Of Nature have a passion in themselves,
That intermingles with those works of man To which she summons him, although the works
Be mean, have nothing lofty of their own, 295 And that the Genius of the poet hence May boldly take his way among mankind Wherever Nature leads, that he hath stood By Nature's side among the men of old,
And so shall stand forever. Dearest
friend!
- 300 If thou partake the animating faith That poets, even as prophets, each with each Connected in a mighty scheme of truth,
Have each his own peculiar faculty, Heaven's gift, a sense that fits him to perceive 305 Objects unseen before, thou wilt not blame
The humblest of this band who dares to hope
That unto him hath also been vouchsafed
An insight that in some sort he possesses, A privilege whereby a work of his, 310 Proceeding from a source of untaught
things,
Creative and enduring, may become

A power like one of Nature's. To a hope Not less ambitious once among the wilds Of Sarum's Plain,¹ my youthful spirit was raised;

315 There, as I ranged at will the pastoral downs

Trackless and smooth, or paced the bare³⁵⁰ white roads

Lengthening in solitude their dreary line,
Time with his retinue of ages fled Backwards, nor checked his flight until I saw

320 Our dim ancestral Past in vision clear, Saw multitudes of men, and, here and
there,

A single Briton clothed in wolf-skin vest, With shield and stone-axe, stride across the wold;

The voice of spears was heard, the rattling spear

325 Shaken by arms of mighty bone, in
strength,

Long mouldered, of barbaric majesty.
I called on Darkness—but before the word Was uttered, midnight darkness seemed to take

All objects from my sight; and lo! again³⁶⁵ 330 The Desert visible by dismal flames,

It is the sacrificial altar, fed
With living men—how deep the groans!
the voice

Of those that crowd the giant wicket² thrills

The monumental hillocks, and the pomp³³⁵
Is for both worlds, the living and the dead

At other moments—(for through that wide waste

Three summer days I roamed) where'er³⁷⁵
the Plain

Was figured o'er with circles, lines, or mounds,

That yet survive, a work, as some divine, 340 Shaped by the Druids, so to represent

Their knowledge of the heavens, and image
forth

The constellations—gently was I charmed Into a waking dream, a reverie

That, with believing eyes, where'er I turned,

345 Beheld long-bearded teachers, with white wands

Uplifted, pointing to the starry sky,

Alternately, and plain below, while breath Of music swayed their motions, and the waste Rejoiced with them and me in those sweet
sounds.

This for the past, and things that may be viewed

(I fancied in the obscurity of years From monumental hints and thou, O
friend!

Pleased with some unpremeditated strains!
That served those wanderings to beguile, hast said

355 That then and there my mind had exercised Upon the vulgar forms of present things,
The actual world of our familiar days, Yet higher power, had caught from them a tone,

An image, and a character, by books

360 Not hitherto reflected Call we this A partial judgment—and yet why? for
then

We were as strangers,² and I may not speak

Thus wrongfully of verse, however rude,
Which on thy young imagination, trained

365 In the great City, broke like light from far Moreover, each man's Mind is to herself Witness and judge, and I remember well That in life's every-day appearances

I seemed about this time to gain clear sight 370 Of a new world—a world, too, that was fit

To be transmitted, and to other eyes Made visible, as ruled by those fixed laws

Whence spiritual dignity originates, Which do both give it being and maintain

375 A balance, an ennobling interchange Of action from without and from within,
The excellence, pure function, and best
power

Both of the object seen, and eye that sees.

MICHAEL

A PASTORAL POEM
1800 1800

If from the public way you turn your steps
Up the tumultuous brook of Green-head Ghyll,³

You will suppose that with an upright path
Your feet must struggle, in such bold ascent

² The ancient Druids in Britain imprisoned human beings in giant idols of wickerwork and burned them alive as sacrifices to the gods. (See Holmes's Cæsar's Conquest of Gaul, 2nd ed., 33, 523, and Cæsar's Gallic Wars, 6, 16.)

³ The Descriptive Sketches, praised by Coleridge as the work of "a great and original poetic genius."

⁴ They did not meet until 1797.

⁵ "A Ghyll is a short, and, for the most part, a steep, narrow valley, with a stream running through it."—Wordsworth.

5 The pastoral mountains front you, face to face.
 But courage; for around that boisterous brook
 The mountains have all opened out themselves,
 And made a hidden valley of their own No habitation can be seen, but they 10 Who journey thither find themselves alone With a few sheep, with rocks and stones, and kites That overhead are sailing in the sky
 It is in truth an utter solitude.
 Nor should I have made mention of this dell 15 But for one object which you might pass by, Might see and notice not Beside the brook Appears a straggling heap of unhewn stones!
 And to that simple object appertains
 A story—unenriched with strange events, 20 Yet not unfit, I deem, for the fireside, Or for the summer shade It was the first Of those domestic tales that spake to me
 Of shepherds, dwellers in the valleys, men Whom I already loved,—not verily 25 For their own sakes, but for the fields and hills Where was their occupation and abode
 And hence this tale, while I was yet a boy Careless of books, yet having felt the power Of Nature, by the gentle agency 30 Of natural objects, led me on to feel For passions that were not my own, and think (At random and imperfectly indeed)
 On man, the heart of man, and human life
 Therefore, although it be a history 35 Homely and rude, I will relate the same For the delight of a few natural hearts,
 And, with yet fonder feeling, for the sake Of youthful poets, who among these hills
 Will be my second self when I am gone 40 Upon the forest-side in Grasmere Vale There dwelt a shepherd. Michael was his name,
 An old man, stout of heart, and strong of limb
 His bodily frame had been from youth to age
 Of an unusual strength: his mind was keen,
 45 Intense, and frugal, apt for all affairs,
 And in his shepherd's calling he was prompt
 And watchful more than ordinary men.
 Hence had he learned the meaning of all winds,

Of blasts of every tone; and oftentimes,
 50 When others heeded not, he heard the south
 Make subterraneous music, like the noise
 Of bagpipes on distant Highland hills
 The shepherd, at such warning, of his flock
 Bethought him, and he to himself would say, 55 "The winds are now devising work for me!"
 And, truly, at all times, the storm, that drives
 The traveller to a shelter, summoned him
 Up to the mountains: he had been alone
 Amid the heart of many thousand mists, 60 That came to him, and left him, on the heights.
 So lived he till his eightieth year was past.
 And grossly that man errs, who should suppose
 That the green valleys, and the streams and rocks,
 Were things indifferent to the shepherd's thoughts
 65 Fields, where with cheerful spirits he had breathed
 The common air, hills, which with vigorous step
 He had so often climbed, which had impressed
 So many incidents upon his mind
 Of hardship, skill or courage, joy or fear, 70 Which, like a brook, preserved the memory
 Of the dumb animals, whom he had saved,
 Had fed or sheltered, linking to such acts
 The certainty of honorable gain;
 Those fields, those hills—what could they less?—had laid 75 Strong hold on his affections, were to him
 A pleasurable feeling of blind love,
 The pleasure which there is in life itself
 His days had not been passed in single-ness His helpmate was a comely matron, old—80 Though younger than himself full twenty years She was a woman of a stirring life, Whose heart was in her house: two wheels she had
 Of antique form, this large, for spinning wool;
 That small, for flax; and, if one wheel had rest, 85 It was because the other was at work
 The pair had but one inmate in their house, An only child, who had been born to them When Michael, telling o'er his years, began

- To deem that he was old,—in shepherd's phrase,
90 With one foot in the grave. This only son, With two brave sheep-dogs tried in many a storm,
The one of an inestimable worth,
Made all their household I may truly say,
That they were as a proverb in the vale 95 For endless industry. When day was gone,
And from their occupations out of doors
The son and father were come home, even
then,
Their labor did not cease; unless when all Turned to the cleanly supper-board, and
there,
100 Each with a mess of pottage and skimmed milk,
Sat round the basket piled with oaten cakes,
And their plain home-made cheese. Yet when the meal Was ended, Luke (for so the son was named)
And his old father both betook themselves 105 To such convenient work as might employ Their hands by the fireside, perhaps to card
Wool for the housewife's spindle, or repair
Some injury done to sickle, flail, or scythe,
Or other implement of house or field 110 Down from the ceiling, by the chim-ney's edge,
That in our ancient uncouth country style With huge and black projection over-browed
Large space beneath, as duly as the light Of day grew dim the housewife hung a lamp,
115 An aged utensil, which had performed Service beyond all others of its kind Early at evening did it burn—and late,
Surviving comrade of uncounted hours, Which, going by from year to year, had
found,
120 And left, the couple neither gay perhaps Nor cheerful, yet with objects and with hopes,
Living a life of eager industry.
And now, when Luke had reached his eighteenth year,
There by the light of this old lamp they sate,
125 Father and son, while far into the night
The housewife plied her own peculiar work, Making the cottage through the silent hours Murmur as with the sound of summer flies.
- This light was famous in its neighborhood, 130 And was a public symbol of the life That thrifty pair had lived. For, as it chanced,
Their cottage on a plot of rising ground Stood single, with large prospect, north and south,
High into Easedale, up to Dunmail-Raise, 135 And westward to the village near the lake,
And from this constant light, so regular,
And so far seen, the house itself, by all Who dwelt within the limits of the vale, Both old and young, was named THE EVENING STAR
- Thus living on through such a length
of years, 140 The shepherd, if he loved himself, must needs
Have loved his helpmate, but to Michael's heart
This son of his old age was yet more
dear—
Less from instinctive tenderness, the same 145 Fond spirit that blindly works in the blood of all—
Than that a child, more than all other gifts
That earth can offer to declining man, Brings hope with it, and forward-looking
thoughts,
And stirrings of inquietude, when they 150 By tendency of nature needs must fail Exceeding was the love he bare to him, His heart and his heart's joy! For often-
times
Old Michael, while he was a babe in arms,
Had done him female service; not alone 155 For pastime and delight, as is the use Of fathers, but with patient mind enforced
To acts of tenderness, and he had rocked His cradle, as with a woman's gentle hand.
- And in a later time, ere yet the boy 160 Had put on boy's attire, did Michael love, Albeit of a stern unbending mind,
To have the young one in his sight, when he Wrought in the field, or on his shepherd's stool Sate with a fettered sheep before him stretched 165 Under the large old oak, that near his door Stood single, and, from matchless depth of shade,
Chosen for the shearer's covert from the
sun,
Thence in our rustic dialect was called THE CLIPPING TREE, a name which yet it bears.

170 There, while they two were sitting in the shade,
 With others round them, earnest all and blithe,
 Would Michael exercise his heart with looks Of fond correction and reproof bestowed Upon the child, if he disturbed the sheep 175 By catching at their legs, or with his shouts Scared them, while they lay still beneath the shears.

And when by Heaven's good grace the boy grew up
 A healthy lad, and earned in his cheek
 Two steady roses that were five years old, 180 Then Michael from a winter coppice cut With his own hand a sapling, which he hooped
 With iron, making it throughout in all Due requisites a perfect shepherd's staff,
 And gave it to the boy, wherewith equipt 185 He as a watchman oftentimes was placed At gate or gap, to stem or turn the flock,
 And, to his office prematurely called,
 There stood the urelum, as you will divine, Something between a hindrance and a help, 190 And for this cause not always, I believe, Receiving from his father line of praise, Though nought was left undone which staff, or voice, (Or looks, or threatening gestures, could perform

But soon as Luke, full ten years old, could stand 195 Against the mountain blasts, and to the heights,
 Not fearing toil, nor length of weary ways, He with his father daily went, and they Were as companions, why should I relate That objects which the shepherd loved before 200 Were dearer now? that from the boy there came Feelings and emanations—things which were Light to the sun and music to the wind;
 And that the old man's heart seemed born
 again?

Thus in his father's sight the boy grew up.
 205 And now, when he had reached his eighteenth year,
 He was his comfort and his daily hope.

While in this sort the simple household lived

From day to day, to Michael's ear there came

Distressful tidings. Long before the time 210 Of which I speak, the shepherd had been bound

In surety for his brother's son, a man
 Of an industrious life, and ample means.
 But unforeseen misfortunes suddenly Had prest upon him; and old Michael now 215 Was summoned to discharge the forfeiture, A grievous penalty, but little less Than half his substance This unlooked-for claim,

At the first hearing, for a moment took More hope out of his life than he supposed

220 That any old man ever could have lost.
 As soon as he had armed himself with
 strength

To look his trouble in the face, it seemed The shepherd's sole resource to sell at once A portion of his patrimonial fields

225 Such was his first resolve; he thought
 again,

And his heart failed him. "Isabel," said
 he,

Two evenings after he had heard the news,
 "I have been toiling more than seventy
 years,

And in the open sunshine of God's love 230 Have we all lived, yet, if these fields of ours

Should pass into a stranger's hand, I think That I could not be quiet in my grave.

Our lot is a hard lot; the sun himself Has scarcely been more diligent than I;

235 And I have lived to be a fool at last
 To my own family An evil man

That was, and made an evil choice, if he Were false to us; and, if he were not false, There are ten thousand to whom loss like this

240 Had been no sorrow I forgive him,—but 'Twere better to be dumb than to talk thus

"When I began, my purpose was to
 speak

Of remedies and of a cheerful hope Our Luke shall leave us, Isabel, the land 245 Shall not go from us, and it shall be free.
 He shall possess it, free as is the wind That passes over it We have, thou know'st,

Another kinsman—he will be our friend
 In this distress He is a prosperous man.
 250 Thriving in trade—and Luke to him shall go,

And with his kinsman's help and his own thrift

- He quickly will repair this loss, and then He may return to us. If here he stay, What can be done? Where every one is poor,
 What can be gained?"
- 255 At this the old man paused,
 And Isabel sat silent, for her mind Was busy, looking back into past times.
 "There's Richard Bateman," thought she to herself,
- 260 "He was a parish-boy—at the church-door They made a gathering for him, shillings, pence,
 And halfpennies, wherewith the neighbors bought A basket, which they filled with pedlar's
 wares;
 And, with this basket on his arm, the lad Went up to London, found a master there, 265 Who, out of many, chose the trusty boy
 To go and overlook his merchandise Beyond the seas, where he grew wondrous rich,
 And left estates and monies to the poor,
 And, at his birth-place, built a chapel floored
- 270 With marble, which he sent from foreign lands."
- These thoughts, and many others of like sort,
 Passed quickly through the mind of Isabel,
 And her face brightened. The old man was glad,
 And thus resumed—"Well, Isabel! this scheme
- 275 These two days has been meat and drink
 to me.
 Far more than we have lost is left us yet.
 —We have enough—I wish indeed that I Were younger,—but this hope is a good hope.
 Make ready Luke's best garments, of the best
- 280 Buy for him more, and let us send him
 forth
 Tomorrow, or the next day, or tonight.
 —If he could go, the boy should go to-
 night"
- Here Michael ceased, and to the fields went forth
 With a light heart. The housewife for five days
- 285 Was restless morn and night, and all day long Wrought on with her best fingers to prepare
 Things needful for the journey of her son
- But Isabel was glad when Sunday came To stop her in her work: for, when she lay 290 By Michael's side, she through the last two nights Heard him, how he was troubled in his
 sleep:
 And when they rose at morning she could see
 That all his hopes were gone. That day at noon
 She said to Luke, while they two by themselves
- 295 Were sitting at the door, "Thou must not go:
 We have no other child but thee to lose,
 None to remember—do not go away,
 For if thou leave thy father he will die." The youth made answer with a jocund
 voice,
- 300 And Isabel, when she had told her fears, Recovered heart. That evening her best fare
 Did she bring forth, and all together sat Luke happy people round a Christmas fire
- With daylight Isabel resumed her work, 305 And all the ensuing week the house appeared
 As cheerful as a grove in spring at length
 The expected letter from their kinsman
 came,
 With kind assurances that he would do His utmost for the welfare of the boy, 310 To which, requests were added, that forthwith
 He might be sent to him. Ten times or
 more
 The letter was read over, Isabel Went forth to show it to the neighbors
 round;
 Nor was there at that time on English
 land
- 315 A prouder heart than Luke's. When Isabel Had to her house returned, the old man said,
 "He shall depart tomorrow." To this word
 The housewife answered, talking much of things
 Which, if at such short notice he should go, 320 Would surely be forgotten. But at length She gave consent, and Michael was at ease
- Near the tumultuous brook of Green-head Ghyll,
 In that deep valley, Michael had designed To build a sheepfold; and, before he heard 325 The tidings of his melancholy loss, For this same purpose he had gathered up

- A heap of stones, which by the streamlet's edge
Lay thrown together, ready for the work. 365 With Luke that evening hitherward he walked:
- 330 And soon as they had reached the place
he stopped,
And thus the old man spake to him:—
“My son, Tomorrow thou wilt leave me: with full
heart
I look upon thee, for thou art the same
That wert a promise to me ere thy birth, 335 And all thy life hast been my daily joy.
I will relate to thee some little part Of our two histories, 'twill do thee good When thou art from me, even if I should tough
On things thou canst not know of.—After thou
- 340 First cam'st into the world—as oft befalls
To new-born infants—thou didst sleep
away
Two days, and blessings from thy father's tongue
Then fell upon thee. Day by day passed
on,
And still I loved thee with increasing love.
345 Never to living ear came sweeter sounds Than when I heard thee by our own fireside First uttering, without words, a natural
tune;
While thou, a feeding babe, didst in thy
joy
Sing at thy mother's breast. Month followed month,
350 And in the open fields my life was passed And on the mountains, else I think that thou Hadst been brought up upon thy father's knees.
But we were playmates, Luke: among these hills,
As well thou knowest, in us the old and young 355 Have played together, nor with me didst
thou Lack any pleasure which a boy can
know”
Luke had a manly heart, but at these words
He ~~robbed~~ aloud The old man grasped
his hand,
And said, “Nay, do not take it so—I see 360 That these are things of which I need not speak.
—Even to the utmost I have been to thee
A kind and a good father: and herein
I but repay a gift which I myself Received at others' hands; for, though now old Beyond the common life of man, I still Remember them who loved me in my
youth.
Both of them sleep together: here they lived,
As all their forefathers had done, and,
when
At length their time was come, they were not loth
370 To give their bodies to the family mould
I wished that thou shouldst live the life they lived,
But 'tis a long time to look back, my son,
And see so little gain from threescore years.
These fields were burthened when they came to me;
375 Till I was forty years of age, not more Than half of my inheritance was mine.
I toiled and toiled; God blessed me in my work,
And till these three weeks past the land was free.
—It looks as if it never could endure 380 Another master Heaven forgive me, Luke,
If I judge ill for thee, but it seems good That thou shouldst go.”
At this the old man paused, Then, pointing to the stones near which they stood,
Thus, after a short silence, he resumed 385 “This was a work for us; and now, my son, It is a work for me. But, lay one stone—Here, lay it for me, Luke, with thine own hands
Nay, boy, be of good hope;—we both may
live
To see a better day At eighty-four 390 I still am strong and hale;—do thou thy
part;
I will do mine.—I will begin again With many tasks that were resigned to
thee
Up to the heights, and in among the
storms,
Will I without thee go again, and do 395 All works which I was wont to do alone, Before I knew thy face—Heaven bless thee, boy!
Thy heart these two weeks has been beating fast
With many hopes; it should be so—yes—
yes—
I knew that thou couldst never have a wish 400 To leave me, Luke: thou hast been bound
to me

Only by links of love: when thou art gone,
 What will be left to us!—But I forget My purposes. Lay now the corner-stone, As I requested; and hereafter, Luke, 405 When thou art gone away, should evil men
 Be thy companions, think of me, my son,
 And of this moment; hither turn thy
 thoughts,
 And God will strengthen thee amid all fear
 And all temptation, Luke, I pray that thou 410 May'st bear in mind the life thy fathers lived,
 Who, being innocent, did for that cause Bestir them in good deeds. Now, fare thee well—
 When thou return'st, thou in this place wilt see
 A work which is not here: a covenant 415 'Twill be between us, but, whatever fate Befall thee, I shall love thee to the last,
 And bear thy memory with me to the grave "

The shepherd ended here, and Luke stooped down,
 And, as his father had requested, laid 420 The first stone of the sheepfold At the sight
 The old man's grief broke from him, to his heart
 He pressed his son, he kissed him and wept;
 And to the house together they returned —Hushed was that house in peace, or seeming peace, 425 Ere the night fell—with morrow's dawn
 the boy
 Began his journey, and, when he had reached
 The public way, he put on a bold face,
 And all the neighbors, as he passed their doors,
 Came forth with wishes and with farewell prayers,
 430 That followed him till he was out of sight

A good report did from their kinsman
 come,
 Of Luke and his well-doing and the boy Wrote loving letters, full of wondrous news,
 Which, as the housewife phrased it, were throughout,
 435 "The prettiest letters that were ever seen."
 Both parents read them with rejoicing
 hearts.
 So, many months passed on and once
 again

The shepherd went about his daily work With confident and cheerful thoughts; and
 now 440 Sometimes when he could find a leisure
 hour
 He to that valley took his way, and there Wrought at the sheepfold. Meantime Luke began
 To slacken in his duty, and, at length,
 He in the dissolute city gave himself 445 To evil courses: ignominy and shame Fell on him, so that he was driven at last
 To seek a hiding place beyond the seas

There is a comfort in the strength of
 love;
 'Twill make a thing endurable, which else 450 Would upset the brain, or break the
 heart.
 I have conversed with more than one who well
 Remember the old man, and what he was Years after he had heard this heavy news His bodily frame had been from youth to
 age
 455 Of an unusual strength Among the rocks He went, and still looked up to sun and
 cloud,
 And listened to the wind, and, as before,
 Performed all kinds of labor for his sheep,
 And for the land, his small inheritance 460 And to that hollow dell from time to time Did he repair, to build the fold of which His flock had need 'Tis not forgotten
 yet
 The pity which was then in every heart
 For the old man—and 'tis believed by all 465 That many and many a day he thither went,
 And never lifted up a single stone

There, by the sheepfold, sometimes was he seen
 Sitting alone, or with his faithful dog.
 Then old, beside him, lying at his feet 470 The length of full seven years, from time to time,
 He at the building of this sheepfold
 wrought,
 And left the work unfinished when he died.
 Three years, or little more, did Isabel Survive her husband at her death the estate 475 Was sold, and went into a stranger's hand.
 The cottage which was named THE EVE-NING STAR
 Is gone—the ploughshare has been through
 the ground
 On which it stood; great changes have been wrought

In all the neighborhood:—yet the oak is left 480 That grew beside their door; and the remains Of the unfinished sheepfold may be seen Beside the boisterous brook of Green-head Ghyll.

IT WAS AN APRIL MORNING

1800

1800

It was an April morning—fresh and clear
 The rivulet, delighting in its strength, Ran with a young man's speed, and yet
 the voice
 Of waters which the winter had supplied 5 Was softened down into a vernal tone
 The spirit of enjoyment and desire,
 And hopes and wishes, from all living things Went circling, like a multitude of sounds
 The budding groves seemed eager to urge
 on 10 The steps of June; as if their various hues Were only hindrances that stood between Them and their object—but, meanwhile, prevailed
 Such an entire contentment in the air
 That every naked ash, and tardy tree 15 Yet leafless, showed as if the countenance With which it looked on this delightful day Were native to the summer—'t'p the brook
 I roamed in the confusion of my heart, Alive to all things and forgetting all 20 At length I to a sudden turning came In this continuous glen, where down a rock
 The stream, so ardent in its course before Sent forth such sallies of glad sound, that all Which I till then had heard appeared the voice 25 Of common pleasure, beast and bird, the lamb,
 The shepherd's dog, the linnet and the thrush,
 Vied with this waterfall, and made a song Which, while I listened, seemed like the wild growth
 Or like some natural produce of the air, 30 That could not cease to be. Green leaves were here;
 But 'twas the foliage of the rocks—the birch,
 The yew, the holly, and the bright green
 thorn,
 With hanging islands of resplendent furze—
 And on a summit, distant a short space, 35 By any who should look beyond the dell
 A single mountain-cottage might be seen
 I gazed and gazed, and to myself I said,

“Our thoughts at least are ours; and this wild nook,

My Emma,¹ I will dedicate to thee.”

40 —Soon did the spot become my other
 home,

My dwelling, and my out-of-doors abode.
 And of the shepherds who have seen me
 there,

To whom I sometimes in our idle talk
 Have told this fancy, two or three, perhaps, 15 Years after we are gone and in our graves, When they have cause to speak of this wild place,

May call it by the name of EMMA'S DELL.

'TIS SAID THAT SOME HAVE DIED FOR LOVE

1800

1800

'Tis said that some have died for love:
 And here and there a churchyard grave is found

In the cold north's unhallowed ground, Because the wretched man himself had slain,

5 His love was such a grievous pain.
 And there is one whom I five years have known,

He dwells alone
 Upon Helvellyn's side
 He loved—the pretty Barbara died,

10 And thus he makes his moan Three years had Barbara in her grave been laid
 When thus his moan he made

“Oh, move, thou Cottage, from behind that oak!”

On let the aged tree uprooted lie, 15 That in some other way yon smoke
 May mount into the sky!

The clouds pass on, they from the heavens depart

I look—the sky is empty space,
 I know not what I trace, 20 But when I cease to look, my hand is on my heart.

“O! what a weight is in these shades!
 Ye Leaves,

That murmur once so dear, when will it cease?

Your sound my heart of rest bereaves,
 It robs my heart of peace.

25 Thou Thrush, that singest loud—and loud and free,

Into yon row of willows flit,
 Upon that alder sit;

Or sing another song, or choose another
 tree

"Roll back, sweet Rill' back to thy mountain-bounds,
 30 And there forever be thy waters chained'
 For thou dost haunt the air with sounds
 That cannot be sustained,
 If still beneath that pine-tree's ragged bough
 Headlong yon waterfall must come, 35 Oh let it then be dumb' Be anything, sweet Rill, but that which thou art now

"Thou Eglantine, so bright with sunny
 showers,
 Proud as a rainbow spanning half the vale,
 Thou one fair shrub, oh! shed thy flowers, 40 And stir not in the gale.
 For thus to see thee nodding in the air,
 To see thy arch thus stretch and bend,
 Thus rise and thus descend,— Disturbs me till the sight is more than I can bear "

45 The man who makes this feverish complaint Is one of giant stature, who could dance Equipped from head to foot in iron mail
 Ah gentle Love! if ever thought was thine
 To store up kindred hours for me, thy face 50 Turn from me, gentle Love! nor let me walk
 Within the sound of Emma's voice, nor
 know
 Such happiness as I have known today

THE EXCURSION

1795-1814 1814

From Book I THE WANDERER
 1795-1801 1814

'Twas summer, and the sun had mounted
 high Southward the landscape indistinctly glared
 Through a pale steam, but all the northern downs,
 In clearest air ascending, showed far off 5 A surface dappled o'er with shadows flung From brooding clouds, shadows that lay in spots
 Determined and unmoved, with steady beams
 Of bright and pleasant sunshine interposed,
 To him most pleasant who on soft cool
 moss
 10 Extends his careless limbs along the front Of some huge cave, whose rocky ceiling casts
 A twilight of its own, an ample shade,

Where the wren warbles, while the dreaming man,
 Half conscious of the soothing melody, 15 With side-long eye looks out upon the
 scene,
 By power of that impending covert,
 thrown
 To finer distance Mine was at that hour Far other lot, yet with good hope that soon I'nder a shade as grateful I should find 20 Rest, and be welcomed there to livelier joy.
 Across a bare, wide Common I was toiling With languid steps that by the slippery turf
 Were baffled; nor could my weak arm disperse
 The host of insects gathering round my
 face,
 25 And ever with me as I paced along

Upon that open moorland stood a grove.
 The wished-for port to which my course was bound Thither I came, and there, amid the
 gloom
 Spread by a brotherhood of lofty elms, 30 Appeared a roofless hut, four naked walls That stared upon each other!—I looked
 round,
 And to my wish and to my hope espied
 The friend I sought, a man of reverend
 age,
 But stout and hale, for travel unimpaired 35 There was he seen upon the cottage-bench, Recumbent in the shade, as if asleep,
 An iron-pointed staff lay at his side

Supine the Wanderer lay.

His eyes as if in drowsiness half shut, 40 The shadows of the breezy elms above Dappling his face He had not heard the
 sound
 Of my approaching steps, and in the shade Unnoticed did I stand some minutes' space At length I hailed him, seeing that his hat 45 Was moist with water-drops, as if the rain
 Had newly scooped a running stream. He rose,
 And ere our lively greeting into peace Had settled, " 'Tis," said I, "a burning
 day.
 My lips are parched with thirst, but you, it seems,
 450 Have somewhere found relief " He, at the word,
 Pointing towards a sweet-briar, bade me
 climb

- The fence where that aspiring shrub⁴⁹⁰ looked out Upon the public way. It was a plot Of garden ground run wild, its matted weeds ⁴⁶⁵ Marked with the steps of those, whom, as they passed,
 The gooseberry trees that shot in long lank slips,
 Or currants, hanging from their leafless stems,
 In scanty strings, had tempted to o'erleap The broken wall I looked around, and
 there, ⁴⁶⁰ Where two tall hedge-rows of thick alder boughs
 Joined in a cold damp nook, espied a well Shrouded with willow-flowers and plumy fern
 My thirst I slaked, and, from the cheerless spot
 Withdrawing, straightway to the shade returned ⁴⁶⁵ Where sat the old man on the cottage-
 bench,
 And, while, beside him, with uncovered
 head,
 I yet was standing, freely to respire,
 And cool my temples in the fanning air, Thus did he speak "I see around me
 here ⁴⁷⁰ Things which you cannot see we die, my
 friend,
 Not we alone, but that which each man loved
 And prized in his peculiar nook of earth Dies with him, or is changed and very soon
 Even of the good is no memorial left ⁴⁷⁵ —The poets, in their elegies and songs Lamenting the departed, call the groves, They call upon the hills and streams to mourn,
 And senseless rocks, nor idly, for they
 speak.
 In these their invocations, with a voice ⁴⁸⁰ Obedient to the strong creative power Of human passion Sympathies there are More tranquil, yet perhaps of kindred
 birth,
 That steal upon the meditative mind,
 And grow with thought Beside yon spring I stood, ⁴⁸⁵ And eved its waters till we seemed to feel One sadness, they and I For them a bond Of brotherhood is broken time has be When, every day, the touch of human hand Dislodged the natural sleep that binds them up
- In mortal stillness, and they ministered To human comfort Stooping down to drink,
 Upon the slimy foot-stone I espied
 The useless fragment of a wooden bowl, Green with the moss of years, and subject only ⁴⁹⁵ To the soft handling of the elements There let it be—how foolish are such
 thoughts!
 Forgive them,—never—never did my steps Approach this door but she who dwelt within A daughter's welcome gave me, and I loved her ⁵⁰⁰ As my own child Oh, sn! the good die
 first,
 And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust
 Burn to the socket Many a passenger Hath blessed poor Margaret for her gentle looks,
 When she upheld the cool refreshment drawn ⁵⁰⁵ From that forsaken spring, and no one came
 But he was welcome, no one went away But that it seemed she loved him She is
 dead,
 The light extinguished of her lonely hut,
 The hut itself abandoned to decay, ⁵¹⁰ And she forgotten in the quiet grave.

 "I speak," continued he, "of one whose stock
 Of virtues bloomed beneath this lowly roof
 She was a woman of a steady mind, Tender and deep in her excess of love, ⁵¹⁵ Not speaking much, pleased rather with the joy
 Of her own thoughts by some especial
 care
 Her temper had been trained, as if to make A being, who by adding love to peace Might live on earth a life of happiness ⁵²⁰ Her wedded partner lacked not on his side
 The humble worth that satisfied her heart Frugal, affectionate, sober, and withal Keenly industrious She with pride would tell
 That he was often seated at his loom, ⁵²⁵ In summer, ere the mower was abroad
 Among the dewy grass,—in early spring, Ere the last star had vanished—They who passed
 At evening, from behind the garden fence Might hear his busy spade, which he would ply, ⁵³⁰ After his daily work, until the light

- Had failed, and every leaf and flower were lost In the dark hedges. So their days were spent
In peace and comfort; and a pretty boy Was their best hope, next to the God in heaven.
- 535 "Not twenty years ago, but you I think Can scarcely bear it now in mind, there
came
Two blighting seasons, when the fields were left With half a harvest It pleased Heaven to add
A worse affliction in the plague of war 540 This happy land was stricken to the heart!
A wanderer then among the cottages,
I, with my freight of winter lament, saw
The hardships of that season many rich Sank down, as in a dream, among the poor, 545 And of the poor did many cease to be,
And then place knew them not. Meanwhile, abridged
Of daily comforts, gladly reconciled
To numerous self-denials, Margaret Went struggling on through those calamitous
years 550 With cheerful hope, until the second autumn,
When her life's helpmate on a sick-bed lay.
Smitten with perilous fever In disease He lingered long, and, when his strength
returned,
He found the little he had stored, to meet 555 The hour of accident or crippling age, Was all consumed. A second infant now Was added to the troubles of a time Laden, for them and all of their degree,
With care and sorrow: shoals of artisans 560 From ill-requited labor turned adrift Sought daily bread from public charity, They, and their wives and children—happier far Could they have lived as do the little birds That peck along the hedge-rows, or the kite
565 That makes her dwelling on the mountain rocks!
- "A sad reverse it was for him who long Had filled with plenty, and possessed in peace,
This lonely cottage. At the door he stood,
And whistled many a snatch of merry tunes 570 That had no mirth in them; or with his knife Carved uncouth figures on the heads of sticks—
- Then, not less idly, sought, through every nook
In house or garden, any casual work
Of use or ornament; and with a strange, 575 Amusing, yet uneasy, novelty, He mingled, where he might, the various tasks
Of summer, autumn, winter, and of spring.
But this endured not; his good humor soon Became a weight in which no pleasure was: 580 And poverty brought on a petted mood
And a sore temper: day by day he drooped, And he would leave his work—and to the town
Would turn without an errand his slack
steps;
Or wander here and there among the fields.
585 One while he would speak lightly of his babes,
And with a cruel tongue at other times
He tossed them with a false unnatural joy
And 'twas a useful thing to see the looks Of the poor innocent children "Every
smile," 590 Said Margaret to me, here beneath these trees,
'Made my heart bleed' "
- At this the Wanderer paused;
And, looking up to those enormous elms, He said, "'Tis now the hour of deepest
noon
At this still season of repose and peace, 595 This hour when all things which are not at rest
Are cheerful, while this multitude of flies
With tuneful hum is filling all the air, Why should a tear be on an old man's cheek?
Why should we thus, with an untoward
mind,
600 And in the weakness of humanity, From natural wisdom turn our hearts
away;
To natural comforts shut our eyes and
ears;
And, feeding on disquiet, thus disturb The calm of nature with our restless
thoughts?"
- 605 He spake with somewhat of a solemn tone:
But, when he ended, there was in his face Such easy cheerfulness, a look so mild,
That for a little time it stole away
All recollection; and that simple tale 610 Passed from my mind like a forgotten
sound.
A while on trivial things we held discourse, To me soon tasteless. In my own despite,
I thought of that poor woman as of one

- Whom I had known and loved. He had rehearsed
- 615 Her homely tale with such familiar power, With such an active countenance, an eye
So busy, that the things of which he spake Seemed present; and, attention now relaxed,
A heart-felt chilliness crept along my veins
- 620 I rose, and, having left the breezy shade, Stood drinking comfort from the warmer sun,
That had not cheered me long—ere, looking round Upon that tranquil ruin, I returned,
And begged of the old man that, for my sake,
- 625 He would resume his story
- He replied,
- “It were a wantonness, and would demand Severe reproof, if we were men whose hearts Could hold vain dalliance with the misery Even of the dead, contented thence to draw
- 630 A momentary pleasure, never marked By reason, barren of all future good But we have known that there is often found In mournful thoughts, and always might be found,
A power to virtue friendly, were’t not so,
- 635 I am a dreamer among men, indeed An idle dreamer! ’Tis a common tale,
An ordinary sorrow of man’s life,
A tale of silent suffering, hardly clothed In bodily form—but without further bidding
- 640 I will proceed
- While thus it fared with them,
To whom this cottage, till those hapless years,
Had been a blessed home, it was my chance To travel in a country far remote,
And when these lofty elms once more appeared
- 645 What pleasant expectations lured me on O’er the flat Common!—With quick step I reached The threshold, lifted with light hand the latch;
But, when I entered, Margaret looked at me A little while, then turned her head away
- 650 Speechless,—and, sitting down upon a chair, Wept bitterly. I wist not what to do, Nor how to speak to her. Poor wretch! at last She rose from off her seat, and then,—O sir!
- I cannot tell how she pronounced my name—
- 655 With fervent love, and with a face of grief Unutterably helpless, and a look That seemed to cling upon me, she enquired
If I had seen her husband As she spake
A strange surprise and fear came to my heart, Nor had I power to answer ere she told That he had disappeared—not two months gone.
He left his house two wretched days had past,
And on the third, as wistfully she raised Her head from off her pillow, to look forth, Like one in trouble, for returning light, 665 Within her chamber casement she espied
A folded paper, lying as if placed To meet her waking eyes This tremblingly
She opened—found no writing, but beheld 670 Pieces of money carefully enclosed, Silver and gold. ‘I shuddered at the sight,’
Said Margaret, ‘for I knew it was his hand That must have placed it there, and ere that day Was ended, that long anxious day, I learned, 675 From one who by my husband had been sent,
With the sad news, that he had joined a troop Of soldiers, going to a distant land.
—He left me thus—he could not gather heart
To take a farewell of me, for he feared 680 That I should follow with my babes, and sunk Beneath the misery of that wandering life’
- “This tale did Margaret tell with many tears:
And, when she ended, I had little power To give her comfort, and was glad to take 685 Such words of hope from her own mouth as served To cheer us both But long we had not talked Ere we built up a pile of better thoughts.
And with a brighter eye she looked around
As if she had been shedding tears of joy.
690 We parted—’Twas the time of early spring;
I left her busy with her garden tools;
And well remember, o’er that fence she looked,
And, while I paced along the foot-way path, Called out, and sent a blessing after me, 695 With tender cheerfulness, and with a voice That seemed the very sound of happy thoughts.

- "I roved o'er many a hill and many a dale,
 With my accustomed load; in heat and cold,
 Through many a wood and many an open ground, 700 In sunshine and in shade, in wet and fair, Drooping or blithe of heart, as might befall,
 My best companions now the driving winds,
 And now the 'trotting brooks'¹ and whispering trees,
 And now the music of my own sad steps, 705 With many a short-lived thought that passed between,
 And disappeared
 I journeyed back this way.
 When, in the warmth of midsummer, the wheat Was yellow, and the soft and bladed grass, Springing afresh, had o'er the hay-field spread 710 Its tender verdure At the door arrived.
 I found that she was absent. In the shade, Where now we sit, I waited her return.
 Her cottage, then a cheerful object, wore Its customary look,—only, it seemed, 715 The honeysuckle, crowding round the porch, Hung down in heavier tufts, and that bright weed,
 The yellow stone-crop, suffered to take root Along the window's edge, profusely grew, Blinding the lower panes I turned aside.
 720 And strolled into her garden It appeared To lag behind the season, and had lost Its pride of neatness Daisy-flowers and thrift Had broken their trim border-lines, and straggled O'er paths they used to deck carnations once 725 Prized for surpassing beauty, and no less For the peculiar pains they had required, Declined their languid heads, wanting support
 The cumbrous bind-weed, with its wreaths and bells,
 Had twined about her two small rows of peas, 730 And dragged them to the earth.
 Ere this an hour
 Was wasted —Back I turned my restless steps.
 A stranger passed; and, guessing whom I sought,
 He said that she was used to ramble far —
 The sun was sinking in the west; and now 735 I sat with sad impatience. From within Her solitary infant cried aloud;
 Then, like a blast that dies away self-stilled,
 The voice was silent. From the bench I rose,
 But neither could divert nor soothe my thoughts 740 The spot, though fair, was very desolate—
 The longer I remained, more desolate And, looking round me, now I first observed
 The corner stones, on either side the porch,
 With dull red stains discolored, and stuck o'er 745 With tufts and hairs of wool, as if the sheep, That fed upon the Common, thither came familiarly, and found a couching-place Even at her threshold Deeper shadows fell From these tall elms, the cottage-clock struck eight,— 750 I turned, and saw her distant a few steps Her face was pale and thin—her figure, too, Was changed As she unlocked the door.
 she said,
 'It grieves me you have waited here so long.
 But, in good truth, I've wandered much of late, 755 And, sometimes—to my shame I speak—have need
 Of my best prayers to bring me back again.'
 While on the board she spread our evening meal,
 She told me—interrupting not the work Which gave employment to her listless hands—760 That she had parted with her elder child;
 To a kind master on a distant farm Now happily apprenticed —'I perceive You look at me, and you have cause, today
 I have been travelling far; and many days 765 About the fields I wander, knowing this Only, that what I seek I cannot find;
 And so I waste my time, for I am changed;
 And to myself,' said she, 'have done much wrong
 And to this helpless infant. I have slept 770 Weeping, and weeping have I waked, my tears Have flowed as if my body were not such As others are; and I could never die.
 But I am now in mind and in my heart
 More easy; and I hope,' said she, 'that God 775 Will give me patience to endure the things Which I behold at home.'
 It would have grieved
 Your very soul to see her Sir, I feel

- The story linger in my heart; I fear
 'Tis long and tedious; but my spirit clings 780 To that poor woman:—so familiarly Do I perceive her manner, and her look,
 And presence; and so deeply do I feel Her goodness, that, not seldom, in my walks
 A momentary trance comes over me, 785 And to myself I seem to muse on one By sorrow laid asleep, or borne away.
 A human being destined to awake To human life, or something very near To human life, when he shall come again 790 For whom she suffered. Yes, it would have grieved
 Your very soul to see her: evermore Her eyelids drooped, her eyes downward were cast,
 And, when she at her table gave me food,
 She did not look at me. Her voice was low, 795 Her body was subdued. In every act Pertaining to her house-affairs, appeared The careless stillness of a thinking mind Self-occupied, to which all outward things Are like an idle matter. Still she sighed, 800 But yet no motion of the breast was seen,
 No heaving of the heart. While by the fire
 We sat together, sighs came on my ear, I knew not why, and hardly whence they came
 "Ere my departure, to her care I gave, 805 For her son's use, some tokens of regard,
 Which with a look of welcome she received
 And I exhorted her to place her trust In God's good love, and seek his help by prayer
 I took my staff, and, when I kissed her
 babe,
 810 The tears stood in her eyes. I left her then With the best hope and comfort I could give
 She thanked me for my wish;—but for my hope
 It seemed she did not thank me
 I returned,
 And took my rounds along this road again 815 When on its sunny bank the primrose flower
 Peeped forth, to give an earnest of the
 spring,
 I found her sad and drooping: she had learned
 No tidings of her husband, if he lived, She knew not that he lived: if he were
 dead, 820 She knew not he was dead. She seemed the same
 In person and appearance; but her house Bespake a sleepy hand of negligence, The floor was neither dry nor neat, the hearth
 Was comfortless, and her small lot of books,
 825 Which, in the cottage-window, heretofore Had been piled up against the corner panes In seemly order, now, with straggling
 leaves,
 Lay scattered here and there, open or shut,
 As they had chanced to fall. Her infant babe
 830 Had from its mother caught the trick of quiet,
 And sighed among its playthings. I withdrew,
 And once again entering the garden saw,
 More plainly still, that poverty and grief Were now come nearer to her weeds defaced 835 The hardened soil, and knots of withered grass,
 No ridges there appeared of clear black mould,
 No winter greenness, of her herbs and
 flowers,
 It seemed the better part were gnawed
 away
 Or trampled into earth, a chain of straw, 840 Which had been twined about the slender stem
 Of a young apple-tree, lay at its foot,
 The bark was nibbled round by truant sheep
 —Margaret stood near, her infant in her arms,
 And, nothing that my eye was on the tree, 845 She said, 'I fear it will be dead and gone Ere Robert come again.' When to the house
 We had returned together, she enquired
 If I had any hope—but for her babe
 And for her little orphan boy, she said, 850 She had no wish to live, that she must die Of sorrow. Yet I saw the idle loom Still in its place, his Sunday garments
 hung
 Upon the self-same nail, his very staff
 Stood undisturbed behind the door.
 And when,
 855 In bleak December, I retraced this way,
 She told me that her little babe was dead,
 And she was left alone. She now, released From her maternal cares, had taken up The employment common through these wilds, and gained,
 860 By spinning hemp, a pittance for herself,
 And for this end had hired a neighbor's boy

- To give her needful help. That very time
Most willingly she put her work aside,
And walked with me along the myr road, 865 Heedless how far; and, in such piteous sort That any heart had ached to hear her, begged
That, wheresoe'er I went, I still would ask For him whom she had lost. We parted
then—
Our final parting, for from that time forth 870 Did many seasons pass ere I returned Into this tract again
- Nine tedious years,
From their first separation, nine long years,
She lingered in unquiet widowhood;
A wife and widow. Needs must it have been 875 A sore heart-wasting! I have heard, my
friend,
That in yon arbor oftentimes she sate Alone, through half the vacant Sabbath
day,
And, if a dog passed by, she still would quit
The shade, and look abroad. On this old bench
880 For hours she sate; and evermore her eye Was busy in the distance, shaping things That made her heart beat quick You see that path,
Now faint,—the grass has crept o'er its gray line,
There, to and fro, she paced through many a day 885 Of the warm summer, from a belt of hemp That girt her waist, spinning the long-drawn thread
With backward steps. Yet ever as there passed
A man whose garments showed the soldier's red,
Or crippled mendicant in soldier's garb, 890 The little child who sate to turn the wheel Ceased from his task, and she with faltering voice Made many a fond enquiry; and when they,
Whose presence gave no comfort, were gone by,
Her heart was still more sad And by yon
gate, 895 That bars the traveller's road, she often stood,
And when a stranger horseman came, the latch
Would lift, and in his face look wistfully.
Most happy, if, from aught discovered
there
Of tender feeling, she might dare repeat
- The same sad question. Meanwhile her poor but Sank to decay; for he was gone, whose
hand,
At the first nipping of October frost, Closed up each chink, and with fresh bands of straw Chequered the green-grown thatch. And so she lived 905 Through the long winter, reckless and
alone;
Until her house by frost, and thaw, and
rain,
Was sapped; and while she slept, the nightly damps
Did chill her breast, and in the stormy day Her tattered clothes were ruffled by the wind, 910 Even at the side of her own fire Yet still She loved this wretched spot, nor would for worlds
Have parted hence, and still that length of road,
And this rude bench, one torturing hope endeared,
Fast rooted at her heart and here, my
friend,— 915 In sickness she remained; and here she died;
Last human tenant of these ruined walls!"
- The old man ceased he saw that I was moved;
From that low bench, rising instinctively
I turned aside in weakness, nor had power 920 To thank him for the tale which he had told
I stood, and leaning o'er the garden wall Reviewed that woman's sufferings; and it seemed
To comfort me while with a brother's love
I blessed her in the impotence of grief.
925 Then towards the cottage I returned, and traced Fondly, though with an interest more mild,
That secret spirit of humanity
Which, 'mid the calm oblivious tendencies Of nature, 'mid her plants, and weeds, and
flowers,
930 And silent overgrowings, still survived The old man, noting this, resumed, and
said,
"My friend! enough to sorrow you have
given,
The purposes of wisdom ask no more:
Nor more would she have craved as due to one 935 Who, in her worst distress, had oftentimes felt

The unbounded might of prayer, and learned, with soul Fixed on the Cross, that consolation springs,
From sources deeper far than deepest pain, For the meek sufferer. Why then should we read

940 The forms of things with an unworthy eye?
She sleeps in the calm earth, and peace is here

I well remember that those very plumes, Those weeds, and the high spear-grass on that wall,

By mist and silent rain-drops silvered o'er, 945 As once I passed, into my heart conveyed So still an image of tranquillity,
So calm and still, and looked so beautiful Amid the uneasy thoughts which filled my
mind,

That what we feel of sorrow and despair 950 From ruin and from change, and all the grief

That passing shows of being leave behind, Appeared an idle dream, that could maintain,

Nowhere, dominion o'er the enlightened spirit

Whose meditative sympathies repose 955 Upon the breast of Faith I turned away.
And walked along my road in happiness,"

He ceased Ere long the sun declining shot

A slant and mellow radiance, which began To fall upon us, while, beneath the trees,

960 We sate on that low bench and now we
felt,

Admonished thus, the sweet hour coming
on.

A linnet warbled from those lofty elms,
A thrush sang loud, and other melodies,
At distance heard, peopled the milder air.

965 The old man rose, and, with a sprightly
men

Of hopeful preparation, grasped his staff;
Together casting then a farewell look Upon those silent walls, we left the shade,

970 And, ere the stars were visible, had reached A village-inn,—our evening resting-place.

PELION AND OSSA 1801 1815

Pelion and Ossa flourish side by side, Together in immortal books enrolled
His ancient dower Olympus hath not sold;
And that inspiring hill,¹ which "did divide

5 Into two ample horns his forehead wide,"²

¹ Parnassus.

² See Spencer's Virgil's Geog. 21 22

Shines with poetic radiance as of old;
While not an English mountain we behold
By the celestial Muses glorified.
Yet round our sea-girt shore they rise in crowds.

10 What was the great Parnassus' self to thee, Mount Skiddaw? In his natural sovereignty
Our British hill is nobler far; he shrouds His double front among Atlantic clouds And pours forth streams more sweet than Castaly.

THE SPARROW'S NEST 1801 1807

Behold, within the leafy shade,
Those bright blue eggs together laid!
On me the chance-discovered sight Gleamed like a vision of delight

5 I started—seeming to espy
The home and sheltered bed,
The sparrow's dwelling, which, hard by My father's house, in wet or dry
My sister Emmeline¹ and I 10 Together visited.

She looked at it and seemed to fear it,
Dreading, tho' wishing, to be near it.
Such heart was in her, being then
A little prattler among men.

15 The blessing of my later years Was with me when a boy.
She gave me eyes, she gave me ears;
And humble cares, and delicate fears;
A heart, the fountain of sweet tears, 20 And love, and thought, and joy

TO A BUTTERFLY 1808 1807

Stay near me—do not take thy flight!
A little longer stay in sight!

Much converse do I find in thee,
Historian of my infancy!

5 Float near me; do not yet depart!
Dead times revive in thee:
Thou bring'st, gay creature as thou art!
A solemn image to my heart,
My father's family!

10 Oh! pleasant, pleasant were the days,
The time, when in our childish plays,
My sister Emmeline¹ and I
Together chased the butterfly!

15 A very hunter did I rush Upon the prey;—with leaps and springs
I followed on from brake to bush;
But she, God love her! feared to brush
The dust from off its wings.

MY HEART LEAPS UP
1802 1807

My heart leaps up when I behold
A rainbow in the sky:
So was it when my life began;
So is it now I am a man;
5 So be it when I shall grow old,
Or let me die!
The Child is father of the Man,
And I could wish my days to be Bound each to each by natural piety.

WRITTEN IN MARCH

WHILE RESTING ON THE BRIDGE AT THE FOOT OF BROTHER'S WATER
1802 1807

The cock is crowing,
The stream is flowing,
The small birds twitter,
The lake doth glitter,
5 The green field sleeps in the sun,
The oldest and youngest Are at work with the strongest;
The cattle are grazing,
Their heads never raising.
10 There are forty feeding like one!

Like an army defeated
The snow hath retreated,
And now doth fare ill
On the top of the bare hill.
15 The ploughboy is whooping—anon—anon—There's joy in the mountains,
There's life in the fountains,
Small clouds are sailing,
Blue sky prevailing:
20 The rain is over and gone!

1802 1807

I've watched you now a full half-hour,
Self-poised upon that yellow flower,
And, little Butterfly! indeed
I know not if you sleep or feed.
5 How motionless!—not frozen seas More motionless! and then What joy awaits you, when the breeze Hath found you out among the trees,
And calls you forth again!
10 This plot of orchard-ground is ours.
My trees they are, my sister's flowers.
Here rest your wings when they are weary, Here lodge as in a sanctuary!
Come often to us, fear no wrong;
15 Sit near us on the bough!

We'll talk of sunshine and of song,
And summer days, when we were young;
Sweet childish days, that were as long As twenty days are now.

TO THE SMALL CELANDINE
1802 1807

Pansies, lilies, kingcups, daisies,
Let them live upon their praises;
Long as there's a sun that sets, Pimroses will have their glory;
5 Long as there are violets,
They will have a place in story
There's a flower that shall be mine,
'Tis the little Celandine

Eyes of some men travel far 10 For the finding of a star,
Up and down the heavens they go,
Men that keep a mighty rout!
I'm as great as they, I trow,
Since the day I found thee out, 15 Little Flower—I'll make a stir, Like a sage astronomer

Modest, yet withal an Elf Bold, and lavish of thyself, Since we needs must first have met 20 I have seen thee, high and low, Thirty years or more, and yet
'Twas a face I did not know, Thou hast now, go where I may,
Fifty greetings in a day

Ere a leaf is on a bush,
In the time before the thrush
Has a thought about her nest, Thou wilt come with half a call,
Spreading out thy glossy breast 25 Like a careless Prodigal Telling tales about the sun.
When we've little warmth, or none.

Poets, vain men in their mood!
Travel with the multitude 35 Never heed them; I ave!
That they all are wanton wooers;
But the thrifty cottager,
Who stirs little out of doors,
Joys to spy thee near her home, 40 Spring is coming, thou art come!

Comfort have thou of thy merit, Kindly, unassuming Spirit!
Careless of thy neighborhood,
Thou dost show thy pleasant face 45 On the moor, and in the wood,
In the lane;—there's not a place, Howsoever mean it be,
But 'tis good enough for thee.

Ill befall the yellow flowers, 50 Children of the flaring hours!
 Buttercups, that will be seen,
 Whether we will see or no;
 Others, too, of lofty mien,
 They have done as worldlings do, 55 Taken praise that should be thine, Little, humble Celandine

Prophet of delight and mirth, Ill-requited upon earth,
 Herald of a mighty band, 60 Of a joyous train ensuing,
 Serving at my heart's command,
 Tasks that are no tasks renewing,
 I will sing, as doth behove,
 Hymns in praise of what I love!

TO THE SAME FLOWER

1802

1807

Pleasures newly found are sweet When they lie about our feet
 February last, my heart
 First at sight of thee was glad, 5 All unheard of as thou art, Thou must needs, I think, have had,
 Celandine! and long ago,
 Praise of which I nothing know

I have not a doubt but he, 10 Whosoe'er the man might be,
 Who the first with pointed rays (Workman worthy to be sainted) Set the sign-board in a blaze,
 When the rising sun he painted, 15 Took the fancy from a glance At thy glittering countenance.

Soon as gentle breezes bring News of winter's vanishing,
 And the children build their bowers, 20 Striking 'kerchief-plots' of mould
 All about with full-blown flowers, Thick as sheep in shepherd's fold!
 With the proudest thou art there, Mantling in the tiny square.

Often have I sighed to measure
 By myself a lonely pleasure, Sighed to think I read a book
 Only read, perhaps, by me,
 Yet I long could overlook 30 Thy bright coronet and thee,
 And thy arch and witty ways,
 And thy store of other praise

Blithe of heart, from week to week Thou dost play at hide-and-seek.
 35 While the patient primrose sits 1 Plots of the size of a handkerchief

Like a beggar in the cold,
 Thou, a flower of wiser wits, Slip'st into thy sheltering hold;
 Liveliest of the vernal train 40 When ye all are out again

Drawn by what peculiar spell,
 By what charm of sight or smell,
 Does the dim-eyed curious bee, Labouring for her waxen cells, 45 Fondly settle upon thee Prized above all buds and bells Opening daily at thy side,
 By the season multiplied?

Thou art not beyond the moon, 50 But a thing "beneath our shoon."¹ Let the bold discoverer find
 In his bark the polar sea,
 Rear who will a pyramid,
 Praise it is enough for me, 55 If there be but three or four Who will love my little Flower

RESOLUTION AND INDEPENDENCE

1802

1807

There was a roaring in the wind all night;
 The rain came heavily and fell in floods,
 But now the sun is rising calm and bright,
 The birds are singing in the distant woods.
 5 Over his own sweet voice the stock-dove broods.
 The jay makes answer as the magpie chatters,
 And all the air is filled with pleasant noise of waters

All things that love the sun are out of doors.
 The sky rejoices in the morning's birth.
 10 The grass is bright with rain-drops,—on the moors
 The hare is running races in her mirth,
 And with her feet she from the plashy
 earth
 Raises a mist, that, glittering in the sun Runs with her all the way, wherever she doth run

15 I was a traveller then upon the moor.
 I saw the hare that raced about with joy,
 I heard the woods and distant waters roar.
 Or heard them not, as happy as a boy
 The pleasant season did my heart employ 20 My old remembrances went from me wholly;
 And all the ways of men, so vain and melancholy.

But, as it sometimes chanceth, from the might

- Of joy in minds that can no further go,
As high as we have mounted in delight 25 In our dejection do we sink as low;
To me that morning did it happen so,
And fears and fancies thick upon me came;
Dim sadness—and blind thoughts, I knew not, nor could name.

- I heard the skylark warbling in the sky, 30 And I bethought me of the playful hare Even such a happy child of earth am I, Even as these blissful creatures do I fare.
Far from the world I walk, and from all
care;

- But there may come another day to me—35 Solitude, pain of heart, distress, and poverty.

My whole life I have lived in pleasant
thought,
As if life's business were a summer mood,
As if all needful things would come unsought

- To genial faith, still rich in genial good.
40 But how can he expect that others should Build for him, sow for him, and at his call Love him, who for himself will take no heed at all?

I thought of Chatterton, the marvellous
Boy,
The sleepless Soul that perished in his
pride;

- 45 Of him who walked in glory and in joy Following his plough, along the mountainside.¹

By our own spirits are we deified.
We poets in our youth begin in gladness, But thereof come in the end despondency and madness.

- 50 Now, whether it were by peculiar grace,
A leading from above, a something given,
Yet it befell that, in this lonely place, When I with these untoward thoughts had striven,

- Beside a pool bare to the eye of heaven 55 I saw a man before me unawares.
The oldest man he seemed that ever wore gray hairs

- As a huge stone is sometimes seen to lie Couched on the bald top of an eminence;
Wonder to all who do the same espy, 60 By what means it could thither come, and whence;

¹ Burns

So that it seems a thing endued with sense:
Like a sea-beast crawled forth, that on a shelf

Of rock or sand reposeth, there to sun itself;

Such seemed this man, not all alive nor
dead,

- 65 Not all asleep—in his extreme old age.
His body was bent double, feet and head
'coming together in life's pilgrimage;
As if some dire constraint of pain, or rage
Of sickness felt by him in times long past, 70 A more than human weight upon his frame had cast

Himself he propped, limbs, body, and pale
face,

- Upon a long gray staff of shaven wood.
And, still as I drew near with gentle pace,
Upon the margin of that moonish¹ flood 75 Motionless as a cloud the old man stood,
That heareth not the loud winds when they call,
And moveth all together, if it move at all

- At length, himself unsettling, he the pond Stared with his staff, and fixedly did look 80 Upon the muddy water, which he coned, As if he had been reading in a book.
And now a stranger's privilege I took,
And, drawing to his side, to him did say,
"This morning gives us promise of a glorious day"

- 85 A gentle answer did the old man make.
In courteous speech which forth he slowly
drew:

And him with further words I thus bespoke,

- "What occupation do you there pursue?
This is a lonesome place for one like you" 90 Ere he replied, a flash of mild surprise Broke from the sable orbs of his yet-vivid
eyes

His words came feebly, from a feeble chest,
But each in solemn order followed each,
With something of a lofty utterance
drest—

- 95 Choice word and measured phrase, above the reach

Of ordinary men; a stately speech;
Such as grave livers do in Scotland use, Religious men, who give to God and man their dues.

¹ marshy

He told, that to these waters he had come 100 To gather leeches, being old and poor:
 Employment hazardous and wearisome!
 And he had many hardships to endure:
 From pond to pond he roamed, from moor to moor;
 Housing, with God's good help, by choice or chance, 105 And in this way he gained an honest maintenance.

The old man still stood talking by my side,
 But now his voice to me was like a stream Scarce heard; nor word from word could I divide,
 And the whole body of the man did seem 110 Like one whom I had met with in a dream, Or like a man from some far region sent,
 To give me human strength, by apt ad-monishment.

My former thoughts returned the fear that kills,
 And hope that is unwilling to be fed,
 115 Cold, pain, and labor, and all fleshly ills,
 And mighty poets in their misery dead
 —Perplexed, and longing to be comforted.
 My question eagerly did I renew,
 "How is it that you live, and what is it you do?"

120 He with a smile did then his words repeat,
 And said that, gathering leeches, far and wide
 He travelled, stirring thus about his feet
 The waters of the pools where they abide "Once I could meet with them on every
 side;
 125 But they have dwindled long by slow
 decay,
 Yet still I persevere, and find them where I may "

While he was talking thus, the lonely
 place,
 The old man's shape, and speech—all troubled me.
 In my mind's eye I seemed to see him pace
 130 About the weary moors continually,
 Wandering about alone and silently
 While I these thoughts within myself pursued,
 He, having made a pause, the same discourse renewed

And soon with this he other matter blended, 135 Cheerfully uttered, with demeanor kind.

But stately in the main; and, when he ended,
 I could have laughed myself to scorn to
 find
 In that decrepit man so firm a mind.
 "God," said I, "be my help and stay secure;
 140 I'll think of the leech-gatherer on the lonely moor!"

I GRIEVED FOR BUONAPARTÉ

1802

1802

I grieved for Buonaparté, with a vain
 And an unthinking grief! The tenderest mood
 Of that Man's mind—what can it be?
 what food
 Fed his first hopes? what knowledge could he gain?
 5 'Tis not in battles that from youth we train
 The Governor who must be wise and good,
 And temper with the steinness of the brain Thoughts motherly, and meek as womanhood
 Wisdom doth live with children round her knees.
 10 Books, leisure, perfect freedom, and the talk Man holds with week-day man in the hourly walk
 Of the mind's business these are the degrees
 By which true Sway doth mount, this is the stalk
 True Power doth grow on, and her rights are these

1807

Earth has not anything to show more fair:
 Dull would he be of soul who could pass by A sight so touching in its majesty:
 This City now doth, like a garment, wear 5 The beauty of the morning; silent, bare, Ships, towers, domes, theatres, and temples lie
 Open unto the fields, and to the sky;
 All bright and glittering in the smokeless
 air.
 Never did sun more beautifully steep 10 In his first splendor, valley, rock, or hill, Ne'er saw I, never felt, a calm so deep!
 The river glideth at his own sweet will.
 Dear God! the very houses seem asleep;
 And all that mighty heart is lying still!

COMPOSED BY THE SEA-SIDE, NEAR CALAIS, AUGUST, 1802 1802 1807

Fair Star of evening, Splendor of the west,
Star of my Country!—on 'the horizon's brink Thou hangest, stooping, as might seem, to sink
On England's bosom, yet well pleased to rest, 5 Meanwhile, and be to her a glorious crest Conspicuous to the Nations Thou, I think Shouldst be my Country's emblem, and shouldst wink,
Bright Star! with laughter on her banners, drest
In thy fresh beauty There! that dusky spot 10 Beneath thee, that is England; there she lies Blessings be on you both! one hope, one lot,
One life, one glory!—I, with many a
fear
For my dear Country, many heartfelt sighs,
Among men who do not love her, linger
here

IT IS A BEAUTEOUS EVENING, CALM
1802 1807

It is a beauteous evening, calm and free,
The holy time is quiet as a Nun Breathless with adoration, the broad sun Is sinking down in its tranquillity, 5 The gentleness of heaven broods o'er the Sea
Listen! the mighty Being is awake,
And doth with his eternal motion make A sound like thunder—everlastingly.
Dear 'Child! dear Girl, that walkest with me here,² 10 If thou appear untouched by solemn
thought,
Thy nature is not therefore less divine Thou liest in Abraham's bosom³ all the
year,
And worshipp'st at the temple's inner

ON THE EXTINCTION OF THE VENE-TIAN REPUBLIC¹
1802 1807

Once did She hold the gorgeous East in fee,
And was the safeguard of the West the worth
Of Venice did not fall below her birth, Venice, the eldest child of Liberty.
5 She was a maiden City, bright and free;
No guile seduced, no force could violate,
And, when she took unto herself a Mate,
She must espouse the everlasting Sea² And what if she had seen those glories fade,
10 Those titles vanish, and that strength
decay,
Yet shall some tribute of regret be paid
When her long life hath reached its final
day.

TO TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE
1802 1803

Toussaint, the most unhappy man of
men!
Whether the whistling rustic tend his plough
Within thy hearing, or thy head be now Pillowed in some deep dungeon's earless den,— 5 O miserable chieftain! where and when Wilt thou find patience! Yet die not, do
thou Wear rather in thy bonds a cheerful
brow.
Though fallen thyself, never to rise again, Live, and take comfort Thou hast left behind 10 Powers that will work for thee, all, earth, and skies,
There's not a breathing of the common
wind
That will forget thee; thou hast great allies;
Thy friends are exultations, agonies,
And love, and man's unconquerable mind.

¹ Venice was an independent republic, with extensive possessions in the East, from the ninth century until conquered by Napoleon, in 1797

² In 1177, the Venetians defeated the Germans in a naval battle in defence of Pope Alexander III, who gave the Doge a ring and bade him wed the Adriatic with it, as a sign of dominion over the sea. An annual ceremony was observed in which a ring was thrown into the Adriatic in token of this espousal.

COMPOSED IN THE VALLEY NEAR DOVER, ON THE DAY OF LANDING¹
1802 1807

Here, on our native soil, we breathe once
more.
The cock that crows, the smoke that curls, that sound
Of bells,—those boys who in yon meadow-
ground
In white-sleeved shirts are playing, and the roar
5 Of the waves breaking on the chalky
shore;—
All, all are English. Oft have I looked round
With joy in Kent's green vales, but never found Myself so satisfied in heart before Europe is yet in bonds,² but let that pass, 10 Thought for another moment Thou art
free,
My Country! and 'tis joy enough and pride For one hour's perfect bliss, to tread the grass
Of England once again, and hear and see,
With such a dear companion at my side

NEAR DOVER, SEPTEMBER, 1802 1807

Inland, within a hollow vale, I stood.
And saw, while sea was calm and air was
clear,
The coast of France—the coast of France how near!
Drawn almost into fightful neighborhood 7 I shrunk, for verily the barrier flood Was like a lake, or river bright and fair,
A span of waters, yet what power is there!
What mightiness for evil and for good!
Even so doth God protect us if we be 10 Virtuous and wise Winds blow, and waters roll, Strength to the brave, and Power, and Yet in themselves are nothing! One decree Spake laws to them, and said that by the

soul

Only, the Nations shall be great and free

WRITTEN IN LONDON, SEPTEMBER, 1802 1807

O friend!³ I know not which way I must look

For comfort, being, as I am, oppress'd,

¹ Wordsworth and his sister Dorothy returned from Calais, France, on August 30, 1802

² That is, to Napoleon, who had forced the Peace of Amiens in March, 1802

³ Coleridge

To think that now our life is only drest
For show; mean handiwork of craftsman, cook,

5 Or groom!—We must run glittering like a brook

In the open sunshine, or we are unblest
The wealthiest man among us is the best No grandeur now in nature or in book Delights us Rapine, avarice, expense,

10 This is idolatry; and these we adore.
Plain living and high thinking are no
more

The homely beauty of the good old cause
Is gone, our peace, our fearful innocence,
And pure religion breathing household laws

LONDON, 1802
1802 1807

Milton! thou shouldst be living at this
hour.

England hath need of thee she is a fen
Of stagnant waters' altar, sword, and pen, Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower.¹

7 Have forfeited their ancient English dower
Of inward happiness We are selfish men, Oh! raise us up, return to us again,
And give us manners, virtue, freedom,
power

Thy soul was like a star, and dwelt apart 10 Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea

Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free,
So didst thou travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness, and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay

GREAT MEN HAVE BEEN AMONG US
1802 1807

Great men have been among us, hands that penned
And tongues that uttered wisdom—better none

The later Sidney, Marvel, Harrington, Young Vane, and others who called Milton
friend

5 These moralists could act and comprehend They knew how genuine glory was put on,
Taught us how rightly a nation shone In splendor what strength was, that would not bend

But in magnanimous meekness France,
'tis strange,

10 Hath brought forth no such souls as we had then.

¹ The hall was the public dwelling of the Teutonic chieftain, and the bower the private apartments, especially of the women

Perpetual emptiness! unceasing change!
 No single volume paramount, no code,
 No master spirit, no determined road;
 But equally a want of books and men!

IT IS NOT TO BE THOUGHT OF THAT

1802 1803

It is not to be thought of that the Flood Of British freedom, which, to the open sea
 Of the world's praise, from dark antiquity Hath flowed, "with pomp of waters, un-withstood,"¹

5 Roused though it be full often to a mood
 Which spurns the check of salutary bands, That this most famous Stream in bogs and sands

Should perish; and to evil and to good Be lost forever In our halls is hung 10 Armory of the invincible Knights of old We must be free or die, who speak the tongue
 That Shakspeare spake; the faith and morals hold Which Milton held — In everything we are sprung
 Of Earth's first blood, have titles manifold

WHEN I HAVE BORNE IN MEMORY

1802 1803

When I have borne in memory what has tamed Great Nations, how ennobling thoughts
 depart
 When men change swords for ledgers, and desert
 The student's bower for gold, some fears unnamed

5 I had, my Country—am I to be blamed?
 Now, when I think of thee, and what thou art,

Verily, in the bottom of my heart,
 Of those unfilial fears I am ashamed For dearly must we prize thee, we who find 10 In thee a bulwark for the cause of men,
 And I by my affection was beguiled.
 What wonder if a poet now and then,
 Among the many movements of his mind,
 Felt for thee as a lover or a child.

TO H. C.²

SIX YEARS OLD
 1802 1807

O thou! whose fancies from afar are brought;
 Who of thy words dost make a mock apparel,

¹ Daniel, The History of the Old War, 2, 53.

² Hartley Coleridge, son of S. T. Coleridge

And fittest to unutterable thought The breeze-like motion and the self-born carol,

5 Thou faery voyager! that dost float
 In such clear water, that thy boat May rather seem To brood on air than on an earthly
 stream;

Suspended in a stream as clear as sky, 10 Where earth and heaven do make one imagery;

O blessed vision! happy child!
 Thou art so exquisitely wild,
 I think of thee with many fears For what may be thy lot in future years

15 I thought of times when Pain might be thy guest,

Lord of thy house and hospitality;
 And Grief, uneasy lover! never rest
 But when she sate within the touch of thee.
 O too industrious folly!

20 O vain and causeless melancholy!
 Nature will either end thee quite;
 Or, lengthening out thy season of delight, Preserve for thee, by individual right,
 A young lamb's heart among the full-grown flocks.

25 What hast thou to do with sorrow,
 Or the injuries of tomorrow?
 Thou art a dewdrop, which the morn brings forth,

Ill fitted to sustain unkindly shocks,
 Or to be trailed along the soiling earth, 30 A gem that glitters while it lives,
 And no forewarning gives,
 But, at the touch of wrong, without a strife Slips in a moment out of life

TO THE DAISY

1802 1807

In youth from rock to rock I went,
 From hill to hill in discontent
 Of pleasure high and turbulent,
 Most pleased when most uneasy;

5 But now my own delights I make,— My thirst at every rill can slake,
 And gladly Nature's love partake
 Of thee, sweet Daisy!

Thee, Winter in the garland wears 10 That thinly decks his few gray hairs;
 Spring parts the clouds with softest airs,
 That she may sun thee;
 Whole Summer-fields are thine by right;
 And Autumn, melancholy wight!
 15 Doth in thy crimson head delight
 When rains are on thee.

In shoals and bands, a morrice train,¹ Thou greet'st the traveller in the lane;
 Pleased at his greeting thee again;
 20 Yet nothing daunted,
 Nor grieved if thou be set at nought:
 And oft alone in nooks remote
 We meet thee, like a pleasant thought,
 When such are wanted.

25 Be violets in their secret mews²
 The flowers the wanton Zephyrs choose;
 Proud be the rose, with rains and dews
 Her head impearling, Thou liv'st with less ambitious aim, 30 Yet hast not gone without thy fame; Thou art indeed by many a claim
 The poet's darling.

If to a rock from rains he fly,
 Or, some bright day of April sky, 35 Imprisoned by hot sunshine lie Near the green holly,
 And wearily at length should fare;
 He needs but look about, and there Thou art!—a friend at hand, to scare 40 His melancholy

A hundred times, by rock or bower, Ere thus I have lain couched an hour,
 Have I derived from thy sweet power
 Some apprehension,
 45 Some steady love, some brief delight;
 Some memory that had taken flight;
 Some chime of fancy wrong or right;
 Or stray invention.

If stately passions in me burn, 50 And one chance look to thee should turn,
 I drink out of an humbler urn
 A lowlier pleasure,
 The homely sympathy that heeds
 The common life our nature breeds; 55 A wisdom fitted to the needs Of hearts at leisure.

Fresh-smitten by the morning ray,
 When thou art up, alert and gay,
 Then, cheerful Flower! my spirits play 60 With kindred gladness.
 And when, at dusk, by dews oppress'd Thou sink'st, the image of thy rest Hath often eased my pensive breast Of careful sadness.

65 And all day long—I number¹ yet,
 All seasons through, another debt,
 Which I, wherever thou art met,
 To thee am owing,
 An instinct call it, a blind sense; 70 A happy, genial influence, Coming one knows not how, nor whence,
 Nor whither going.

Child of the Year! that round dost run Thy pleasant course,—when day's begun 75 As ready to salute the sun
 As lark or leveret,¹ Thy long-lost praise thou shalt regain;
 Nor be less dear to future men Than in old time;—thou not in vain 80 Art Nature's favorite.

TO THE SAME FLOWER 1802 1807

With little here to do or see Of things that in the great world be,
 Daisy! again I talk to thee,
 For thou art worthy,
 5 Thou unassuming Commonplace
 Of Nature, with that homely face,
 And yet with something of a grace
 Which love makes for thee!

Oft on the dappled turf at ease 10 I sit, and play with smiles, Loose types of things through all degrees, Thoughts of thy raising:
 And many a fond and idle name
 I give to thee, for praise or blame, 15 As is the humor of the game, While I am gazing.

A nun demure of lowly port;
 Or sprightly maiden, of Love's court,
 In thy simplicity the sport 20 Of all temptations;
 A queen in crown of rubies drest;
 A starveling in a scanty vest;
 Are all, as seems to suit thee best,
 Thy appellations.

25 A little Cyclops with one eye Staring to threaten and defy,
 That thought comes next—and instantly
 The freak is over,
 The shape will vanish—and behold 30 A silver shield with boss of gold,
 That spreads itself, some faery bold
 In fight to cover!

I see thee glittering from afar—
 And then thou art a pretty star; 35 Not quite so fair as many are In heaven above thee!
 Yet like a star, with glittering crest,
 Self-poised in air thou seem'st to rest;—
 May peace come never to his nest, 40 Who shall reprove thee!

Bright Flower! for by that name at last,
 When all my reveries are past,
 I call thee, and to that cleave fast,
 Sweet silent creature!
 45 That breath'st with me in sun and air, Do thou, as thou art wont, repair
 My heart with gladness, and a share Of thy meek nature!

 1808 1807

Bright Flower! whose home is everywhere,
 Bold in maternal Nature's care,
 And, all the long year through, the heir
 Of joy and sorrow;
 5 Methinks that there abides in thee
 Some concord with humanity,
 Given to no other flower I see
 The forest thorough!
 Is it that Man is soon deprest?
 10 A thoughtless Thing! who, once unblest, Does little on his memory rest,
 Or on his reason,
 And thou wouldst teach him how to find A shelter under every wind, 15 A hope for times that are unkind
 And every season?

Thou wander'st the wide world about,
 Unchecked by pride or scrupulous doubt,
 With friends to greet thee, or without, 20 Yet pleased and willing;
 Meek, yielding to the occasion's call,
 And all things suffering from all,
 Thy function apostolical
 In peace fulfilling.

THE GREEN LINNET
 1803 1807

Beneath these fruit-tree boughs that shed
 Their snow-white blossoms on my head,
 With brightest sunshine round me spread Of spring's unclouded weather, 5 In this sequestered nook how sweet
 To sit upon my orchard-seat!
 And birds and flowers once more to greet,
 My last year's friends together.

One have I marked, the happiest guest 10 In all this covert of the blest:
 Hail to thee, far above the rest
 In joy of voice and pinion!
 Thou, Linnet! in thy green array, Presiding Spirit here today, 15 Dost lead the revels of the May;
 And this is thy dominion

While birds, and butterflies, and flowers,
 Make all one band of paramours,
 Thou, ranging up and down the bowers, 20 Art sole in thy employment:
 A Life, a Presence like the Air, Scattering thy gladness without care,
 Too blest with any one to pair;
 Thyself thy own enjoyment.

25 Amid yon tuft of hazel trees,
 That twinkle to the gusty breeze,
 Behold him perched in ecstasies,
 Yet seeming still to hover,
 There! where the flutter of his wings
 30 Upon his back and body flings
 Shadows and sunny glimmerings,
 That cover him all over.

My dazzled sight he oft deceives,
 A brother of the dancing leaves;
 35 Then flits, and from the cottage eaves Pours forth his song in gushes,
 As if by that exulting strain
 He mocked and treated with disdain
 The voiceless Form he chose to feign, 40 While fluttering in the bushes

YEW TREES
 1803 1815

There is a Yew-tree, pride of Lorton Vale, Which to this day stands single, in the midst
 Of its own darkness, as it stood of yore
 Not loth to furnish weapons for the band 5 Of Umfraville or Percy ere they marched To Scotland's heaths, or those that crossed the sea
 And drew their sounding bows at Azim-cour,
 Perhaps at earlier Crecy, or Poitiers
 Of vast circumference and gloom profound 10 This solitary Tree! a living thing Produced too slowly ever to decay;
 Of form and aspect too magnificent To be destroyed. But worthier still of note
 Are those fraternal Four of Borrowdale, 15 Joined in one solemn and capacious grove; Huge trunks! and each particular trunk a growth

Of intertwined fibres serpentine
Up-coiling, and inveterately¹ convolved, Nor uninformed with Phantasy, and looks 20 That threaten the profane; a pillared
shade,
Upon whose grassless floor of red-brown
hue,
By sheddings from the pining² umbrage tinged
Perennially—beneath whose sable roof
Of boughs, as if for festal purpose decked 25 With unrejoicing berries—ghostly Shapes May meet at noontide. Fear and trembling Hope,
Silence and Foresight; Death the Skeleton And Time the Shadow.—there to celebrate,
As in a natural temple scattered o'er 30 With altars undisturbed of mossy stone, United worship, or in mute repose
To lie, and listen to the mountain flood Murmuring from Glaiamara's inmost caves.

AT THE GRAVE OF BURNS

SEVEN YEARS AFTER HIS DEATH
1803 1843

I shiver, Spirit fierce and bold,
At thought of what I now behold—
As vapors breathed from dungeons cold Strike pleasure dead,
5 So sadness comes from out the mould Where Burns is laid

And have I then thy bones so near,
And thou forbidden to appear?
As if it were thyself that's here 10 I shrink with pain;
And both my wishes and my fear Alike are vain

Off weight—not press on weight!—away Dark thoughts!—they came, but not to stay, 15 With chastened feelings would I pay
The tribute due
To him, and aught that hides his clay
From mortal view

Fresh as the flower, whose modest worth 20 He sang, his genius "glinted"³ forth, Rose like a star that touching earth,
For so it seems,
Doth glorify its humble birth
With matchless beams.

25 The piercing eye, the thoughtful brow,
The struggling heart, where be they now?
Full soon the Aspirant of the plough,
The prompt, the brave,
Slept, with the obscurest, in the low 30 And silent grave.

I mourned with thousands, but as one More deeply grieved, for he was gone Whose light I hailed when first it shone,
And showed my youth 35 How Verse may build a princely throne
On humble truth.

Alas! where'er the current tends,
Regret pursues and with it blends,— Huge Criffel's hoary top ascends 40 By Skiddaw seen,— Neighbors we were, and loving friends
We might have been;

True friends though diversely inclined;
But heart with heart and mind with mind, 45 Where the main fibres are entwined, Through Nature's skill,
May even by contraries be joined More closely still

The tear will start, and let it flow;
50 Thon "poor Inhabitant below,"¹
At this dread moment—even so—Might we together
Have sate and talked where gowans² blow,⁴
Or on wild heather.

55 What treasures would have then been placed Within my reach, of knowledge graced By fancy what a rich repast!
But why go on?
Oh! spare to sweep, thou mournful blast, 60 His grave grass-grown.

There, too, a son, his joy and pride, (Not three weeks past the stripling died.)
Lies gathered to his father's side, Soul-moving sight!
65 Yet one to which is not denied Some sad delight.

For he is safe, a quiet bed
Hath early found among the dead, Harbored where none can be misled, 70 Wronged, or distressed;
And surely here it may be said That such are blest.

¹ by virtue of old habit² decaying³ Burns, To a Mountain Daisy, 15 (p 194)⁴ Burns, A Raid's Epitaph, 19 (p 197).² daisies⁴ bloom

And oh for thee, by pitying grace Checked oft-times in a devious race, 75 May He, who halloweth the place Where Man is laid,
 Receive thy spirit in the embrace
 For which it prayed!

Sighing I turned away; but ere 80 Night fell I heard, or seemed to hear, Music that sorrow comes not near,
 A ritual hymn,
 Chanted in love that casts out fear
 By Seraphim.

TO A HIGHLAND GIRL

AT INVERSENYDE, UPON LOCH LOMOND
 1803 1807

Sweet Highland Girl, a very shower
 Of beauty is thy earthly dower!
 Twice seven consenting years have shed Their utmost bounty on thy head 5 And these gray rocks, that household
 lawn;
 Those trees, a veil just half withdrawn;
 This fall of water that doth make A murmur near the silent lake,
 This little bay, a quiet road 10 That holds in shelter thy abode—In truth together do ye seem Like something fashioned in a dream,
 Such Forms as from their covert peep
 When earthly cares are laid asleep!
 15 But, O fair creature! in the light Of common day, so heavenly bright,
 I bless thee, vision as thou art,
 I bless thee with a human heart,
 God shield thee to thy latest years!
 20 Thee, neither know I, nor thy peers,
 And yet my eyes are filled with tears.

With earnest feeling I shall pray For thee when I am far away:
 For never saw I mien, or face, 25 In which more plainly I could trace Benignity and home-bred sense Ripening in perfect innocence.
 Here scattered, like a random seed, Remote from men, thou dost not need, 30 The embarrassed look of shy distress,
 And maidenly shamefacedness:
 Thou wear'st upon thy forehead clear
 The freedom of a mountaineer:
 A face with gladness overspread!
 35 Soft smiles, by human kindness bred!
 And seemliness complete, that sways Thy courtesies, about thee plays;

With no restraint, but such as springs From quick and eager visitings 40 Of thoughts that lie beyond the reach Of thy few words of English speech:
 A bondage sweetly brooked, a strife
 That gives thy gestures grace and life!
 So have I, not unmoved in mind, 45 Seen birds of tempest-loving kind—Thus beating up against the wind.

What hand but would a garland cull
 For thee who art so beautiful?
 O happy pleasure! here to dwell 50 Beside thee in some heathy dell;
 Adopt your homely ways, and dress,
 A shepherd, thou a shepherdess!
 But I could frame a wish for thee
 More like a grave reality:
 55 Thou art to me but as a wave Of the wild sea; and I would have Some claim upon thee, if I could,
 Though but of common neighborhood.
 What joy to hear thee, and to see!
 60 Thy elder brother I would be,
 Thy father—anything to thee!

Now thanks to Heaven! that of its grace Hath led me to this lonely place
 Joy have I had, and going hence 65 I bear away my recompense.
 In spots like these it is we prize
 Our Memory, feel that she hath eyes
 Then, why should I be loth to stir?
 I feel this place was made for her, 70 To give new pleasure like the past, Continued long as life shall last.
 Nor am I loth, though pleased at heart, Sweet Highland Girl! from thee to part;
 For I, methinks, till I grow old, 75 As fair before me shall behold,
 As I do now, the calm small,
 The lake, the bay, the waterfall;
 And thee, the Spirit of them all!

STEPPING WESTWARD 1803 1807

"What, you are stepping westward?"—
 "Yea."

— "T'would be a wildish destiny,
 If we, who thus together roam
 In a strange land, and far from home, 5 Were in this place the guests of Chance:
 Yet who would stop, or fear to advance,
 Though home or shelter he had none,
 With such a sky to lead him on?

The dewy ground was dark and cold; 10 Behind, all gloomy to behold;
 And stepping westward seemed to be

A kind of heavenly destiny:
 I liked the greeting; 'twas a sound Of something without place or bound;
 15 And seemed to give me spiritual right To travel through that region bright.
 The voice was soft, and she who spake Was walking by her native lake:
 The salutation had to me 20 The very sound of courtesy.
 Its power was felt, and while my eye
 Was fixed upon the glowing sky,
 The echo of the voice enwrought
 A human sweetness with the thought 25 Of travelling through the world that lay Before me in my endless way

THE SOLITARY REAPER

1803 1807

Behold her, single in the field,
 You solitary Highland lass!
 Reaping and singing by herself,
 Stop here, or gently pass!
 5 Alone she cuts and binds the grain,
 And sings a melancholy strain,
 O listen! for the vale profound Is overflowing with the sound.
 No nightingale did ever chaunt 10 More welcome notes to weary bands Of travellers in some shady haunt, Among Arabian sands
 A voice so thrilling ne'er was heard In springtime from the cuckoo-bird.
 15 Breaking the silence of the seas
 Among the farthest Hebrides

Will no one tell me what she sings?—
 Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow For old, unhappy, far-off things, 20 And battles long ago,
 Or is it some more humble lay,
 Familiar matter of today?
 Some natural sorrow, loss, or pain,
 That has been, and may be again?

25 Whate'er the theme, the maiden sang
 As if her song could have no ending,
 I saw her singing at her work,
 And o'er the sickle bending,— I listened, motionless and still;
 30 And, as I mounted up the hill,
 The music in my heart I bore,
 Long after it was heard no more.

YARROW UNVISITED

1803 1807

From Stirling castle we¹ had seen
 The mazy Forth unravell'd;
 Had trod the banks of Clyde, and Tay.
¹ Wordsworth and his sister Dorothy

And with the Tweed had travelled; 5 And when we came to Clovenford, Then said my "winsome marrow," "Whate'er betide, we'll turn aside, And see the Braes of Yarrow."²

"Let Yarrow folk, frae Selkirk town, 10 Who have been buying, selling, Go back to Yarrow, 'tis their own,
 Each maiden to her dwelling!
 On Yarrow's banks let herons feed, Hares couch, and rabbits burrow!
 15 But we will downward with the Tweed, Nor turn aside to Yarrow.

"There's Galla Water, Leader Haugh, Both lying right before us,
 And Dryborough, where with chiming Tweed

20 The lintwhites³ sing in chorus.
 There's pleasant Tiviot-dale, a land Made blithe with plough and harrow.
 Why throw away a needful day
 To go in search of Yarrow?

25 "What's Yarrow but a river baie, That glides the dark hills under?
 There are a thousand such elsewhere As worthy of your wonder."
 —Strange words they seemed of slight and scorn,

30 My true-love sighed for sorrow,
 And looked me in the face, to think I thus could speak of Yarrow!

"Oh! green," said I, "are Yarrow's holms,⁴

And sweet is Yarrow flowing!

35 Fair hangs the apple frae the rock,⁵
 But we will leave it growing.
 O'er hilly path, and open strath,⁶ We'll wander Scotland thorough.
 But, though so near, we will not turn 40 Into the dale of Yarrow

"Let beeves and home-bred kine partake
 The sweets of Burn-mill meadow;
 The swan on still St. Mary's Lake Float double, swan and shadow!
 45 We will not see them; will not go,
 Today, nor yet tomorrow,
 Enough if in our hearts we know There's such a place as Yarrow.

 1803 1807

- Vanguard of Liberty, ye men of Kent, Ye children of a Soil that doth advance² Her haughty brow against the coast of France,
 Now is the time to prove your hardiment!
 5 To France be words of invitation sent!

 tenance
 Of your fierce war, may ken the glittering

 And hear you shouting forth your brave intent.

 1804 1807

- O blithe Newcomer! I have heard,
 I hear thee and rejoice
 O Cuckoo! shall I call thee Bird.
 Or but a wandering Voice?
 5 While I am lying on the grass Thy twofold shout I hear;
 From hill to hill it seems to pass
 At once far off, and near 10 Though babbling only to the Vale,
 Of sunshine and of flowers,
 Thou bringest unto me a tale Of visionary hours

¹ The men of the southern part of Kent were never subdued in the Norman invasion, and when they surrendered they had their charters confirmed

Thrice welcome, darling of the Spring!
 Even yet thou art to me 15 No bird, but an invisible thing,
 A voice, a mystery;

The same whom in my schoolboy days
 I listened to, that Cry
 Which made me look a thousand ways 20 In bush, and tree, and sky.

To seek thee did I often rove Through woods and on the green,
 And thou wert still a hope, a love;
 Still longed for, never seen.

25 And I can listen to thee yet,
 Can lie upon the plain And listen, till I do forget That golden time again.

O blessed Bud! the earth we pace 30 Again appears to be An unsubstantial, faery place;
 That is fit home for thee!

SHE WAS A PHANTOM OF DELIGHT 1804 1807

She was a phantom of delight
 When first she gleamed upon my sight;
 A lovely apparition, sent To be a moment's ornament, 5 Her eyes as stars of twilight fall,
 Like twilight's, too, her dusky hair;
 But all things else about her drawn From Maytime and the cheerful dawn,
 A dancing shape, an image gay, 10 To haunt, to startle, and waylay.

I saw her upon nearer view,
 A spirit, yet a woman too!
 Her household motions light and free,
 And steps of virgin liberty, 15 A countenance in which did meet Sweet records, promises as sweet;
 A creature not too bright or good For human nature's daily food;
 For transient sorrows, simple wiles, 20 Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles

And now I see with eye serene
 The very pulse of the machine;¹
 A being breathing thoughtful breath,
 A traveller between life and death; 25 The reason firm, the temperate will,
 Endurance, foresight, strength, and skill;

¹ body

A perfect woman, nobly planned,
 To warn, to comfort, and command;
 And yet a spirit still, and bright 30 With something of angelic light

I WANDERED LONELY AS A CLOUD 1804 1807

I wandered lonely as a cloud
 That floats on high o'er vales and hills,
 When all at once I saw a crowd,
 A host, of golden daffodils, 5 Beside the lake, beneath the trees, Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

Continuous as the stars that shine
 And twinkle on the Milky Way,
 They stretched in never-ending line 10 Along the margin of a bay
 Ten thousand saw I at a glance, Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

The waves beside them danced; but they Outdid the sparkling waves in glee.
 15 A poet could not but be gay,
 In such a jocund company:
 I gazed—and gazed—but little thought What wealth the show to me had brought:

For oft, when on my couch I lie 20 In vacant or in pensive mood,
 They flash upon that inward eye
 Which is the bliss of solitude,
 And then my heart with pleasure fills,
 And dances with the daffodils.

THE AFFLICTION OF MARGARET 1804 1807

Where art thou, my beloved son,
 Where art thou, worse to me than dead?
 Oh find me, prosperous or undone!
 Or, if the grave be now thy bed,
 5 Why am I ignorant of the same
 That I may rest, and neither blame Nor sorrow may attend thy name?

Seven years, alas! to have received No tidings of an only child; 10 To have despaired, have hoped, believed.
 And been for evermore beguiled;
 Sometimes with thoughts of very bliss!
 I catch at them, and then I miss;
 Was ever darkness like to this?

15 He was among the prime in worth,
 An object beauteous to behold;
 Well born, well bred; I sent him forth Ingenuous, innocent, and bold:
 If things ensued that wanted grace, 20 As hath been said, they were not base;
 And never blush was on my face

Ah! little doth the young one dream,
 When full of play and childish cares,
 What power is in his wildest scream, 25 Heard by his mother unawares!
 He knows it not, he cannot guess;
 Years to a mother bring distress;
 But do not make her love the less.

Neglect me! no, I suffered long 30 From that ill thought; and, being blind, Said, "Pride shall help me in my wrong:
 Kind mother have I been, as kind
 As ever breathed;" and that is true, I've wet my path with tears like dew, 35 Weeping for him when no one knew.

My son, if thou be humbled, poor,
 Hopeless of honor and of gain,
 Oh! do not dread thy mother's door;
 Think not of me with grief and pain:
 40 I now can see with better eyes;
 And worldly grandeur I despise,
 And fortune with her gifts and lies.

Alas! the fowls of heaven have wings,
 And blasts of heaven will aid their flight, 45 They mount—how short a voyage brings The wanderers back to their delight!
 Chains tie us down by land and sea;
 And wishes, vain as mine, may be
 All that is left to comfort thee.

Perhaps some dungeon hears thee groan, Maimed, mangled by inhuman men;
 Or thou upon a desert thrown Inheritest the lion's den;
 Or hast been summoned to the deep, 55 Thou, thou and all thy mates, to keep An incommunicable sleep.

I look for ghosts; but none will force
 Their way to me: 'tis falsely said That there was ever intercourse 60 Between the living and the dead;
 For, surely, then I should have sight
 Of him I wait for day and night,
 With love and longings infinite.

My apprehensions come in crowds;
 65 I dread the rustling of the grass;
 The very shadows of the clouds
 Have power to shake me as they pass:
 I question things and do not find
 One that will answer to my mind, 70 And all the world appears unkind.

Beyond participation lie
 My troubles, and beyond relief:
 If any chance to heave a sigh,

They pity me, and not my grief.
 75 Then come to me, my son, or send Some tidings that my woes may end;
 I have no other earthly friend!

ODE TO DUTY 1805 1807

Stern Daughter of the Voice of God!
 O Duty! if that name thou love
 Who art a light to guide, a rod
 To check the erring, and reprove;
 5 Thou, who art victory and law
 When empty terrors overawe;
 From vain temptations dost set free;
 And calm'st the weary strife of frail humanity!

There are who ask not if thine eye
 Be on them; who, in love and truth, 10 Where no misgiving is, rely Upon the genial sense of youth:
 Glad Hearts! without reproach or blot,
 Who do thy work, and know it not.
 15 Oh! if through confidence misplaced They fail, thy saving arms, dread Power, around them cast

Serene will be our days and bright,
 And happy will our nature be,
 When love is an unerring light, 20 And joy its own security.
 And thy a blissful course may hold Even now, who, not unwisely bold, Live in the spirit of this creed, Yet seek thy firm support, according to their need.

I, loving freedom, and untried;
 No sport of every random gust,
 Yet being to myself a guide,
 Too blindly have reposed my trust:
 And oft, when in my heart was heard 30 Thy timely mandate, I deferred
 The task, in smoother walks to stray;
 But thee I now would serve more strictly,
 if I may.

Through no disturbance of my soul,
 Or strong compunction in me wrought, 35 I supplicate for thy control;
 But in the quietness of thought:
 Me this unchartered freedom tires;
 I feel the weight of chance-desires:
 My hopes no more must change their name.
 40 I long for a repose that ever is the same.

Stern Lawgiver! yet thou dost wear
 The Godhead's most benignant grace;
 Nor know we anything so fair

As is the smile upon thy face:

- 45 Flowers laugh before thee on their beds
And fragrance in thy footing treads, Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong;
And the most ancient heavens, through Thee, are fresh and strong.

To humbler functions, awful Power!

- 50 I call thee: I myself commend Unto thy guidance from this hour;
Oh, let my weakness have an end!
Give unto me, made lowly wise,
The spirit of self-sacrifice; 55 The confidence of reason give;
And in the light of truth thy bondman let me live!

TO A SKYLARK
1805 1807

Up with me! up with me into the clouds!
For thy song, Lark, is strong;
Up with me, up with me into the clouds!
Singing, singing,
5 With clouds and sky about thee ringing, Lift me, guide me, till I find That spot which seems so to thy mind!

I have walked through wildernesses dreary,
And today my heart is weary;

- 10 Had I now the wings of a Faery,
Up to thee would I fly.
There is madness about thee, and joy divine
In that song of thine;
Lift me, guide me, high and high 15 To thy banqueting place in the sky.

Joyous as morning,
Thou art laughing and scorning;
Thou hast a nest for thy love and thy
rest,

- And, though little troubled with sloth, 20 Drunken Lark! thou wouldst be loth
To be such a traveller as I.
Happy, happy Liver,
With a soul as strong as a mountain river
Pouring out praise to the almighty Giver, 25 Joy and jollity be with us both!

Alas! my journey, rugged and uneven, Through prickly moors or dusty ways must
wind;

- But hearing thee, or others of thy kind,
As full of gladness and as free of heaven, 30 I, with my fate contented, will plod on,
And hope for higher raptures, when life's day is done.

ELEGIAC STANZAS

SUGGESTED BY A PICTURE OF PEELE CASTLE, IN A STORM, PAINTED BY SIR GEORGE BEAUMONT 1805 1807

I was thy neighbor once, thou rugged Pile!
Four summer weeks I dwelt in sight of
thee:

I saw thee every day; and all the while Thy Form was sleeping on a glassy sea.

- 5 So pure the sky, so quiet was the air!
So like, so very like, was day to day!
Whene'er I looked, thy Image still was
there;
It trembled, but it never passed away.

How perfect was the calm! it seemed no
sleep;

- 10 No mood, which season takes away, or brings:
I could have fancied that the mighty Deep Was even the gentlest of all gentle Things

Ah! then, if mine had been the painter's
hand,
To express what then I saw; and add the
gleam,

- 15 The light that never was, on sea or land,
The consecration, and the poet's dream;

I would have planted thee, thou hoary Pile.
Amid a world how different from this!¹
Beside a sea that could not cease to smile; 20 On tranquil land, beneath a sky of bliss.

Thou shouldst have seemed a treasure-house divine
Of peaceful years; a chronicle of
heaven,—
Of all the sunbeams that did ever shine
The very sweetest had to thee been given.

- 25 A picture had it been of lasting ease, Elysian quiet, without toil or strife;
No motion but the moving tide, a breeze,
Or merely silent Nature's breathing life.

- Such, in the fond illusion of my heart, 30 Such picture would I at that time have made:
And seen the soul of truth in every part,
A steadfast peace that might not be betrayed.

So once it would have been,—'tis so no
more;
I have submitted to a new control:

¹ That is, the world of the picture

35 A power is gone, which nothing can restore;
A deep distress hath humanized my soul.

Not for a moment could I now behold
A smiling sea, and be what I have been:
The feeling of my loss will ne'er be old, 40 This, which I know, I speak with mind serene

Then, Beaumont, friend! who would have been the friend,
If he had lived, of him whom I deplore,¹
This work of thine I blame not, but commend;
This sea in anger, and that dismal shore.

45 O 'tis a passionate Work!—yet wise and well, Well chosen is the spirit that is here;
That Hulk which labors in the deadly swell,
This rueful sky, this pageantry of fear!

And this huge Castle, standing here sublime,

50 I love to see the look with which it braves, Cased in the unfeeling armor of old time,
The lightning, the fierce wind, and trampling waves.

Farewell, farewell the heart that lives alone, Housed in a dream, at distance from the Kind!²

55 Such happiness, wherever it be known,
Is to be pitied, for 'tis surely blind.

But welcome fortitude, and patient cheer,
And frequent sights of what is to be borne!
Such sights, or worse, as are before me here.—

60 Not without hope we suffer and we mourn

TO A YOUNG LADY³

WHO HAD BEEN REPROACHED FOR TAKING LONG WALKS IN THE COUNTRY
1805 1807

Dear child of Nature, let them rail!
—There is a nest in a green dale,
A harbor and a hold;
Where thou, a wife and friend, shalt see 5 Thy own heart-stirring days, and be A light to young and old.

There, healthy as a shepherd boy,
And treading among flowers of joy

² The human race

³ Wordsworth's sister Dorothy

Which at no season fade, 10 Thou, while thy babes around thee cling, Shalt show us how divine a thing
A woman may be made.

Thy thoughts and feelings shall not die,
Nor leave thee, when gray hairs are nigh 15 A melancholy slave;
But an old age serene and bright,
And lovely as a Lapland night,
Shall lead thee to thy grave.

CHARACTER OF THE HAPPY WARRIOR¹ 1806 1807

Who is the happy warrior? Who is he That every man in arms should wish to be —It is the generous Spirit, who, when brought

Among the tasks of real life, hath wrought

5 Upon the plan that pleased his boyish thought Whose high endeavors are an inward high That makes the path before him always bright

Who, with a natural instinct to discern What knowledge can perform, is diligent to learn,

10 Abides by this resolve, and stops not there But makes his moral being his prime care Who, doomed to go in company with Pain
And Fear, and Bloodshed, miserable train Turns his necessity to glorious gain,

15 In face of these doth exercise a power Which is our human nature's highest dower.

Controls them and subdues, transmutes bereaves

Of their bad influence, and their good receives.

By objects, which might force the soul to abate

20 Her feeling, rendered more compassionate Is placable—because occasions rise
So often that demand such sacrifice, More skilful in self-knowledge, even more
pure,

As tempted more, more able to endure, 25 As more exposed to suffering and distress Thence, also, more alive to tenderness —'Tis he whose law is reason; who depend Upon that law as on the best of friends Whence, in a state where men are tempted
still

30 To evil for a guard against worse ill,
And what in quality or act is best Doth seldom on a right foundation rest, He labors good on good to fix, and owe
To virtue every triumph that he knows:

35 — Who, if he rise to station of command, Rises by open means, and there will stand On honorable terms, or else retire,
And in himself possess his own desire;
Who comprehends his trust, and to the same

40 Keeps faithful with a singleness of aim,
And therefore does not stoop, nor lie in wait
For wealth, or honors, or for worldly state, Whom they must follow, on whose head must fall, Like showers of manna, if they come at all:

45 Whose powers shed round him in the common strife,
On mild concerns of ordinary life,
A constant influence, a peculiar grace.
But who, if he be called upon to face Some awful moment to which Heaven has joined 50 Great issues, good or bad for human kind,

Is happy as a lover, and attired
With sudden brightness, like a man inspired,
And, through the heat of conflict, keeps the law
In calmness made, and sees what he fore-saw,

55 Or if an unexpected call succeed, Come when it will, is equal to the need
—He who, though thus endued as with a sense

And faculty for storm and turbulence,
Is yet a Soul whose master-bias leans 60 To homefelt pleasures and to gentle scenes, Sweet images! which, wheresoe'er he be,
Are at his heart, and such fidelity
It is his darling passion to approve,
More brave for this, that he hath much to love —

65 'Tis, finally, the man, who, lifted high, Conspicuous object in a nation's eye,
Or left unthought-of in obscurity,— Who, with a toward or untoward lot, Prosperous or adverse, to his wish or not—70 Plays, in the many games of life, that one Where what he most doth value must be won

Whom neither shape of danger can dismay, Nor thought of tender happiness betray.
Who, not content that former worth stand fast,

75 Looks forward, persevering to the last,
From well to better, daily self-surpass.

Who, whether praise of him must walk the earth

Forever, and to noble deeds give birth,
Or he must fall, to sleep without his fame, 80 And leave a dead unprofitable name—

Finds comfort in himself and in his cause,
And, while the mortal mist is gathering, draws

His breath in confidence of Heaven's applause

This is the happy warrior, this is he 85 That every man in arms should wish to be

POWER OF MUSIC

1806

1807

An Orpheus! an Orpheus! yes, Faith may grow bold,

And take to herself all the wonders of old;—

Near the stately Pantheon you'll meet with the same

In the street that from Oxford hath borrowed its name

6 His station is there, and he works on the crowd,

He sways them with harmony merry and loud,

He fills with his power all their hearts to the brim—

Was aught ever heard like his fiddle and hum?

What an eager assembly! what an empire is this!

10 The weary have life, and the hungry have bliss,

The mourner is cheered, and the anxious have rest,

And the guilt-burthened soul is no longer oppress

As the Moon brightens round her the clouds of the night,

So he, where he stands, is a centre of light,

15 It gleams on the face, there, of dusky-browed Jack,

On the pale-visaged baker's, with basket on back

That errand-bound 'prentice was passing in haste—

What matter! he's caught—and his time runs to waste;

The newsman is stopped, though he stops on the fret;

20 And the half-breathless lamplighter—he's in the net!

The porter sits down on the weight which he bore;
The lass with her barrow wheels hither her store;—
If a thief could be here he might pilfer at ease,
She sees the musician, 'tis all that she sees!

35 He stands, backed by the wall,—he abates not his din;
His hat gives him vigor, with boons dropping in,
From the old and the young, from the poorest, and there!
The one-pennied boy has his penny to spare.

O blest are the hearers, and proud be the
hand

30 Of the pleasure it spreads through so thankful a band;
I am glad for him, blind as he is!—all the while

If they speak 'tis to praise, and they praise with a smile

That tall man, a giant in bulk and in height,
Not an inch of his body is free from
delight;

35 Can he keep himself still, if he would?
oh, not he!
The music stirs in him like wind through a tree

Mark that cripple who leans on his crutch; like a tower That long has leaned forward, leans hour after hour!—

That mother, whose spirit in fetters is
bound,

40 While she dandles the babe in her arms to the sound

Now, coaches and chariots! roar on like a stream;

Here are twenty souls happy as souls in
a dream,

They are deaf to your murmurs—they care not for you,

Nor what ye are flying, nor what ye pursue!

YES, IT WAS THE MOUNTAIN ECHO
1806 1807

Yes, it was the mountain Echo,
Solitary, clear, profound,
Answering to the shouting Cuckoo, Giving to her sound for sound!

5 Unsolicited reply
To a babbling wanderer sent;
Like her ordinary cry,
Like—but oh, how different!

Hears not also mortal Life?
10 Hear not we, unthinking creatures!
Slaves of folly, love, or strife—Voices of two different natures?

Have not we too?—yes, we have Answers, and we know not whence; 15 Echoes from beyond the grave, Recognized intelligence!

Such rebounds our inward ear Catches sometimes from afar—Listen, ponder, hold them dear; 20 For of God,—of God they are

NUNS FRET NOT AT THEIR CON- VENT'S NARROW ROOM 1806 1807

Nuns fret not at their convent's narrow
room;

And hermits are contented with their cells;
And students with their pensive citadels;

Maidens at the wheel, the weaver at his loom, 5 Sit blithe and happy; bees that soar for bloom,

High as the highest Peak of Furness-fells,
Will murmur by the hour in foxglove bells

In truth the prison, unto which we doom Ourselves, no prison is: and hence for me, 10 In sundry moods, 'twas pastime to be bound

Within the Sonnet's scanty plot of
ground;

Pleased if some Souls (for such there needs must be)

Who have felt the weight of too much liberty,

Should find brief solace there, as I have found.

PERSONAL TALK 1806 1807

I

I am not one who much or oft delight
To season my fireside with personal talk,— Of friends, who live within an easy walk,
Or neighbors, daily, weekly, in my sight:

5 And, for my chance acquaintance, ladies
bright,

Sons, mothers, maidens withering on the stalk,

These all wear out of me, like forms with chalk

Painted on rich men's floors,¹ for one feast-night.

Better than such discourse doth silence
long,

10 Long, barren silence, square with my desire;

To sit without emotion, hope, or aim,
In the loved presence of my cottage fire,
And listen to the flapping of the flame,
Or kettle whispering its faint under-song.

II

15 "Yet life," you say, "is life, we have seen and see,

And with a living pleasure we describe,
And fits of sprightly malice do but bribe
The languid mind into activity Sound sense, and love itself, and mirth
and glee

20 Are fostered by the comment and the gibe "

Even be it so yet still among your tribe.
Our daily world's true worldlings, rank not me!

Children are blest, and powerful, their world lies

More justly balanced, partly at their feet

25 And part far from them —sweetest melodies

Are those that are by distance made more sweet;

Whose mind is but the mind of his own
eyes,

He is a slave, the meanest we can meet!

III

Wings have we,—and as far as we can go

30 We may find pleasure. wilderness and
wood,

Blank ocean and mere sky, support that

Which with the lofty sanctifies the low Dreams, books, are each a world. and books, we know,

Are a substantial world, both pure and
good:

35 Round these, with tendrils strong as flesh and blood,

Our pastime and our happiness will grow.
There find I personal themes, a plenteous
store,

Matter wherein right voluble I am.

To which I listen with a ready ear,

40 Two shall be named, pre-eminently dear,—
The gentle Lady² married to the Moor,

And heavenly Una with her milk-white

² Desdemona, wife of Othello

³ The Faerie Queene, I, 1. 45

Nor can I not believe but that hereby Great gains are mine; for thus I live remote

45 From evil speaking; rancor, never sought, Comes to me not, malignant truth, or lie.
Hence have I genial seasons, hence have I Smooth passions, smooth discourse, and joyous thought.

And thus from day to day my little boat

50 Rocks in its harbor, lodging peaceably Blessings be with them—and eternal
praise,

Who gave us nobler loves, and nobler cares—

The poets, who on earth have made us heirs Of truth and pure delight by heavenly lays!

55 Oh! might my name be numbered among theirs,

Then gladly would I end my mortal days.

ADMONITION

1806

1807

Well may'st thou halt—and gaze with brightening eye!

The lovely Cottage in the guardian nook Hath stirred thee deeply; with its own dear brook,

Its own small pasture, almost its own sky!

5 But covet not the Abode,—forbear to sigh,
As many do, repining while they look, Intruders—who would tear from Nature's book

This precious leaf, with harsh impiety Think what the Home must be if it were
thine,

10 Even thine, though few thy wants!— Roof, window, door,

The very flowers are sacred to the Poor.
The roses to the porch which they entwine

Yea, all, that now enchants thee, from
the day

On which it should be touched, would melt away

HOW SWEET IT IS, WHEN MOTHER FANCY ROCKS

1806

1807

How sweet it is, when Mother Fancy rocks
The wayward biam, to saunter through a
wood!

An old place, full of many a lovely brood, Tall trees, green arbors, and ground-flowers in flocks;

5 And wild rose tip-toe upon hawthorn
stocks,

Like a bold girl, who plays her agile pranks
At wakes and fairs with wandering mountebanks.—

When she stands cresting the clown's head, and mocks

- The crowd beneath her. Verily I think, 10 Such place to me is sometimes like a dream Or map of the whole world: thoughts, link by link,
Enter through ears and eyesight, with such gleam
Of all things, that at last in fear I shrink,
And leap at once from the delicious stream.

COMPOSED BY THE SIDE OF GRASMERE LAKE
1806 1820

Clouds, lingering yet, extend in solid bars Through the gray west, and lo! these waters, steeled

- By breezeless air to smoothest polish, yield A vivid repetition of the stars, 5 Jove, Venus, and the ruddy crest of Mars Amid his fellows beautifully revealed At happy distance from earth's groaning
field,

Where ruthless mortals wage incessant wars

- Is it a mirror?—or the nether sphere 10 Opening to view the abyss in which she feeds

Her own calm fires?—But hush! a voice is near,

Great Pan himself low-whispering through the reeds,

“Be thankful, thou, for, if unholy deeds Ravage the world, tranquillity is here!”

THE WORLD IS TOO MUCH WITH US, LATE AND SOON
1806 1807

The world is too much with us; late and
soon,

Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers:

Little we see in Nature that is ours,
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!

- 5 This sea that bares her bosom to the moon;

The winds that will be howling at all hours,
And are up-gathered now like sleeping
flowers;

For this, for everything, we are out of
tune;

- It moves us not.—Great God! I'd rather be 10 A Pagan suckled in a creed outworn, So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,

Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn;

Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea,
Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn

1806 1807

A flock of sheep that leisurely pass by,
One after one, the sound of rain, and bees

Murmuring; the fall of rivers, winds and seas,

Smooth fields, white sheets of water, and pure sky;

- 5 I have thought of all by turns, and yet do lie

Sleepless! and soon the small birds' melodies

Must hear, first uttered from my orchard
trees;

And the first cuckoo's melancholy cry.

Even thus last night, and two nights more,
I lay

- 10 And could not win thee, Sleep! by any stealth.

So do not let me wear tonight away.

Without thee what is all the morning's wealth?

Come, blessed barrier between day and
day,

Dear mother of fresh thoughts and joyous health!

NOVEMBER, 1806
1806 1807

Another year!—another deadly blow!

Another empty Empire overthrown!

And we are left, or shall be left, alone;
The last that dare to struggle with the foe

- 5 'Tis well! from this day forward we shall
know

That in ourselves our safety must be sought,

That by our own right hands it must be
wrought,

That we must stand unpropped, or be laid low

O dastard whom such foretaste doth not cheer!

- 10 We shall exult, if they who rule the land
Be men who hold its many blessings dear,

Wise, upright, valiant; not a servile band, Who are to judge of danger which they
fear,

And honor which they do not understand

ODE

INTIMATIONS OF IMMORTALITY FROM RECOL-LECTIONS OF EARLY CHILDHOOD
1803-6 1807

"The Child is father of the Man.
And I could wish my days to be Bound each to each by natural piety"

I

There was a time when meadow, grove, and stream,
The earth, and every common sight,
To me did seem Apparelled in celestial light,
The glory and the freshness of a dream
It is not now as it hath been of yore,— Turn wheresoe'er I may,
By night or day,
The things which I have seen I now can see no more

II

10 The Rainbow comes and goes,
And lovely is the Rose,
The Moon doth with delight Look round her when the heavens are bare, Waters on a starry night 15 Are beautiful and fair,
The sunshine is a glorious birth,
But yet I know, where'er I go,
That there hath past away a glory from the earth

Now, while the birds thus sing a joyous
song, 20 And while the young lambs bound
As to the tabor's sound,
To me alone there came a thought of grief.
A timely utterance gave that thought relief
And I again am strong 25 The cataracts blow their trumpets from the steep,
No more shall grief of mine the season
wrong;
I hear the Echoes through the mountains
throng,
The Winds come to me from the fields of
sleep,
And all the earth is gay, 30 Land and sea
Give themselves up to jollity,
And with the heart of May Doth every beast keep holiday;—
Thou Child of Joy, 35 Shout round me, let me hear thy shout, thou happy Shepherd-boy!

¹ Wordsworth, My Heart Leaps Up, 7-10 (p. 282)

Ye blessed Creatures, I have heard the call Ye to each other make; I see The heavens laugh with you in your jubilee;
My heart is at your festival, 40 My head hath its coronal, The fulness of your bliss, I feel—I feel it all.
Oh evil day! if I were sullen While Earth herself is adorning,
This sweet May-morning,
45 And the children are culling
On every side,
In a thousand valleys far and wide, Fresh flowers; while the sun shines
warm,
And the Babe leaps up on his mother's arm:—
50 I hear, I hear, with joy I hear!
—But there's a Tree, of many, one,
A single Field which I have looked upon, Both of them speak of something that is gone
The Pansy at my feet 55 Doth the same tale repeat.
Whither is fled the visionary gleam?
Where is it now, the glory and the dream?

V

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting.
The Soul that rises with us, our life's Star, 60 Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come 65 From God, who is our home
Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
Shades of the prison-house begin to close
Upon the growing Boy,
But he beholds the light, and whence it flows,
70 He sees it in his joy;
The Youth, who daily farthest from the east Must travel, still is Nature's priest,
And by the vision splendid Is on his way attended, 75 At length the Man perceives it die away.
And fade into the light of common day

VI

Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her
own; Yearnings she hath in her own natural kind,
And, even with something of a mother's
mind,

80 And no unworthy aim,
The homely nurse doth all she can
To make her Foster-child, her inmate Man, Forget the glories he hath known,
And that imperial palace whence he came.

VII

85 Behold the Child among his new-born blisses,
A six years' darling of a pigmy size!
See, where 'mid work of his own hand he lies,
Fretted by sallies of his mother's kisses, 130 With light upon him from his father's eyes!
90 See, at his feet, some little plan or chart, Some fragment from his dream of human
life,
Shaped by himself with newly-learned art,
A wedding or a festival,
A mourning or a funeral, 95 And this hath now his heart,
And unto this he frames his song.
Then will he fit his tongue
To dialogues of business, love, or strife, 140
But it will not be long Ere thus be thrown aside,
And with new joy and pride 100 The little Actor cons another part, Filling from time to time his "humorous stage"
With all the Persons, down to palsied Age, 105 That Life brings with her in her equipage, As if his whole vocation
Were endless imitation.

VIII

Thou, whose exterior semblance doth belie Thy soul's immensity, 110 Thou best philosopher, who yet dost keep Thy heritage, thou eye among the blind,
That, deaf and silent, read'st the Eternal Deep,²
Haunted forever by the Eternal Mind.—
Mighty prophet! seer! blest!
115 On whom those truths do rest,
Which we are toiling all our lives to find,
In darkness lost, the darkness of the grave,
Thou, over whom thy Immortality
Broods like the Day, a master o'er a slave, 120 A Presence which is not to be put by;
Thou little Child, yet glorious in the might Of heaven-born freedom on thy being's
height,

¹ See As You Like It, II, 7, 139 ff. Humorous refers to dominant moods.

² Deep mysteries of eternity

Why with such earnest pains dost thou provoke
The years to bring the inevitable yoke, 125 Thus blindly with thy blessedness at strife?
Full soon thy Soul shall have her earthly freight,
And custom lie upon thee with a weight,
Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life!

IX

O joy! that in our embers
Is something that doth live,
That nature yet remembers
What was so fugitive!
The thought of our past years in me doth breed
Perpetual benediction: not indeed For that which is most worthy to be blest,
135 Delight and liberty, the simple creed
Of childhood, whether busy or at rest, With new-fledged hope still fluttering in his breast —
Not for these I raise
The song of thanks and praise,
But for those obstinate questionings
Of sense and outward things,
Fallings from us, vanishings;
Blank misgivings of a Creature
145 Moving about in worlds not realized, High instincts before which our mortal nature
Did tremble like a guilty thing surprised
But for those first affections,
Those shadowy recollections,
150 Which, be they what they may,
Are yet the fountain-light of all our
day,
Are yet a master-light of all our seeing,
Uphold us, cherish, and have power to make Our noisy years seem moments in the being
Of the Eternal Silence truths that wake, 155 To perish never.
Which neither listlessness, nor mad endeavor,
Nor man nor boy,
Nor all that is at enmity with joy,
160 Can utterly abolish or destroy!
Hence in a season of calm weather
Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither,
165 Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the children sport upon the
shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling ever-
more.

X

Then sing, ye Birds, sing, sing a joyous
 song!
 And let the young Lambs bound 170 As to the tabor's sound!
 We in thought will join your throng,
 Ye that pipe and ye that play, Ye that through your hearts to-
 day
 Feel the gladness of the May!
 175 What though the radiance which was once so bright
 Be now forever taken from my sight, Though nothing can bring back the
 hour
 Of splendor in the grass, of glory in the flower,
 180 We will grieve not, rather find Strength in what remains behind,
 In the primal sympathy
 Which having been must ever be.
 In the soothing thoughts that spring
 Out of human suffering, 185 In the faith that looks through
 death,
 In years that bring the philosophic mind

XI

And O, ye Fountains, Meadows, Hills,
 and Groves,
 Forebode not any severing of our loves!
 Yet in my heart of hearts I feel your
 might,
 190 I only have relinquished one delight To live beneath you more habitual
 sway
 I love the Brooks which down their channels fret,
 Even more than when I tripped lightly as they,
 The innocent brightness of a new-born
 Day
 195 Is lovely yet,
 The Clouds that gather round the setting
 sun
 Do take a sober coloring from an eye That hath kept watch o'er man's mortality,
 Another race hath been, and other palms are won.
 200 Thanks to the human heart by which we live,
 Thanks to its tenderness, its joys, and fears,
 To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for
 tears

THOUGHT OF A BRITON ON THE SUB-JUGATION OF SWITZERLAND¹

1807

1807

Two Voices are there; one is of the sea,²
 One of the mountains;³ each a mighty
 Voice.
 In both from age to age thou didst rejoice,
 They were thy chosen music, Liberty!
 5 There came a tyrant, and with holy glee Thou fought'st against him, but hast vainly striven
 Thou from thy Alpine holds at length art
 driven,
 Where not a torrent murmurs heard by
 thee
 Of one deep bliss thine ear hath been bereft 10 Then cleave, O cleave to that which still is left,
 For, high-souled Maid, what sorrow would it be That mountain Floods should thunder as
 before,
 And Ocean bellow from his rocky shore,
 And neither awful Voice be heard by thee!

CHARACTERISTICS OF A CHILD
 THREE YEARS OLD⁴

1811

Loving she is, and tractable, though wild;
 And Innocence hath privilege in her
 To dignify arch looks and laughing eyes,
 And feats of cunning, and the pretty
 round
 5 Of trespasses, affected to provoke Mock-chastisement and partnership in
 play
 And, as a faggot sparkles on the hearth.
 Not less if unattended and alone Than when both young and old sit gathered
 round
 10 And take delight in its activity, Even so this happy creature of herself Is all-sufficient, solitude to her Is blithe society, who fills the air With gladness and involuntary songs.
 15 Light are her sallies as the tripping fawn's FORTH-startled from the fern where she lay couched,
 Unthought-of, unexpected, as the stir
 Of the soft breeze ruffling the meadow-
 flowers,
 Or from before it chasing wantonly 20 The many-colored images imprest Upon the bosom of a placid lake.

HERE PAUSE: THE POET CLAIMS AT LEAST THIS PRAISE
1811 1815

Here pause: the poet claims at least this
praise,
That virtuous Liberty hath been the scope Of his pure song, which did not shrink from hope

In the worst moment of these evil days, 5 From hope, the paramount duty that Heaven lays,

For its own honor, on man's suffering
heart

Never may from our souls one truth depart—

That an accused thing it is to gaze On prosperous tyrants with a dazzled
eye,

10 Nor—touched with due abhorrence of their guilt

For whose dire ends tears flow, and blood is spilt,

And justice labors in extremity—
Forget thy weakness, upon which is built, O wretched man, the throne of tyranny'

LAODAMÍA
1814 1815

"With sacrifice before the rising morn Vows have I made by fruitless hope inspired,

And from the infernal gods, 'mid shades
forlorn

Of night, my slaughtered lord have I required.

5 Celestial pity I again implore,— Restore him to my sight—great Jove, restore!"

So speaking, and by fervent love endowed With faith, the suppliant heavenward lifts her hands,

While, like the sun emerging from a
cloud,

10 Her countenance brightens—and her eye expands,

Her bosom heaves and spreads, her stature
grows,

And she expects the issue in repose

O terror! what hath she perceived?—O
joy!

What doth she look on?—whom doth she behold?

15 Her hero slain upon the beach of Troy?
His vital presence? his corporeal mould?
It is—if sense deceive her not—'tis he!
And a god leads him, winged Mercury'

Mild Hermes spake—and touched her with his wand

20 That calms all fear; "Such grace hath crowned thy prayer,

Laodamía! that at Jove's command

Thy husband walks the paths of upper air:

He comes to tarry with thee three hours'
space;

Accept the gift, behold him face to face!"

25 Forth sprang the impassioned Queen her lord to clasp;

Again that consummation she essayed;

But unsubstantial Form eludes her grasp

As often as that eager grasp was made.

The Phantom parts—but parts to reunite,

30 And reassume his place before her sight

"Protesiláus, lo! thy guide is gone!

Confirm, I pray, the vision with thy voice

This is our palace,—yonder is thy throne

Speak, and the floor thou tread'st on will rejoice

35 Not to appal me have the gods bestowed This precious boon, and blest a sad
abode"

"Great Jove, Laodamía! doth not leave

His gifts imperfect—Spectre though I be,

I am not sent to scare thee or deceive.

40 But in reward of thy fidelity

And something also did my worth obtain.

For fearless virtue bringeth boundless gain

"Thou knowest, the Delphic oracle foretold

That the first Greek who touched the Trojan strand

45 Should die, but me the threat could not withhold

A generous cause a victim did demand.

And forth I leapt upon the sandy plain;

A self-devoted chief—by Hector slain!"

"Supreme of heroes—bravest, noblest,
best!

50 Thy matchless courage I bewail no more, Which then, when tens of thousands were deprest

By doubt, propelled thee to the fatal
shore;

Thou found'st—and I forgive thee—here
thou art—

A nobler counsellor than my poor heart

55 "But thou, though capable of sternest
deed,

Wert kind as resolute, and good as brave,

And he, whose power restores thee, hath decreed Thou shouldst elude the malice of the grave:

Redundant are thy locks, thy lips as fair 60 As when their breath enriched Thessalian
air.

"No spectre greets me,—no vain shadow
this,
Come, blooming hero, place thee by my
side!

Give, on this well-known couch, one nuptial kiss

To me, this day, a second time thy bride!"

65 Jove frowned in heaven: the conscious Parcæ threw

Upon those roseate lips a Stygian hue.

"This visage tells thee that my doom is
past

Not should the change be mourned, even if the joys

Of sense were able to return as fast

70 And surely as they vanish Earth destroys

Those raptures duly—Erebus disdains

Calm pleasures there abide—majestic pains

"Be taught, O faithful consort, to control Rebellious passion for the gods approve

75 The depth, and not the tumult, of the soul,

A fervent, not ungovernable, love

Thy transports moderate, and meekly mourn

When I depart, for brief is my sojourn—"

"Ah wherefore?—Did not Hercules by force

80 Wiest from the guardian Monster of the tomb¹

Alcestis, a reanimated corse,

Given back to dwell on earth in vernal bloom?²

Medea's spells dispersed the weight of
years,

And Æson stood a youth 'mid youthful peers.³

85 "The gods to us are merciful—and they Yet further may relent: for mightier far

Than strength of nerve and sinew, or the
way

Of magic potent over sun and star,

Is love, though oft to agony distrest,

90 And though his favorite seat be feeble woman's breast.

"But if thou goest, I follow—" "Peace!"
he said,—

She looked upon him and was calmed and cheered;

The ghastly color from his lips had fled;
In his deportment, shape, and mien, appeared

95 Elysian beauty, melancholy grace, Brought from a pensive though a happy
place

He spake of love, such love as Spirits feel In worlds whose course is equable and
pure,

No fears to beat away—no strife to heal—

100 The past unsighed for, and the future sure, Spake of heroic arts in graver mood Revived, with finer harmony pursued;

Of all that is most beauteous—imaged there
In happier beauty, more pellucid streams,

105 An ampler ether, a diviner air,
And fields invested with purpureal gleams, Climes which the sun, who sheds the brightest day

Earth knows, is all unworthy to survey.

Yet there the Soul shall enter which hath earned

110 That privilege by virtue—"Ill," said he,
"The end of man's existence I discerned,
Who from ignoble games and revelry Could draw, when we had parted, vain
delight

While tears were thy best pastime, day
and night;

115 "And while my youthful peers before my eyes

(Each hero following his peculiar bent) Prepared themselves for glorious enterprise

By martial sports,—or, seated in the tent, Chieftains and kings in council were detained,

120 What time the fleet at Aulis lay enchained.

"The wished-for wind was given—I then revolved

The oracle, upon the silent sea,
And, if no worthier led the way, resolved

That, of a thousand vessels, mine should be 125 The foremost prow in pressing to the strand,—

Mine the first blood that tinged the Trojan sand.

"Yet bitter, oft-times bitter, was the pang
When of thy loss I thought, beloved wife'

On thee too fondly did my memory hang,

130 And on the joys we shared in mortal life,—
The paths which we had trod—these fountains, flowers;
My new-planned cities, and unfinished towers.

“But should suspense permit the foe to 170 cry, ‘Behold they tremble!—haughty their array,

135 Yet of their number no one dares to die?
In soul I swept the indignity away.
Old frailties then recurred:—but lofty
thought,
In act embodied, my deliverance wrought.

“And thou, though strong in love, art all too weak

140 In reason, in self-government too slow, I counsel thee by fortitude to seek Our blest reunion in the shades below
The invisible world with thee hath sym-pathized,
Be thy affections raised and solemnized.

145 “Learn, by a mortal yearning, to ascend—Seeking a higher object Love was given, Encouraged, sanctioned, chiefly for that end;
For this the passion to excess was driven—That self might be annulled her bondage prove

150 The fetters of a dream opposed to love.”

Aloud she shrieked! for Hermes reappears!

Round the dear Shade she would have clung—’tis vain:

The hours are past—too brief had they been years,

And him no mortal effort can detain.

155 Swift, toward the realms that know not earthly day,
He through the portal takes his silent way,
And on the palace floor a lifeless corse she lay.

Thus, all in vain exhorted and reproved,
She perished, and, as for a wilful crime,

160 By the just gods whom no weak pity
moved,

Was doomed to wear out her appointed
time,

Apart from happy ghosts, that gather
flowers

Of blissful quiet ’mid unfading bowers

—Yet tears to human suffering are due;

165 And mortal hopes defeated and o’erthrown

Are mourned by man, and not by man
alone,
As fondly he believes.—Upon the side Of Hellespont (such faith was entertained)

A knot of spiry trees¹ for ages grew From out the tomb of him for whom she died;

And ever, when such stature they had gained

That Ilum’s walls were subject to their
view,

The trees’ tall summits withered at the sight;

A constant interchange of growth and blight!

YARROW VISITED

SEPTEMBER, 1814
1814 1815

And is this—Yarrow?—This the stream
Of which my fancy cherished,
So faithfully, a waking dream?
An image that hath perished!

5 O that some minstrel’s harp were near,
To utter notes of gladness,
And chase this silence from the air,
That fills my heart with sadness!

Yet why?—a silvery current flows

10 With uncontrolled meanderings; Nor have these eyes by greener hills Been soothed, in all my wanderings And, through her depths, Saint Mary’s
Lake

Is visibly delighted,

15 For not a feature of those hills
Is in the mirror slighted

A blue sky bends o’er Yarrow vale, Save where that pearly whiteness

Is round the rising sun diffused,

20 A tender hazy brightness; Mild dawn of promise! that excludes All profitless dejection;
Though not unwilling here to admit A pensive recollection

25 Where was it that the famous Flower Of Yarrow Vale lay bleeding?²
His bed perchance was yon smooth mound
On which the herd is feeding.
And haply from this crystal pool,

² The Flower of Yarrow was Mary Scott of Dry hope; but Wordsworth is probably following Logan’s Brass of Yarrow, in which the lady mourns over the lover whom she calls “the flower of Yarrow”

30 Now peaceful as the morning,
The water-wrath¹ ascended thrice—
And gave his doleful warning.

Deheious is the lay that sings
The haunts of happy lovers, 35 The path that leads them to the grove,
The leafy grove that covers And Pity sanctifies the verse
That paints, by strength of sorrow,
The unconquerable strength of love;
40 Bear witness, rueful Yarrow!

But thou, that didst appear so fair
To fond imagination,
Dost rival in the light of day
Her delicate creation.

45 Meek loveliness is round thee spread,
A softness still and holy;
The grace of forest charms decayed,
And pastoral melancholy.

That region left, the vale unfolds 50 Rich groves of lofty stature,
With Yarrow winding through the pomp
Of cultivated nature,
And, rising from those lofty groves,
Behold a Ruin hoary!
55 The shattered front of Newark's Towers, Renowned in Border story

Fair scenes for childhood's opening bloom.
For sportive youth to stray in For manhood to enjoy his strength, 60 And age to wear away in!
Yon cottage seems a bowel of bliss,
A covert for protection
Of tender thoughts, that nestle there—
The brood of chaste affection

65 How sweet, on this autumnal day.
The wild-wood fruits to gather,
And on my True-love's forehead plant
A crest of blooming heather!
And what if I enwreathed my own!
70 'Twere no offence to reason,
The sober Hills thus deck their brows
To meet the wintry season.

I see—but not by sight alone,
Loved Yarrow, have I won thee;
75 A ray of fancy still survives—
Her sunshine plays upon thee!
Thy ever-youthful waters keep A course of lively pleasure;
And gladsome notes my lips can breathe, 80 Accordant to the measure.

¹ A spirit thought to preside over waters. Lines 31-32 are taken from Logan's poem.

The vapors linger round the heights,
They melt, and soon must vanish;
One hour is theirs, no more is mine—
Sad thought, which I would banish, 85 But that I know, where'er I go, Thy genuine image, Yarrow!
Will dwell with me—to heighten joy,
And cheer my mind in sorrow

HAST THOU SEEN, WITH FLASH INCESSANT
1818 1820

Hast thou seen, with flash incessant, Bubbles gliding under ice,
Bodied forth and evanescent,
No one knows by what device?

5 Such are thoughts!—A wind-swept meadow Mimicking a troubled sea,
Such is life, and death a shadow
From the rock eternity!

COMPOSED UPON AN EVENING OF EXTRAORDINARY SPLENDOR AND BEAUTY
1818 1820

Had this effulgence disappeared
With flying haste, I might have sent,
Among the speechless clouds, a look Of blank astonishment;
5 But 'tis endued with power to stay,
And sanctify one closing day,
That frail Mortality may see—What is?—ah no, but what can be!
Time was when field and watery cove 10 With modulated echoes rang, While choirs of fervent angels sang Their vespers in the grove,
Or, crowning, star-like, each some sovereign height,
Warbled, from heaven above and earth
below,
15 Strains suitable to both—Such holy rite, Methinks, if audibly repeated now
From hill or valley, could not move Sublimar transport, purer love, Than doth this silent spectacle—the gleam—
20 The shadow—and the peace supreme!

No sound is uttered,—but a deep And solemn harmony pervades
The hollow vale from steep to steep,
And penetrates the glades.
25 Far-distant images draw nigh, Called forth by wondrous potency Of beamy radiance, that imbues Whate'er it strikes with gem-like hues!

- In vision exquisitely clear, 30 Herds range along the mountain side;
 And glistening antlers are descried;
 And gilded flocks appear.
 Thine is the tranquil hour, purpureal eve!
 But long as god-like wish, or hope divine, 35 Informs my spirit, ne'er can I believe That this magnificence is wholly thine!
 —From worlds not quickened by the sun
 A portion of the gift is won,
 An intermingling of Heaven's pomp is spread 40 On ground which British shepherds tread!

- And if there be whom broken ties Afflict, or injuries assail, Yon hazy ridges to their eyes
 Present a glorious scale, 45 Climbing suffused with sunny air,
 To stop—no record hath told where!
 And tempting Fancy to ascend,
 And with immortal spirits blend!
 —Wings at my shoulders seem to play, 50 But, rooted here, I stand and gaze On those bright steps that heavenward raise Their practicable way!¹ Come forth, ye drooping old men, look
 abroad,
 And see to what fair countries ye are
 bound!
 55 And if some traveller, weary of his road.
 Hath slept since noon-tide on the grassy
 ground,
 Ye Genn!¹ to his covert speed,
 And wake him with such gentle heed
 As may attune his soul to meet the dower 60 Bestowed on this transcendent hour!

- Such hues from their celestial urn Were wont to stream before mine eye, Where'er it wandered in the morn
 Of blissful infancy 65 This glimpse of glory, why renewed?
 Nay, rather speak with gratitude;
 For, if a vestige of those gleams Survived, 'twas only in my dreams Dread Power! whom peace and calmness serve 70 No less than Nature's threatening voice, If aught unworthy be my choice,
 From thee if I would swerve;
 Oh, let thy grace remind me of the light Full early lost, and fruitlessly deplored;
 75 Which, at this moment, on my waking sight Appears to shine, by miracle restored,
 My soul, though yet confined to earth, Rejoices in a second birth!
 —'Tis past, the visionary splendor fades; 80 And night approaches with her shades.
- ¹ A ladder that may be climbed.

TO A SNOWDROP

1819

1819

- Lone Flower, hemmed in with snows, and white as they
 But harder far, once more I see thee bend Thy forehead as if fearful to offend, Like an unbidden guest Though day by
 day
 5 Storms, sallying from the mountain-tops, waylay
 The rising sun, and on the plains descend, Yet art thou welcome, welcome as a friend Whose zeal outruns his promise! Blue-eyed May Shall soon behold this border thickly set 10 With bright jonquils, their odors lavishing On the soft west-wind and his frolic
 peers,
 Nor will I then thy modest grace forget, Chaste Snowdrop, venturous harbinger of
 Spring,
 And pensive monitor of fleeting years!

THERE IS A LITTLE UNPRETENDING RILL

1820

1820

- There is a little unpretending rill
 Of limpid water, humbler far than aught
 That ever among men or naiads sought Notice or name!¹—It quivers down the hill, 5 Furrowing its shallow way with dubious
 will,
 Yet to my mind this scanty stream is brought Oftener than Ganges or the Nile; a
 thought (Of private recollection sweet and still!
 Months perish with their moons; year treads on year, 10 But, faithful Emma!¹² thou with me canst say
 That, while ten thousand pleasures disappear,
 And flies their memory fast almost as
 they,
 The immortal Spirit of one happy day Lingers beside that rill, in vision clear

BETWEEN NAMUR AND LIEGE

1820

1822

- What lovelier home could gentle Fancy choose?
 Is this the stream, whose cities, heights, and plains,
 War's favorite playground, are with crimson stains
 Familiar, as the Morn with pearly dew?
 5 The Morn, that now, along the silver Meuse,

Spreading her peaceful ensigns, calls the
 swains
 To tend their silent boats and ringing wains,
 Or strip the bough whose mellow fruit bestrewn
 The ripening corn beneath it As mine
 eyes
 10 Turn from the fortified and threatening
 hill,

COMPOSED IN ONE OF THE CATHOLIC CANTONS

1820 1822

Doomed as we are our native dust
 To wet with many a bitter shower, It ill befits us to disdain
 The altar, to deride the fane, 5 Where simple sufferers bend, in trust
 To win a happier hour

I love, where spreads the village lawn,
 Upon some knee-worn cell to gaze
 Hail to the firm unmoving cross, 10 Aloft, where pines then branches toss'
 And to the chapel far withdrawn,
 That lurks by lonely ways'

Where'er we roam—along the brink Of Rhine—or by the sweeping Po, 15 Through Alpine vale, or champaign wide, Whate'er we look on, at our side /
 Be Charity!—to bid us think,
 And feel, if we would know

From THE RIVER DUDDON

SOLE LISTENER, DUDDON

Sole listener, Duddon! to the breeze that played
 With thy clear voice, I caught the fitful
 sound Wafted o'er sullen moss and craggy mound—
 Unfruitful solitudes, that seemed to upbraid
 5 The sun in heaven!—but now, to form a
 shade
 For thee, green alders have together wound Their foliage; ashes flung their arms
 around;

And birch trees risen in silver colonnade.
 And thou hast also tempted here to rise, 10 'Mid sheltering pines, this cottage rude and gray,
 Whose ruddy children, by the mother's
 eyes Carelessly watched, sport through the summer day,
 Thy pleased associates—light as endless
 May
 On infant bosoms lonely Nature lies

AFTER-THOUGHT

I thought of thee, my partner and my guide,
 As being past away—Vain sympathies!
 For, backward, Duddon! as I cast my
 eyes,
 I see what was, and is, and will abide;
 5 Still glides the Stream, and shall forever glide,
 The Form remains, the Function never dies, While we, the brave, the mighty, and the wise,
 We Men, who in our morn of youth defied
 The elements, must vanish,—be it so!
 10 Enough, if something from our hands have power
 To live, and act, and serve the future hour,
 And if, as toward the silent tomb we go, Through love, through hope, and faith's transcendent dower,
 We feel that we are greater than we know¹

MUTABILITY

From low to high doth dissolution climb,
 And sink from high to low, along a scale Of awful notes, whose concord shall not fail;
 A musical but melancholy chime, 5 Which they can hear who meddle not with crime,
 Nor avarice, nor over-anxious care Truth fails not; but her outward forms that bear
 The longest date do melt like frosty rime,
 That in the morning whitened hill and plain 10 And is no more; drop like the tower
 sublime
 Of yesterday, which royally did wear His crown of weeds, but could not even sustain
 Some casual shout that broke the silent air,
 Or the unimaginable touch of Time.

INSIDE OF KING'S COLLEGE CHAPEL, CAMBRIDGE

Tax not the royal saint¹ with vain expense, With ill-matched aims the architect who planned—

Albeit laboring for a scanty band Of white-robed scholars only—this immense

⁵ And glorious work of fine intelligence!
Give all thou canst, high Heaven rejects the lore

Of nicely-calculated less or more,
So deemed the man who fashioned for the sense

These lofty pillars, spread that branching roof

¹⁰ Self-poised, and scooped into ten thousand cells,

Where light and shade repose, where music dwells

Lingering—and wandering on as loth to
die;

Like thoughts whose very sweetness yieldeth proof

That they were born for immortality

1825 1827

Ethereal minstrel! pilgrim of the sky!

Dost thou despise the earth where cares
abound?

Or, while the wings aspire, are heart and
eye

Both with thy nest upon the dewy ground?

⁵ Thy nest which thou canst drop into at will, Those quivering wings composed, that music still!

Leave to the nightingale her shady wood;
A privacy of glorious light is thine, Whence thou dost pour upon the world a flood

¹⁰ Of harmony, with instinct more divine,
Type of the wise who soar, but never roam.
True to the kindred points of Heaven and Home!

SCORN NOT THE SONNET
1827 1827

Scorn not the Sonnet; Critic, you have frowned,

Mindless of its just honors; with this key Shakspeare unlocked his heart; the melody
Of this small lute gave ease to Petrarch's wound;²

⁵ A thousand times this pipe did Tasso
sound;

¹ Henry VI, who founded King's College in 1441.
² His love for Laura, the inspiration of many of his sonnets

With it Camoens soothed an exile's grief;¹
The Sonnet glittered a gay myrtle leaf² Amid the cypress with which Dante crowned

¹⁰ His visionary brow: a glow-worm lamp, It cheered mild Spenser, called from Faery-land

To struggle through dark ways; and when a damp

Fell round the path of Milton, in his hand
The Thing became a trumpet; whence he blew

Soul-animating strains—alas, too few!

1827 1827

Not the whole warbling grove in concert
heard

When sunshine follows shower, the breast can thrill

Like the first summons, Cuckoo! of thy bill,
With its twin notes inseparably paired

⁵ The captive 'mid damp vaults unsunned, unaired,

Measuring the periods of his lonely doom,
That cry can reach; and to the sick man's room

Sends gladness, by no languid smile declared

The lordly eagle-race through hostile search ¹⁰ May perish, time may come when never
more

The wilderness shall hear the lion roar;
But, long as cock shall crow from household perch

To rouse the dawn, soft gales shall speed thy wing,

And thy erratic³ voice be faithful to the spring!

YARROW REVISITED
1831 1835

The gallant youth, who may have gained,
Or seeks a "winsome marrow,"⁴

Was but an infant in the lap

When first I looked on Yarrow.⁵

⁵ Once more, by Newark's Castle-gate

Long left without a warder,

I stood, looked, listened, and with thee,

Great Minstrel of the Border!⁶

cause of his passion for Donna Caterina After her death, he lamented her in his Rimas.

² The myrtle was a symbol of love; the cypress, of mourning. A reference to Dante's love

row*, p. 18.)

⁵ Scott (a reference to his Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border)

Grave thoughts ruled wide on that sweet
day, 10 Their dignity installing In gentle bosoms, while sere leaves
Were on the bough, or falling;
But breezes played, and sunshine
gleamed—
The forest to embolden;
15 Reddened the fiery hues, and shot Transparence through the golden.

For busy thoughts the Stream flowed on In foamy agitation;
And slept in many a crystal pool 20 For quiet contemplation.
No public and no private care
The freeborn mind enthralling,
We made a day of happy hours,
Our happy days recalling.

25 Brisk Youth appeared, the Morn of Youth,
With freaks of graceful folly,— Life's temperate Noon, her sober Eve,
Her Night not melancholy, Past, present, future, all appeared 30 In harmony united,
Like guests that meet, and some from far,
By cordial love invited

And if, as Yarrow, through the woods And down the meadow ranging, 35 Did meet us with unaltered face, Though we were changed and changing,
If, then, some natural shadows spread Our inward prospect over,
The soul's deep valley was not slow 40 Its brightness to recover.

Eternal blessings on the Muse,
And her divine employment!
The blameless Muse, who trains her sons
For hope and calm enjoyment, 45 Albeit sickness, lingering yet,
Has o'er their pillow brooded;
And Care waylays their steps—a sprite Not easily eluded

For thee, O Scott! compelled to change 50 Green Eildon-hill and Cheviot
For warm Vesuvio's vine-clad slopes,
And leave thy Tweed and Tiviot
For mild Sorrento's breezy waves; May classic Fancy, linking 55 With native Fancy her fresh aid, Preserve thy heart from sinking!

Oh! while they minister to thee,
Each vying with the other,

May Health return to mellow Age, 60 With Strength, her venturous brother,
And Tiber, and each brook and rill Renowned in song and story,
With unimagined beauty shine,
Nor lose one ray of glory!

65 For thou, upon a hundred streams,
By tales of love and sorrow,
Of faithful love, undaunted truth,
Hast shed the power of Yarrow,
And streams unknown, hills yet unseen, 70 Wherever they invite thee,
At parent Nature's grateful call,
With gladness must requite thee

A gracious welcome shall be thine,
Such looks of love and honor 75 As thy own Yarrow gave to me When first I gazed upon her;
Beheld what I had feared to see,
Unwilling to surrender
Dreams treasured up from early days, 80 The holy and the tender.

And what, for this frail world, were all That mortals do or suffer, Did no responsive harp, no pen,
Memorial tribute offer?
85 Yea, what were mighty Nature's self?
Her features, could they win us, Unhelped by the poetic voice
That hourly speaks within us?

Nor deem that localized Romance 90 Plays false with our affections; Unsanctifies our tears—made sport
For fanciful dejections
Ah, no! the visions of the past Sustain the heart in feeling 95 Life as she is—our changeable Life,
With friends and kindred dealing

Bear witness, ye, whose thoughts that day In Yarrow's groves were centred;
Who through the silent portal arch 100 Of mouldering Newark entered,
And clomb the winding stair that once Too timidly was mounted
By the "last Minstrel"¹ (not the last!)
Ere he his tale recounted.

105 Flow on forever, Yarrow Stream!
Fulfil thy pensive duty, Well pleased that future bards should chant
For simple hearts thy beauty;

 Among the branches of the leafless trees,
 All are the undying offspring of one fire

 Where Burns ploughed up the daisy."

 descried Above sea-clouds, the Peaks of Arran
 rose;
 And, by that simple notice, the repose
 Of earth, sky, sea, and air, was vivified

EXTEMPORE EFFUSION UPON THE DEATH OF JAMES HOGG
1835 1836

When first, descending from the moor-
lands,
I saw the Stream of Yarrow glide Along a bare and open valley,
The Ettrick Shepherd² was my guide 5 When last along its banks I wandered, Through groves that had begun to shed
Their golden leaves upon the pathways, My steps the Border-minstrel³ led worth's visit at Abbotsford in 1831. See Yarrow Revisited (p. 312).

The mighty Minstrel breathes no longer, 10 'Mid mouldering ruins low he lies;
And death upon the braes¹ of Yarrow,
Has closed the Shepherd-poet's eyes:

Nor has the rolling year twice measured,
From sign to sign, its steadfast course, 15 Since every mortal power of Coleridge Was frozen at its marvellous source;

The rapt One, of the godlike forehead,² The heaven-eyed creature sleeps in
earth:
And Lamb, the frolic and the gentle, 20 Has vanished from his lonely hearth.

Like clouds that rake the mountain-summits,
Or waves that own no curbing hand,
How fast has brother followed brother,
From sunshine to the sunless land!

25 Yet I, whose lids from infant slumber Were earlier raised, remain to hear A timid voice, that asks in whispers,
"Who next will drop and disappear?"

Our haughty life is crowned with darkness,
30 Like London with its own black wreath, On which with thee, O Crabbe! forth-looking,
I gazed from Hampstead's breezy heath.

As if but yesterday departed,
Thou too art gone before; but why, 35 O'er ripe fruit, seasonably gathered,³ Should frail survivors heave a sigh?

Mourn rather for that holy Spirit,
Sweet as the spring, as ocean deep;
For her⁴ who, ere her summer faded, 40 Has sunk into a breathless sleep.

No more of old romantic sorrows,⁵ For slaughtered youth or love-lorn
maid!
With sharper grief is Yarrow smitten, And Ettrick mourns with her their Poet
dead.

By twilight premature of cloud and rain;
Nor does that roaring wind deaden his strain
Who carols thinking of his Love and nest, 5 And seems, as more incited, still more blest Thanks; thou hast snapped a fireside Prisoner's chain, Exulting Warbler! eased a fretted brain,
And in a moment charmed my cares to rest.
Yes, I will forth, bold Bird! and front the blast, 10 That we may sing together, if thou wilt,
So loud, so clear, my Partner through life's day, Mute in her nest love-chosen, if not love-built Like thine, shall gladden, as in seasons past, Thrilled by loose snatches of the social Lay

A POET!—HE HATH PUT HIS HEART TO SCHOOL 1848 1842

- A Poet!*—He hath put his heart to school, Nor dares to move unpropped upon the staff Which Art hath lodged within his hand—must laugh
By precept only, and shed tears by rule.

And let the groveller sip his stagnant pool,
In fear that else, when Critics grave and cool
Have killed him, Scorn should write his epitaph.
How does the meadow flower its bloom unfold?

Down to its root, and, in that freedom, bold;
And so the grandeur of the forest tree Comes not by casting in a formal mould.
But from its own divine vitality

On the smooth surface of this naked stone!
And what if hence a bold desire should mount High as the Sun, that he could take account Of all that issues from his glorious fount!
10 So might he ken how by his sovereign aid
These delicate companionships are made:
And how he rules the pomp of light and shade;

And were the Sister-power that shines by night

THE UNREMITTING VOICE OF NIGHTLY STREAMS
1846 1850

- The unremitting voice of nightly streams
That wastes so oft, we think, its tuneful powers,
If neither soothing to the worm that gleams Through dewy grass, nor small birds hushed in bowers, 5 Nor unto silent leaves and drowsy flowers,— That voice of unpretending harmony (For who what is shall measure by what seems To be, or not to be,
Or tax high Heaven with prodigality?) 10 Wants not a healing influence that can creep Into the human breast, and mix with sleep
To regulate the motion of our dreams
For kindly issues—as through every clime Was felt near murmuring brooks in earliest time;

dwell
Where torrents roar, or hear the tinkling knell
Of water-breaks¹ with grateful heart could

TO THE SECOND EDITION OF SEVERAL OF THE FOREGOING POEMS, PUBLISHED, WITH AN ADDITIONAL VOLUME, UNDER THE TITLE OF "LYRICAL BALLADS" 1800 1800

The first volume of these poems has already been submitted to general perusal It was published as an experiment, which,
I hoped, might be of some use to ascertain, how far, by fitting to metrical arrangement a selection of the real language of men in a state of vivid sensation, that sort of pleasure and that quantity of pleasure may be imparted, which a poet may rationally endeavor to impart

I had formed no very inaccurate estimate of the probable effect of those poems I flattered myself that they who should be pleased with them would read them with more than common pleasure; and, on the other hand, I was well aware, that by those who should dislike them, they would be read with more than common dislike. The result has differed from my expectation in this only, that a greater number have been pleased than I ventured to hope I should please.

Several of my friends are anxious for the success of these poems from a belief that, if the views with which they were composed were indeed realized, a class of poetry would be produced well adapted to interest mankind permanently, and not unimportant in the quality and in the multiplicity of its moral relations; and on this account they have advised me to add a systematic defense of the theory upon which the poems were written. But I was unwilling to undertake the task, because I knew that on this occasion the reader would look coldly upon my arguments, since I might be suspected of having been principally influenced by the selfish and foolish hope of reasoning him into an approbation of these particular poems: and I was still more unwilling to undertake the task, because, adequately to display my opinions, and fully to enforce my arguments, would require a space wholly disproportionate to a preface. For to treat the subject with the clearness and coherence

¹ ripples of which it is susceptible, it would be necessary to give a full account of the present state of the public taste in this country, and to determine how far this taste is healthy or depraved, which, again, could not be determined, without pointing out, in what manner language and the human mind act and react on each other, and without retracing the revolutions, not of literature alone, but likewise of society itself. I have therefore altogether declined to enter regularly upon this defense; yet I am sensible that there would be some impropriety in abruptly obtruding upon the public, without a few words of introduction, poems so materially different from those upon which general approbation is at present bestowed.

It is supposed that by the act of writing in verse an author makes a formal engagement that he will gratify certain known habits of association; that he not only thus apprises the reader that certain classes of ideas and expressions will be found in his book, but that others will be carefully excluded. This exponent or symbol held forth by metrical language must in different eras of literature have excited very different expectations: for example, in the age of Catullus, Terence, and Lucretius, and that of Statius or Claudian; and in our own country, in the age of Shakespeare and Beaumont and Fletcher, and that of Donne and Cowley, or Dryden, or Pope I will not take upon me to determine the exact import of the promise which by the act of writing in verse an author, in the present day, makes to his reader; but it will undoubtedly appear to many persons that I have not fulfilled the terms of an engagement thus voluntarily contracted. They who have been accustomed to the gaudiness and inane phraseology of many modern writers, if they persist in reading this book to its conclusion, will, no doubt, frequently have to struggle with feelings of strangeness and awkwardness they will look round for poetry, and will be induced to inquire by what species of courtesy these attempts can be permitted to assume that title. I hope, therefore, the reader will not censure me for attempting to state what I have proposed to myself to perform; and also (as far as the limits of a preface will permit) to explain some of the chief reasons which have determined me in the choice of my purpose that at least he may be spared any unpleasant feeling of disappointment, and that I myself may be protected from one of the most dishonorable accusations which can be brought against an author; namely, that of an indolence which prevents him from endeavoring to ascertain what is his duty, or, when his duty is ascertained, prevents him from performing it.

The principal object, then, proposed in these poems was to choose incidents and situations from common life, and to relate or describe them throughout, as far as was possible, in a selection of language really used by men, and, at the same time, to throw over them a certain coloring of imagination, whereby ordinary things should be presented to the mind in an unusual aspect; and, further, and above all, to make these incidents and situations interesting by tracing in them, truly though not ostentatiously, the primary laws of our nature: chiefly, as far as regards the manner in which we associate ideas in a state of excitement. Humble and rustic life was generally chosen, because, in that condition, the essential passions of the heart find a better soil in which they can attain their maturity, are less under restraint, and speak a plainer and more emphatic language; because in that condition of life our elementary feelings coexist in a state of greater simplicity, and, consequently, may be more accurately contemplated, and more forcibly communicated, because the manners of rural life germinate from those elementary feelings, and, from the necessary character of rural occupations, are more easily comprehended, and are more durable; and, lastly, because in that condition the passions of men are incorporated with the beautiful and permanent forms of nature. The language, too, of these men has been adopted (purified indeed from what appear to be its real defects, from all lasting and rational causes of dislike or disgust) because such men hourly communicate with the best objects from which the best part of language is originally derived, and because, from their rank in society and the sameness and narrow circle of their intercourse, being less under the influence of social vanity, they convey their feelings and notions in simple and unelaborated expressions. Accordingly, such a language, arising out of repeated experience and regular feelings, is a more permanent, and a far more philosophical language, than that which is frequently substituted for it by poets, who think that they are conferring honor upon themselves and their art, in proportion as they separate themselves from the sympathies of men, and indulge in arbitrary and capricious habits of expression, in order to furnish food for fickle tastes and fickle appetites of their own creation.

I cannot, however, be insensible to the present outcry against the triviality and meanness, both of thought and language, which some of my contemporaries¹ have occasionally introduced into their metrical compositions; and I acknowledge that this defect, where it exists, is more dishonorable to the writer's own character than false refinement or arbitrary innovation, though I should contend at the same time, that it is far less pernicious in the sum of its consequences. From such verses the poems in these volumes will be found distinguished at least by one mark of difference, that each of them has a worthy purpose. Not that I always began to write with a distinct purpose formally conceived; but habits of meditation have, I trust, so prompted and regulated my feelings, that my descriptions of such objects as strongly excite those feelings, will be found to carry along with them a purpose. If this opinion be erroneous, I can have little right to the name of a poet. For all good poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings and though this be true, poems to which any value can be attached were never produced on any variety of subjects but by a man who, being possessed of more than usual organic sensibility, had also thought long and deeply. For our continued influxes of feeling are modified and directed by our thoughts, which are indeed the representatives of all our past feelings, and as by contemplating the relation of these general representatives to each other, we discover what is really important to men, so, by the repetition and continuance of this act, our feelings will be connected with important subjects, till at length, if we be originally possessed of much sensibility, such habits of mind will be produced that, by obeying blindly and mechanically the impulses of those habits, we shall describe objects, and utter sentiments, of such a nature, and in such connection with each other, that the understanding of the reader must necessarily be in some degree enlightened, and his affections strengthened and purified.

It has been said that each of these poems has a purpose. Another circumstance must be mentioned which distinguishes these poems from the popular poetry of the day; it is this, that the feeling therein developed gives importance to the action and situation, and not the action and situation to the feeling.

A sense of false modesty shall not prevent me from asserting that the reader's attention is pointed to this mark of distinction far less for the sake of these particular poems than from the general importance of the subject. The subject is indeed important! For the human mind is capable of being excited without the application of gross and violent stimulants; and he must have a very faint perception of its beauty and dignity who does not know this, and who does not further know that one being is elevated above another, in proportion as he possesses this capability. It has therefore appeared to me that to endeavor to produce or enlarge this capability is one of the best services in which, at any period, a writer can be engaged, but this service, excellent at all times, is especially so at the present day. For a multitude of causes, unknown to former times, are now acting with a combined force to blunt the discriminating powers of the mind, and, unfitting it for all voluntary exertion, to reduce it to a state of almost savage torpor. The most effective of these causes are the great national events which are daily taking place,¹ and the increasing accumulation of men in cities, where the uniformity of their occupations produces a craving for extraordinary incident, which the rapid communication of intelligence hourly gratifies. To this tendency of life and manners the literature and theatrical exhibitions of the country have conformed themselves. The invaluable works of our elder writers, I had almost said the works of Shakspeare and Milton, are driven into neglect by frantic novels,² sickly and stupid German tragedies,³ and deluges of idle and extravagant stories in verse.⁴ When I think upon this degrading thirst after outrageous stimulation, I am almost ashamed to have spoken of the feeble endeavor made in these volumes to counteract it, and, reflecting upon the magnitude of the general evil, I should be oppressed with no dishonorable melancholy, had I not a deep impression of certain inherent and indestructible qualities of the human mind, and likewise of certain powers in the great and permanent objects that act upon it, which are equally inherent and indestructible; and were there not added to this impression a belief, that the time is approaching when the evil will be systematically opposed by men of greater powers, and with far more distinguished success.

Having dwelt thus long on the subjects and aim of these poems, I shall request the reader's permission to apprise him of a few circumstances relating to their style, in order, among other reasons, that he may not censure me for not having performed what I never attempted. The reader will find that personifications of abstract ideas rarely occur in these volumes; and are utterly rejected, as an ordinary device to elevate the style and raise it above prose. My purpose was to imitate, and, as far as is possible, to adopt the very language of men, and assuredly such personifications do not make any natural or regular part of that language. They are, indeed, a figure of speech occasionally prompted by passion, and I have made use of them as such; but have endeavored utterly to reject them as a mechanical device of style, or as a family language which writers in metre seem to lay claim to by prescription. I have wished to keep the reader in the company of flesh and blood, persuaded that by so doing I shall interest him. Others who pursue a different track will interest him likewise. I do not interfere with their claim, but wish to prefer a claim of my own. There will also be found in these volumes little of what is usually called poetic diction; as much pains has been taken to avoid it as is ordinarily taken to produce it; this has been done for the reason already alleged, to bring my language near to the language of men; and further, because the pleasure which I have proposed to myself to impart, is of a kind very different from that which is supposed by many persons to be the proper object of poetry. Without being culpably particular, I do not know how to give my reader a more exact notion of the style in which it was my wish and intention to write, than by informing him that I have at all times endeavored to look steadily at my subject; consequently, there is, I hope, in these poems little falsehood of description, and my ideas are expressed in language fitted to their respective importance. Something must have been gained by this practice, as it is friendly to one property of all good poetry, namely, good sense: but it has necessarily cut me off from a large portion of phrases and figures of speech which from father to son have long been regarded as the common inheritance of poets. I have also thought it expedient to restrict myself still further, having abstained from the use of many expressions, in themselves proper and beautiful, but which have been foolishly repeated by bad poets, till such feelings of disgust are connected with them as it is scarcely possible by any art of association to overpower.

If in a poem there should be found a series of lines, or even a single line, in which the language, though naturally arranged, and according to the strict laws of metre, does not differ from that of prose, there is a numerous class of critics, who, when they stumble upon these prosaisms, as they call them, imagine that they have made a notable discovery, and exult over the poet as over a man ignorant of his own profession. Now these men would establish a canon of criticism which the reader will conclude he must utterly reject, if he wishes to be pleased with these volumes. And it would be a most easy task to prove to him that not only the language of a large portion of every good poem, even of the most elevated character, must necessarily, except with reference to the metre, in no respect differ from that of good prose, but likewise that some of the most interesting parts of the best poems will be found to be strictly the language of prose when prose is well written. The truth of this assertion might be demonstrated by innumerable passages from almost all the poetical writings, even of Milton himself. To illustrate the subject in a general manner, I will here adduce a short composition of Gray, who was at the head of those who, by their reasonings, have attempted to widen the space of separation betwixt prose and metrical composition, and was more than any other man curiously elaborate in the structure of his own poetic diction.

In vain to me the smiling mornings shine,
And reddening Phoebus lifts his golden fire,
The birds in vain their amorous descent join,
Or cheerful fields resume their green attire.
These ears, alas! for other notes repine,
A different object do these eyes require;
My lonely amish melts no heart but mine,
And in my breast the imperfect joys expire,
Yet morning smiles the busy race to cheer,
And new-born pleasure brings to happier men.
The fields to all their wonted tribute bear.

To warm their little loves the birds complain.
I fruitless mourn to him that cannot hear,
And weep the more because I weep in vain.

It will easily be perceived that the only part of this sonnet which is of any value is the lines printed in italics, it is equally obvious that, except in the rhyme, and in the use of the single word "fruitless" for "fruitlessly," which is so far a defect, the language of these lines does in no respect differ from that of prose.

By the foregoing quotation it has been shown that the language of prose may yet be well adapted to poetry; and it was previously asserted, that a large portion of the language of every good poem can in no respect differ from that of good prose. We will go further. It may be safely affirmed, that there neither is nor can be any essential difference between the language of prose and metrical composition. We are fond of tracing the resemblance between poetry and painting, and, accordingly, we call them sisters: but where shall we find bonds of connection sufficiently strict to typify the affinity betwixt metrical and prose composition? They both speak by and to the same organs, the bodies in which both of them are clothed may be said to be of the same substance, their affections are kindred and almost identical, not necessarily differing even in degree, poetry sheds no tears "such as angels weep," but natural and human tears; she can boast of no celestial ichor¹ that distinguishes her vital juices from those of prose; the same human blood circulates through the veins of them both.

If it be affirmed that rhyme and metrical arrangement of themselves constitute a distinction which overturns what has just been said on the strict affinity of metrical language with that of prose, and paves the way for other artificial distinctions which the mind voluntarily admits, I answer that the language of such poetry as is here recommended is, as far as is possible, a selection of the language really spoken by men: that this selection, wherever it is made with true taste and feeling, will of itself form a distinction far greater than would at first be imagined, and will entirely separate the composition from the vulgarity and meanness of ordinary life; and, if metre be superadded thereto, I believe that a dissimilitude will be produced altogether sufficient for the gratification of a rational mind. What other distinction would we find that flowed in the veins of the gods have? Whence is it to come? And where is it to exist? Not, surely, where the poet speaks through the mouths of his characters: it cannot be necessary here, either for elevation of style, or any of its supposed ornaments; for, if the poet's subject be judiciously chosen, it will naturally, and upon fit occasion, lead him to passions, the language of which, if selected truly and judiciously, must necessarily be dignified and variegated, and alive with metaphors and figures. I forbear to speak of an incongruity which would shock the intelligent reader, should the poet interweave any foreign splendor of his own with that which the passion naturally suggests. It is sufficient to say that such addition is unnecessary. And, surely, it is more probable that those passages, which with propriety abound with metaphors and figures, will have their due effect, if, upon other occasions where the passions are of a milder character, the style also be subdued and temperate.

But, as the pleasure which I hope to give by the poems now presented to the reader must depend entirely on just notions upon this subject, and, as it is in itself of high importance to our taste and moral feelings, I cannot content myself with these detached remarks. And if, in what I am about to say, it shall appear to some that my labor is unnecessary, and that I am like a man fighting a battle without enemies, such persons may be reminded that, whatever be the language outwardly holden by men, a practical faith in the opinions which I am wishing to establish is almost unknown. If my conclusions are admitted, and carried as far as they must be carried if admitted at all, our judgments concerning the works of the greatest poets, both ancient and modern, will be far different from what they are at present, both when we praise and when we censure: and our moral feelings influencing and influenced by these judgments will, I believe, be corrected and purified.

Taking up the subject, then, upon general grounds, let me ask, what is meant by the word poet? What is a poet? To whom does he address himself? And what language is to be expected from him?—He is a man speaking to men; a man, it is true, endowed with more lively sensibility, more enthusiasm and tenderness, who has a greater knowledge of human nature, and a more comprehensive soul, than are supposed to be common among mankind, a man pleased with his own passions and voltions, and who rejoices more than other men in the spirit of life that is in him, delighting to contemplate similar volitions and passions as manifested in the goings-on of the universe, and habitually impelled to create them where he does not find them. To these qualities he has added a disposition to be affected more than other men by absent things as if they were present, an ability of conjuring up in himself passions, which are indeed far from being the same as those produced by real events, yet (especially in those parts of the general sympathy which are pleasing and delightful) do more nearly resemble the passions produced by real events than anything which, from the motions of their own minds merely, other men are accustomed to feel in themselves—whence, and from practice, he has acquired a greater readiness and power in expressing what he thinks and feels, and especially those thoughts and feelings which, by his own choice, or from the structure of his own mind, arise in him without immediate external excitement.

But whatever portion of this faculty we may suppose even the greatest poet to possess, there cannot be a doubt that the language which it will suggest to him, must often, in liveliness and truth, fall short of that which is uttered by men in real life, under the actual pressure of those passions, certain shadows of which the poet thus produces, or feels to be produced, in himself.

However exalted a notion we would wish to cherish of the character of a poet, it is obvious that, while he describes and imitates passions, his employment is in some degree mechanical, compared with the freedom and power of real and substantial action and suffering. So that it will be the wish of the poet to bring his feelings near to those of the persons whose feelings he describes, nay, for short spaces of time, perhaps, to let himself slip into an entire delusion, and even confound and identify his own feelings with theirs, modifying only the language which is thus suggested to him by a consideration that he describes for a particular purpose, that of giving pleasure. Here, then, he will apply the principle of selection which has been already insisted upon. He will depend upon this for removing what would otherwise be painful or disgusting in the passion, he will feel that there is no necessity to trick out or to elevate nature. and, the more industriously he applies this principle, the deeper will be his faith that no words, which his fancy or imagination can suggest, will be to be compared with those which are the emanations of reality and truth.

But it may be said by those who do not object to the general spirit of these remarks, that, as it is impossible for the poet to produce upon all occasions language as exquisitely fitted for the passion as that which the real passion itself suggests, it is proper that he should consider himself as in the situation of a translator, who does not scruple to substitute excellencies of another kind for those which are unattainable by him, and endeavors occasionally to surpass his original, in order to make some amends for the general inferiority to which he feels that he must submit. But this would be to encourage idleness and unmanly despair. Further, it is the language of men who speak of what they do not understand, who talk of poetry, as of a matter of amusement and idle pleasure, who will converse with us as gravely about a taste for poetry, as they express it, as if it were a thing as indifferent as a taste for rope-dancing, or Frontinac or Sherry.¹ Aristotle, I have been told, has said that poetry is the most philosophic of all writing;² it is so: its object is truth, not individual and local, but general and operative, not standing upon external testimony, but carried alive into the heart by passion, truth which is its own testimony, which gives competence and confidence to the tribunal to which it appeals, and receives them from the same tribunal. Poetry is the image of man and nature. The obstacles which stand in the way of the fidelity of the biographer and historian, and of their consequent utility, are incalculably greater than those which are to be encountered by the poet who comprehends the dignity of his art. The poet writes under one restriction only, namely, the necessity of giving immediate pleasure to a human being possessed of that information which may be expected from him, not as a lawyer, a physician, a mariner, an astronomer, or a natural philosopher, but as a man. Except this one restriction, there is no object standing between the poet and the image of things; between this, and the biographer and historian, there are a thousand.

Nor let this necessity of producing immediate pleasure be considered as a degradation of the poet's art. It is far otherwise. It is an acknowledgment of the beauty of the universe, an acknowledgment the more sincere because not formal, but indirect; it is a task light and easy to him who looks at the world in the spirit of love: further, it is a homage paid to the native and naked dignity of man, to the grand elementary principle of pleasure, by which he knows, and feels, and lives, and moves. We have no sympathy but what is propagated by pleasure: I would not be misunderstood; but wherever we sympathize with pain, it will be found that the sympathy is produced and carried on by subtle combinations with pleasure. We have no knowledge, that is, no general principles drawn from the contemplation of particular facts, but what has been built up by pleasure, and exists in us by pleasure alone. The man of science, the chemist and mathematician, whatever difficulties and disgusts they may have had to struggle with, know and feel this. However painful may be the objects with which the anatomist's knowledge is connected, he feels that his knowledge is pleasure; and where he has no pleasure he has no knowledge. What then does the poet? He considers man and the objects that surround him as acting and reacting upon each other, so as to produce an infinite complexity of pain and pleasure, he considers man in his own nature and in his own ordinary life as contemplating this with a certain quantity of immediate knowledge, with certain convictions, intuitions, and deductions, which from habit acquire the quality of intuitions; he considers him as looking upon this complex scene of ideas and sensations, and finding everywhere objects that immediately excite in him sympathies which, from the necessities of his nature, are accompanied by an overbalance of enjoyment.

To this knowledge which all men carry about with them, and to these sympathies in which, without any other discipline than that of our daily life, we are fitted to take delight, the poet principally directs his attention. He considers man and nature as essentially adapted to each other, and the mind of man as naturally the mirror of the fairest and most interesting properties of nature. And thus the poet, prompted by this feeling of pleasure, which accompanies him through the whole course of his studies, converses with general nature, with affections akin to those which, through labor and length of time, the man of science has raised up in himself, by conversing with those particular parts of nature which are the objects of his studies. The knowledge both of the poet and the man of science is pleasure, but the knowledge of the one cleaves to us as a necessary part of our existence, our natural and unalienable inheritance; the other is a personal and individual acquisition, slow to come to us, and by no habitual and direct sympathy connecting us with our fellow-beings. The man of science seeks truth as a remote and unknown benefactor; he cherishes and loves it in his solitude the poet, singing a song in which all human beings join with him, rejoices in the presence of truth as our visible friend and hourly companion. Poetry is the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge; it is the impassioned expression which is in the countenance of all science. Emphatically may it be said of the poet, as Shakspeare hath said of man, "that he looks before and after" He is the rock of defense for human nature; an upholder and preserver, carrying everywhere with him relationship and love. In spite of difference of soil and climate, of language and manners, of laws and customs in spite of things silently gone out of mind, and things violently destroyed, the poet binds together by passion and knowledge the vast empire of human society, as it is spread over the whole earth, and over all time. The objects of the poet's thoughts are everywhere; though the eyes and senses of man are, it is true, his favorite guides, yet he will follow wheresoever he can find an atmosphere of sensation in which to move his wings. Poetry is the first and last of all knowledge—it is as immortal as the heart of man. If the labors of men of science should ever create any material revolution, direct or indirect, in our condition, and in the impressions which we habitually receive, the poet will sleep then no more than at present, he will be ready to follow the steps of the man of science, not only in those general indirect effects, but he will be at his side, carrying sensation into the midst of the objects of the science itself. The remotest discoveries of the chemist, the botanist, or mineralogist, will be as proper objects of the poet's art as any upon which it can be employed, if the time should ever come when these things shall be familiar to us, and the relations under which they are contemplated by the followers of these respective sciences shall be manifestly and palpably material to us as enjoying and suffering beings. If the time should ever come when what is now called science, thus familiarized to men, shall be ready to put on, as it were, a form of flesh and blood, the poet will lend his divine spirit to aid the transfiguration, and will welcome the being thus produced, as a dear and genuine inmate of the household of man. It is not, then, to be supposed that any one who holds that sublime notion of poetry which I have attempted to convey, will break in upon the sanctity and truth of his pictures by transitory and accidental ornaments, and endeavor to excite admiration of himself by arts, the necessity of which must manifestly depend upon the assumed meanness of his subject.

What has been thus far said applies to poetry in general, but especially to those parts of composition where the poet speaks through the mouths of his characters, and upon this point it appears to authorize the conclusion that there are few persons of good sense who would not allow that the dramatic parts of composition are defective, in proportion as they deviate from the real language of nature, and are colored by a diction of the poet's own, either peculiar to him as an individual poet or belonging simply to poets in general; to a body of men who, from the circumstance of their compositions being in metre, it is expected will employ a particular language.

It is not, then, in the dramatic parts of composition that we look for this distinction of language, but still it may be proper and necessary where the poet speaks to us in his own person and character. To this I answer by referring the reader to the description before given of a poet. Among the qualities there enumerated as principally conducing to form a poet, is implied nothing differing in kind from other men, but only in degree. The sum of what was said is, that the poet is chiefly distinguished from other men by a greater promptness to think and feel without immediate external excitement, and a greater power in expressing such thoughts and feelings as are produced in him in that manner. But these passions and thoughts and feelings are the general passions and thoughts and feelings of men. And with what are they connected? Undoubtedly with our moral sentiments and animal sensations, and with the causes which excite these; with the operations of the elements, and the appearances of the visible universe; with storm and sunshine, with the revolutions of the seasons, with cold and heat, with loss of friends and kindred, with injuries and resentments, gratitude and hope, with fear and sorrow. These, and the like, are the sensations and objects which the poet describes, as they are the sensations of other men, and the objects which interest them. The poet thinks and feels in the spirit of human passions. How, then, can his language differ in any material degree from that of all other men who feel vividly and see clearly? It might be proved that it is impossible. But supposing that this were not the case, the poet might then be allowed to use a peculiar language when expressing his feelings for his own gratification, or that of men like himself. But poets do not write for poets alone, but for men. Unless, therefore, we are advocates for that admiration which subsists upon ignorance, and that pleasure which arises from hearing what we do not understand, the poet must descend from this supposed height; and, in order to excite rational sympathy, he must express himself as other men express themselves. To this it may be added that while he is only selecting from the real language of men, or, which amounts to the same thing, composing accurately in the spirit of such selection, he is treading upon safe ground, and we know what we are to expect from him. Our feelings are the same with respect to metre; for, as it may be proper to remind the reader, the distinction of metre is regular and uniform, and not, like that which is produced by what is usually called poetic diction, arbitrary, and subject to infinite caprices upon which no calculation whatever can be made. In the one case, the reader is utterly at the mercy of the poet, respecting what imagery or diction he may choose to connect with the passion; whereas, in the other, the metre obeys certain laws, to which the poet and reader both willingly submit because they are certain, and because no interference is made by them with the passion but such as the concurring testimony of ages has shown to heighten and improve the pleasure which co-exists with it.

It will now be proper to answer an obvious question, namely, Why, professing these opinions, have I written in verse? To this, in addition to such answer as is included in what has been already said, I reply, in the first place, because, however I may have restricted myself, there is still left open to me what confessedly constitutes the most valuable object of all writing, whether in prose or verse; the great and universal passions of men, the most general and interesting of their occupations, and the entire world of nature before me—to supply endless combinations of forms and imagery. Now, supposing for a moment that whatever is interesting in these objects may be as vividly described in prose, why should I be condemned for attempting to superadd to such description the charm which, by the consent of all nations, is acknowledged to exist in metrical language? To this, by such as are yet unconvinced, it may be answered that a very small part of the pleasure given by poetry depends upon the metre, and that it is injudicious to write in metre, unless it be accompanied with the other artificial distinctions of style with which metre is usually accompanied, and that, by such deviation, more will be lost from the shock which will thereby be given to the reader's associations than will be counterbalanced by any pleasure which he can derive from the general power of numbers.¹ In answer to those who still contend for the necessity of accompanying metre with certain appropriate colors of style in order to the accomplishment of its appropriate end, and who also, in my opinion, greatly underrate the power of metre in itself, it might, perhaps, as far as relates to these volumes, have been almost sufficient to observe that poems are extant, written upon more humble subjects, and in a still more naked and simple style, which have continued to give pleasure from generation to generation. Now, if nakedness and simplicity be a defect, the fact here mentioned affords a strong presumption that poems somewhat less naked and simple are capable of affording pleasure at the present day; and, what I wished chiefly to attempt, at present, was to justify myself for having written under the impression of this belief.

But various causes might be pointed out why, when the style is manly, and the subjects of some importance, words metrically arranged will long continue to impart such a pleasure to mankind as he who proves the extent of that pleasure will be desirous to impart. The end of poetry is to produce excitement in co-existence with an overbalance of pleasure; but, by the supposition, excitement is an unusual and irregular state of the mind; ideas and feelings do not, in that state, succeed each other in accustomed order. If the words, however, by which this excitement is produced be in themselves powerful, or the images and feelings have an undue proportion of pain connected with them, there is some danger that the excitement may be carried beyond its proper bounds. Now the co-presence of something regular, something to which the mind has been accustomed in various moods and in a less excited state, cannot but have great efficacy in tempering and restraining the passion by an intertexture of ordinary feeling, and of feeling not strictly and necessarily connected with the passion. This is unquestionably true; and hence, though the opinion will at first appear paradoxical, from the tendency of metre to divest language, in a certain degree, of its reality, and thus to throw a sort of half-consciousness of unsubstantial existence over the whole composition, there can be little doubt but that more pathetic situations and sentiments, that is, those which have a greater proportion of pain connected with them, may be endured in metrical composition, especially in rhyme, than in prose. The metre of the old ballads is very artless; yet they contain many passages which would illustrate this opinion, and, I hope, if the following poems be attentively perused, similar instances will be found in them. This opinion may be further illustrated by appealing to the reader's own experience of the reluctance with which he comes to the re-perusal of the distressful parts of Clara Harlowe, or The Gamester; while Shakespeare's writings, in the most pathetic scenes, never act upon us, as pathetic, beyond the bounds of pleasure—an effect which, in a much greater degree than might at first be imagined, is to be ascribed to small, but continual and regular impulses of pleasurable surprise from the metrical arrangement—On the other hand (what it must be allowed will much more frequently happen) if the poet's words should be incommensurate with the passion, and inadequate to raise the reader to a height of desirable excitement, then (unless the poet's choice of his metre has been grossly injudicious) in the feelings of pleasure which the reader has been accustomed to connect with metre in general, and in the feeling, whether cheerful or melancholy, which he has been accustomed to connect with that particular movement of metre, there will be found something which will greatly contribute to impart passion to the words, and to effect the complex end which the poet proposes to himself.

If I had undertaken a systematic defense of the theory here maintained, it would have been my duty to develop the various causes upon which the pleasure received from metrical language depends. Among the chief of these causes is to be reckoned a principle which must be well known to those who have made any of the arts the object of accurate reflection, namely, the pleasure which the mind derives from the perception of similitude in dissimilitude. This principle is the great spring of the activity of our minds, and their chief feeder. From this principle the direction of the sexual appetite, and all the passions connected with it, take their origin: it is the life of our ordinary conversation, and upon the accuracy with which similitude in dissimilitude, and dissimilitude in similitude are perceived, depend our taste and our moral feelings. It would not be a useless employment to apply this principle to the consideration of metre, and to show that metre is hence enabled to afford much pleasure, and to point out in what manner that pleasure is produced. But my limits will not permit me to enter upon this subject, and I must content myself with a general summary.

I have said that poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings; it takes its origin from emotion recollected in tranquillity, the emotion is contemplated till, by a species of reaction, the tranquillity gradually disappears, and an emotion, kindred to that which was before the subject of contemplation, is gradually produced, and does itself actually exist in the mind. In this mood successful composition generally begins, and in a mood similar to this it is carried on, but the emotion, of whatever kind, and in whatever degree, from various causes, is qualified by various pleasures, so that in describing any passions whatsoever, which are voluntarily described, the mind will, upon the whole, be in a state of enjoyment. If Nature be thus cautious to preserve in a state of enjoyment a being so employed, the poet ought to profit by the lesson held forth to him, and ought especially to take care that, whatever passions he communicates to his reader, those passions, if his reader's mind be sound and vigorous, should always be accompanied with an overbalance of pleasure. Now the music of harmonious metrical language, the sense of difficulty overcome, and the blind association of pleasure which has been previously received from works of rhyme or metre of the same or similar construction, an indistinct perception perpetually renewed of language closely resembling that of real life, and yet, in the circumstance of metre, differing from it so widely—all these imperceptibly make up a complex feeling of delight, which is of the most important use in tempering the painful feeling always found intermingled with powerful descriptions of the deeper passions. This effect is always produced in pathetic and impassioned poetry, while, in lighter compositions, the ease and gracefulness with which the poet manages his numbers are themselves confessedly a principal source of the gratification of the reader. All that it is necessary to say, however, upon this subject, may be effected by affirming, what few persons will deny, that of two descriptions, either of passions, manners, or characters, each of them equally well executed, the one in prose and the other in verse, the verse will be read a hundred times where the prose is read once.

Having thus explained a few of my reasons for writing in verse, and why I have chosen subjects from common life, and endeavored to bring my language near to the real language of men, if I have been too minute in pleading my own cause, I have at the same time been treating a subject of general interest; and for this reason a few words shall be added with reference solely to these particular poems, and to some defects which will probably be found in them. I am sensible that my associations must have sometimes been particular instead of general, and that, consequently, giving to things a false importance, I may have sometimes written upon unworthy subjects; but I am less apprehensive on this account, than that my language may frequently have suffered from those arbitrary connections of feelings and ideas with particular words and phrases, from which no man can altogether protect himself. Hence I have no doubt that, in some instances, feelings, even of the ludicrous, may be given to my readers by expressions which appeared to me tender and pathetic. Such faulty expressions, were I convinced they were faulty at present, and that they must necessarily continue to be so, I would willingly take all reasonable pains to correct. But it is dangerous to make these alterations on the simple authority of a few individuals, or even of certain classes of men, for where the understanding of an author is not convinced, or his feelings altered, this cannot be done without great injury to himself: for his own feelings are his stay and support; and, if he set them aside in one instance, he may be induced to repeat this act till his mind shall lose all confidence in itself, and become utterly debilitated. To this it may be added, that the reader ought never to forget that he is himself exposed to the same errors as the poet, and, perhaps, in a much greater degree for there can be no presumption in saying of most readers that it is not probable they will be so well acquainted with the various stages of meaning through which words have passed, or with the fickleness or stability of the relations of particular ideas to each other; and, above all, since they are so much less interested in the subject, they may decide lightly and carelessly.

Long as the reader has been detained, I hope he will permit me to caution him against a mode of false criticism which has been applied to poetry, in which the language closely resembles that of life and nature. Such verses have been triumphed over in parodies, of which Dr Johnson's stanza is a fair specimen:—

I put my hat upon my head
And walked into the Strand,
And there I met another man Whose hat was in his hand

Immediately under these lines I will place one of the most justly-admired stanzas of The Babes in the Wood.

These pretty babes with hand in hand Went wandering up and down,
But never more they saw the Man Approaching from the Town

In both these stanzas the words, and the order of the words, in no respect differ from the most unimpassioned conversation. There are words in both, for example, "the Strand," and "the Town," connected with none but the most familiar ideas; yet the one stanza we admit as admirable, and the other as a fair example of the superlatively contemptible. Whence arises this difference? Not from the metre, not from the language, not from the order of the words; but the manner expressed in Dr Johnson's stanza is contemptible. The proper method of treating trivial and simple verses, to which Dr. Johnson's stanza would be a fair parallelism, is not to say, This is a bad kind of poetry, or, This is not poetry; but, This wants sense; it is neither interesting in itself, nor can lead to anything interesting; the images neither originate in that sane state of feeling which arises out of thought, nor can excite thought or feeling in the reader. This is the only sensible manner of dealing with such verses. Why trouble yourself about the species till you have previously decided upon the genus? Why take pains to prove that an ape is not a Newton, when it is self-evident that he is not a man?

I must make one request of my reader, which is, that in judging these poems he would decide by his own feelings genuinely, and not by reflection upon what will probably be the judgment of others. How common is it to hear a person say, "I myself do not object to this style of composition, or this or that expression, but to such and such classes of people, it will appear mean or ludicrous!" This mode of criticism, so destructive of all sound unadulterated judgment, is almost universal let the reader then abide independently by his own feelings, and if he finds himself affected, let him not suffer such conjectures to interfere with his pleasure

If an author, by any single composition, has impressed us with respect for his talents, it is useful to consider this as affording a presumption, that on other occasions where we have been displeased, he, nevertheless, may not have written ill or absurdly, and, further, to give him so much credit for this one composition as may induce us to review what has displeased us, with more care than we should otherwise have bestowed upon it. This is not only an act of justice, but, in our decisions upon poetry especially, may conduce, in a high degree, to the improvement of our own taste: for an accurate taste in poetry, and in all the other arts, as Sir Joshua Reynolds has observed, is an acquired talent, which can only be produced by thought and a long-continued intercourse with the best models of composition. This is mentioned, not with so ridiculous a purpose as to prevent the most inexperienced reader from judging for himself (I have already said that I wish him to judge for himself), but merely to temper the rashness of decision, and to suggest that, if poetry be a subject on which much time has not been bestowed, the judgment may be erroneous; and that, in many cases, it necessarily will be so.

Nothing would, I know, have so effectually contributed to further the end which I have in view, as to have shown of what kind the pleasure is, and how that pleasure is produced, which is confessedly produced by metrical composition essentially different from that which I have here endeavored to recommend. for the reader will say that he has been pleased by such composition, and what more can be done for him? The power of any art is limited, and he will suspect that, if it be proposed to furnish him with new friends, that can be only upon condition of his abandoning his old friends. Besides, as I have said, the reader is himself conscious of the pleasure which he has received from such composition, composition to which he has peculiarly attached the endearing name of poetry; and all men feel an habitual gratitude, and something of an honorable bigotry for the objects which have long continued to please them; we not only wish to be pleased, but to be pleased in that particular way in which we have been accustomed to be pleased. There is in these feelings enough to resist a host of arguments, and I should be the less able to combat them successfully, as I am willing to allow that, in order entirely to enjoy the poetry which I am recommending, it would be necessary to give up much of what is ordinarily enjoyed. But, would my limits have permitted me to point out how this pleasure is produced, many obstacles might have been removed, and the reader assisted in perceiving that the powers of language are not so limited as he may suppose, and that it is possible for poetry to give other enjoyments, of a purer, more lasting, and more exquisite nature. This part of the subject has not been altogether neglected; but it has not been so much my present aim to prove, that the interest excited by some other kinds of poetry is less vivid, and less worthy of the nobler powers of the mind, as to offer reasons for presuming that, if my purpose were fulfilled, a species of poetry would be produced, which is genuine poetry, in its nature well adapted to interest mankind permanently, and likewise important in the multiplicity and quality of its moral relations

From what has been said, and from a perusal of the poems, the reader will be able clearly to perceive the object which I had in view, he will determine how far it has been attained, and, what is a much more important question, whether it be worth attaining; and upon the decision of these two questions will rest my claim to the approbation of the public.

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE
(1772-1834)

1789

1834

As late I journey'd o'er the extensive plain Where native Otter sports his scanty
stream,
Musing in torpid woe a sister's pain,
The glorious prospect woke me from the dream.

- 5 At every step it widen'd to my sight—Wood, meadow, verdant hill, and dreary
steep,
Following in quick succession of delight,— Till all—at once—did my eye ravish'd sweep!

- May this (I cried) my course through life portray!
10 New scenes of wisdom may each step display,
And knowledge open as my days advance!
Till what time Death shall pour the undarken'd ray,
My eye shall dart thro' infinite expanse,
And thought suspended lie in rapture's blissful trance

PANTISOCRACY¹
1794 1849

- No more my visionary soul shall dwell On joys that were; no more endure to weigh
The shame and anguish of the evil day, Wisely forgetful! O'er the ocean swell 5 Sublime of Hope, I seek the cottag'd dell
Where Virtue calm with careless step may stray,
And dancing to the moonlight roundelay,
The wizard Passions weave an holy spell Eyes that have ach'd with sorrow! Ye shall weep 10 Tears of doubt-mingled joy, like theirs who start
From precipices of distemper'd sleep, On which the fierce-eyed fiends their revels keep,
And see the rising sun, and feel it dart New rays of pleassance trembling to the
heart

munity which Coleridge and Southey planned in 1794 to establish in America.

TO A YOUNG ASS

ITS MOTHER BEING TETHERED NEAR IT

1794

1794

Poor little foal of an oppress'd race!
I love the languid patience of thy face:
And oft with gentle hand I give thee bread, And clap thy ragged coat, and pat thy
head.

- 5 But what thy dulled spirits hath dismay'd,
That never thou dost sport along the glade?
And (most unlike the nature of things young)

That earthward still thy moveless head is hung?

- Do thy prophetic fears anticipate, 10 Meek child of Misery! thy future fate?
The starving meal, and all the thousand aches

"Which patient merit of the unworthy takes"?'¹

Or is thy sad heart thrill'd with filial pain
To see thy wretched mother's shorten'd chain?

- 15 And truly, very piteous is her lot—
'Chain'd to a log within a narrow spot, Where the close-eaten grass is scarcely
seen,
While sweet around her waves the tempting green!

Poor Ass! thy master should have learnt to show

- 20 Pity—best taught by fellowship of Woe!
For much I fear me that he lives like thee, Half famish'd in a land of Luxury!
How askingly its footsteps hither bend!
It seems to say, "And have I then one
friend?"

- 25 Innocent foal! thou poor despis'd forlorn!

I hail thee brother—spite of the fool's
scorn!

And fain would take thee with me, in the Dell

Of Peace and mild Equality to dwell, Where Toil shall call the charmer Health his bride,

- 30 And Laughter tinkle Plenty's ribless side!
How thou wouldst toss thy heels in game-some play,

And frisk about, as lamb or kitten gay!
Yea! and more musically sweet to me

- Thy dissonant harsh bray of joy would be, 35 Than warbled melodies that soothe to rest
The aching of pale Fashion's vacant breast!

LA FAYETTE

1794 1794

As when far off the warbled strains are heard That soar on Morning's wing the vales among;
Within his cage the imprison'd matin bird¹ Swells the full chorus with a generous song.

⁵ He bathes no pinion in the dewy light,
No father's joy, no lover's bliss he shares, Yet still the rising radiance cheers his sight—
His fellows' freedom soothes the captive's cares!

Thou, Fayette! who didst wake with startling voice ¹⁰ Life's better sun from that long wintry night, Thus in thy Country's triumphs shalt rejoice And mock with raptures high the dungeon's might.

For lo! the morning struggles into day,
And Slavery's spectres shriek and vanish from the ray!

KOSKIUSKO

1794 1794

O what a loud and fearful shriek was there,
As though a thousand souls one death-groan pour'd!
Ah me! they saw beneath a hireling's sword Their Koskiusko fall! Through the swart all

⁵ (As pauses the tir'd Cossac's barbarous yell Of triumph) on the chill and midnight gale Rises with frantic burst or sadder swell
The dirge of murder'd Hope! while Freedom pale

Bends in such anguish o'er her destin'd bier,

¹⁰ As if from eldest time some Spirit meek Had gather'd in a mystic urn each tear
That ever on a patriot's furrow'd cheek

Fit channel found; and she had drain'd the bowl
In the mere wilfulness, and sick despair of soul!

TO THE REVEREND W. L. BOWLES

1794 1794

My heart has thank'd thee, Bowles! for those soft strains Whose sadness soothes me, like the murmuring Of wild-bees in the sunny showers of spring!
For hence not callous to the mourner's pains

⁵ Through Youth's gay prime and thornless paths I went And when the mightier Throes of mind began,
And drove me forth, a thought-bewilder'd man,
Their mild and manliest melancholy lent
A mingled charm, such as the pang consign'd ¹⁰ To slumber, though the big tear it renew'd, Bidding a strange mysterious Pleasure brood Over the wavy and tumultuous mind,

As the great Spirit erst with plastic sweep Mov'd on the darkness of the unform'd deep!

THE EOLIAN HARP

COMPOSED AT CLEVEDON, SOMERSETSHIRE

1795 1796

My pensive Sara! thy soft cheek reclined Thus on mine arm, most soothing sweet it is To sit beside our cot, our cot o'ergrown
With white-flower'd jessmin, and the broad-leav'd myrtle,

⁵ (Meet emblems they of innocence and love!)
And watch the clouds, that late were rich with light, Slow saddening round, and mark the star of eve Serenely brilliant (such should wisdom be) Shine opposite! How exquisite the scents ¹⁰ Snatch'd from yon bean-field! and the world so hush'd!
The stilly murmur of the distant sea
Tells us of silence.

¹ See Genesis, 1-2² Sara Fricker, whom Coleridge married, in October, 1795, before taking up his residence at Clevedon

And that simplest lute, Placed length-ways in the clasping casement, hark!
How by the desultory breeze caress'd, 15 Like some coy maid half yielding to her lover,
It pours such sweet upbraiding, as must needs Tempt to repeat the wrong! And now, its strings
Bolder swept, the long sequacious¹ notes
Over delicious surges sink and rise, 20 Such a soft floating witchery of sound
As twilight Elfins make, when they at eve Voyage on gentle gales from Fairy-Land, Where Melodies round honey-dropping
flowers,
Footless and wild, like birds of Paradise, 25 Nor pause, nor perch, hovering on untam'd wing!
O! the one life within us and abroad, Which meets all motion and becomes its
soul,
A light in sound, a sound-like power in
light,
Rhythm in all thought, and joyance every where—
30 Methinks, it should have been impossible
Not to love all things in a world so fill'd, Where the breeze warbles, and the mute still air
Is Music slumbering on her instrument.

And thus, my love! as on the midway slope
35 Of yonder hill I stretch my limbs at noon, Whilst through my half-clos'd eye-lids I behold
The sunbeams dance, like diamonds, on the main,
And tranquil muse upon tranquillity;
Full many a thought uncall'd and undetain'd, 40 And many idle fitting phantasies, Traverse my indolent and passive brain,
As wild and various as the random gales
That swell and flutter on this subject lute!

And what if all of animated nature 45 Be but organic harps diversely fram'd, That tremble into thought, as o'er them sweeps
Plastic and vast, one intellectual breeze,
At once the soul of each, and God of all?
But thy more serious eye a mild reproof 50 Darts, O beloved woman! nor such thoughts Dim and unhallow'd dost thou not reject,

And biddest me walk humbly with my God.
Meek daughter in the family of Christ!
Well hast thou said and holily disprais'd 55 These shapings of the unregenerate mind; Bubbles that glitter as they rise and break
On vain Philosophy's aye-babbling spring.
For never guiltless may I speak of him,
The Incomprehensible! save when with awe 60 I praise him, and with faith that inly feels;
Who with his saving mercies healed me,
A sinful and most miserable man, Wilder'd and dark, and gave me to possess Peace, and this cot, and thee, heart-honor'd maid!

REFLECTIONS ON HAVING LEFT A PLACE OF RETIREMENT¹

1795

1796

Low was our pretty cot· our tallest rose Peep'd at the chamber-window We could hear
At silent noon, and eve, and early morn,
The sea's faint murmur In the open air 5 Our myrtles blossom'd, and across the porch Thick jasmuns twined· the little landscape round
Was green and woody, and refresh'd the
eye
It was a spot which you might aptly call The Valley of Seclusion! Once I saw 10 (Hallowing his Sabbath-day by quietness) A wealthy son of commerce saunter by, Bristow's citizen methought, it calm'd His thirst of idle gold, and made him muse With wiser feelings for he paus'd, and look'd 15 With a pleas'd sadness, and gaz'd all
around,
Then eyed our cottage, and gaz'd round
again,
And sigh'd, and said, it was a blessed
place.
And we were bless'd Oft with patient ear Long-listening to the viewless sky-lark's
note
20 (Viewless, or haply for a moment seen Gleaming on sunny wings) in whisper'd tones I've said to my beloved, "Such, sweet girl!
The inobtrusive song of happiness, Unearthly minstrelsy! then only heard 25 When the soul seeks to hear; when all is hush'd,
And the heart listens!"

and note 2 (p. 329)

But the time, when first From that low dell, steep up the stony mount
 I climb'd with perilous toil and reach'd the top,
 Oh! what a goodly scene! Here the bleak mount,
 30 The bare bleak mountain speckled thin with sheep, Gray clouds, that shadowing spot the sunny fields,
 And river, now with bushy rocks o'erbrow'd,
 Now winding bright and full, with naked
 banks,
 And seats, and lawns, the abbey and the
 wood, 35 And cots, and hamlets, and faint city-
 spire;
 The Channel there, the Islands and white sails,
 Dnn coasts, and cloud-like hills, and shore-less Ocean—
 It seem'd like Omnipresence! God, ne-
 thought,
 Had built Him there a temple: the whole
 world
 40 Seem'd imag'd in its vast circumference
 No wish profan'd my overwhelm'd heart Blest hour! It was a luxury,—to be!

Ah! quiet dell! dear cot, and mount
 sublime!
 I was constrain'd to quit you Was it
 right, 45 While my unnumber'd brethren toil'd and bled,
 That I should dream away the entrusted
 hours
 On rose-leaf beds, pampering the coward
 heart
 With feelings all too delicate for use?
 Sweet is the tear that from some Howard's
 eye
 50 Drops on the cheek of one he lifts from
 earth
 And he that works me good with unmov'd face,
 Does it but half he chills me while he aids,
 My benefactor, not my brother man!
 Yet even this, this cold beneficence 55 Praise, praise it, O my Soul! oft as thou scanst
 The sluggish Pity's vision-weaving tribe!
 Who sigh for wretchedness, yet shun the wretched,
 Nursing in some delicious solitude Their slothful loves and dainty sympathies!

60 I therefore go, and join head, heart, and
 hand,
 Active and firm, to fight the bloodless fight
 Of science, freedom, and the truth in Christ

Yet oft when after honorable toil Rests the tir'd mind, and waking loves to dream,

65 My spirit shall revisit thee, dear cot!
 Thy jasmun and thy window-peeping rose,
 And myrtles fearless of the mild sea-air.
 And I shall sigh fond wishes—sweet
 abode!

Ah!—had none greater! And that all had such!

70 It might be so—but the time is not yet Speed it, O Father! Let thy Kingdom come!

SONNET

TO A FRIEND WHO ASKED HOW I FELT WHEN THE NURSE FIRST PRESENTED MY

INFANT TO ME

1796

1797

Charles! my slow heart was only sad, when first

I scan'd that face of feeble infancy:
 For dimly on my thoughtful spirit burst All I had been, and all my child might be!

5 But when I saw it on its mother's arm, And hanging at her bosom (she the
 while Bent o'er its features with a tearful
 smile)

Then I was thrill'd and melted, and most warm

Impress'd a father's kiss: and all beguil'd

10 Of dark remembrance and presageful
 fear,

I seem'd to see an angel-form appear—
 'Twas even thine, beloved woman mild!

No for the mother's sake the child was
 dear,

And dearer was the mother for the child

ODE ON THE DEPARTING YEAR

1796

1798

Spirit who sweepst the wild harp of
 Time!

It is most hard, with an untroubled ear
 Thy dark unweaved harmonies to hear!

Yet, mine eye fix'd on Heaven's unchanging clime

5 Long had I listen'd, free from mortal
fear,

With inward stillness, and a bow'd
mind;

When lo! its folds far waving on the
wind,

I saw the train of the Departing Year!
Starting from my silent sadness

10 Then with no unholy madness, Ere yet the enter'd cloud foreclos'd my
sight,

I rais'd the impetuous song, and solemn-iz'd his flight.

Hither, from the recent tomb,
From the prison's direr gloom,

15 From Distemper's midnight anguish;
And thence, where Poverty doth waste and languish,

Or where, his two bright torches
blending,

Love illumines Manhood's maze;
Or where o'er cradled infants bend-

20 ing,
Hope has fix'd her wishful gaze;
Hither, in perplex'd dance,

Ye Woes! ye young-eyed Joys! advance!

By Time's wild harp, and by the hand Whose indefatigable sweep

25 Raises its fateful strings from
sleep,

I bid you haste, a mix'd tumultuous
band!

From every private bower,
And each domestic hearth,

Haste for one solemn hour;

30 And with a loud and yet a louder
voice,

O'er Nature struggling in portentous
birth,

Weep and rejoice!

Still echoes the dread Name! that o'er the
earth

Let slip the storm, and woke the brood of Hell:

35 And now advance in saintly Jubilee Justice and Truth! They too have heard thy spell,

They too obey thy name, divinest Liberty!

I mark'd Ambition in his war-array!

I heard the mail'd Monarch's trou-bulous cry—

40 "Ah! wherefore does the Northern 'on-quereess' stay!

Groans not her chariot on its onward
way?"

Fly, mail'd Monarch, fly!

Stunn'd by Death's twice mortal mace,

No more on Murder's lurid face

45 The insatiate hag shall gloat with drunken
eye!

Manes of the unnumber'd slain!

Ye that gasp'd on Warsaw's plain!¹

Ye that erst at Ismail's tower,²

When human ruin choked the streams,

50 Fell in Conquest's glutt'd hour,

Mid women's shrieks and infants' screams!

Spirits of the uncoffin'd slain,

Sudden blasts of triumph swelling,

Oft, at night, in misty train,

55 Rush around her narrow dwelling!

The exterminating fiend is fled—

(Foul her life, and dark her doom)

Mighty armies of the dead

Dance, like death-fires, round her tomb!

60 Then with prophetic song relate,

Each some Tyrant-Murderer's fate!

Departing Year! 'twas on no earthly
shore

My soul beheld thy Vision!⁴ Where
alone,

Voiceless and stern, before the cloudy throne,

65 Aye Memory sits thy robe inscrib'd with gore,

With many an unimaginable groan

Thou storied'st thy sad hours! Silence ensued,

Deep silence o'er the ethereal multitude, Whose locks with wreaths, whose wreaths with glories shone.

70 Then, his eye wild ardors glancing,

From the choired gods advancing,

The Spirit of the Earth made reverence
meet,

And stood up, beautiful, before the cloudy
seat.

Throughout the blissful throng, 75 Hush'd were harp and song Till wheeling round the throne the Lam-pads' seven,
 (The mystic Words of Heaven)
 Permissive signal make The fervent Spirit bow'd, then spread his wings and spake!
 80 "Thou in stormy blackness throning Love and uncreated Light,
 By the Earth's unsolaced groaning, 125 Seize thy terrors, Arm of might!
 By Peace with proffer'd insult scared,

 By years of Havoc yet unborn!
 And Hunger's bosom to the frost-winds bared!
 But chief by Afric's wrongs,
 Strange, horrible, and foul!

 To the deaf Synod, 'full of gifts and
 lies'
 By Wealth's insensate laugh! by Torture's howl!
 Avenger, rise!
 Forever shall the thankless Island cowl,

 Speak! from thy storm-black Heaven, O speak aloud!
 And on the darkling foe Open thine eye of fire from some uncertain cloud!
 O dart the flash! O rise and deal the blow!

 Hark! how wide Nature joins her groans
 below!
 Rise, God of Nature, rise!"

The voice had ceas'd, the Vision fled;
 Yet still I gasp'd and reel'd with dread 105 And ever, when the dream of night
 Renews the phantom to my sight,
 Cold sweat-drops gather on my limbs;
 My ears throb hot; my eye-balls start:
 My brain with horrid tumult swims, 110 Wild is the tempest of my heart;
 And my thick and struggling breath Imitates the toil of death!
 No stranger agony confounds

 115 When all foredone with toil and wounds, Death-like he dozes among heaps of
 dead!

THIS LIME-TREE BOWER MY PRISON

ADDRESSED TO CHARLES LAMB, OF THE INDIA HOUSE, LONDON
1797 1800

Well, they are gone, and here must I
remain,

This lime-tree bower my prison! I have lost

Beauties and feelings, such as would have been

Most sweet to my remembrance even when
age

5 Had dimm'd mine eyes to blindness!
They, meanwhile,

Friends, whom I never more may meet
again,

On springy heath, along the hill-top edge, Wander in gladness, and wind down, per-
chance,

To that still roaring dell, of which I told;

10 The roaring dell, o'erwooded, narrow,
deep,

And only speckled by the mid-day sun;
Where its slim trunk the ash from rock to rock

Fling's arching like a bridge,—that branch-less ash,

Unsun'd and damp, whose few poor yellow leaves

15 Ne'er tremble in the gale, yet tremble
still,

Fann'd by the waterfall! and there my friends

Behold the dark green file of long, lank
weeds,

That all at once (a most fantastic sight!) Still nod and drip beneath the dripping
edge

20 Of the blue clay-stone.

¹ The Seraphim were angels of purification by fire, and guardians of the throne of Jehovah.

Now, my friends emerge

Beneath the wide, wide Heaven—and view
again

The many-steepled tract magnificent Of hilly fields and meadows, and the sea,
With some fair bark, perhaps, whose sails light up

25 The slip of smooth clear blue betwixt two isles

Of purple shadow! Yes! they wander on In gladness all; but thou, methinks, most glad,

My gentle-hearted Charles! for thou hast pined

And hunger'd after Nature, many a year, 30 In the great City pent, winning thy way With sad yet patient soul, through evil and pain

And strange calamity! Ah! slowly sink Behind the western ridge, thou glorious
Sun!

Shine in the slant beams of the sinking orb, 35 Ye purple heath-flowers! richer burn, ye clouds!

Love in the yellow light, ye distant groves!
And kindle, thou blue Ocean! So my friend Struck with deep joy may stand, as I have stood,

Silent with swimming sense, yea, gazing
round

40 On the wide landscape, gaze till all doth seem

Less gross than bodily; and of such hues As veil the Almighty Spirit, when yet he makes

Spirits perceive his presence

A delight

Comes sudden on my heart, and I am glad 45 As I myself were there! Nor in this bower, This little lime-tree bower, have I not mark'd

Much that has sooth'd me. Pale beneath the blaze

Hung the transparent foliage, and I watch'd

Some broad and sunny leaf, and lov'd to
see

50 The shadow of the leaf and stem above Dappling its sunshine! And that walnut-tree

Was richly ting'd, and a deep radiance lay Full on the ancient ivy, which usurps Those fronting elms, and now, with blackest mass

55 Makes their dark branches gleam a lighter hue

Through the late twilight and though now the bat

Wheels silent by, and not a swallow twitters,
 Yet still the solitary humble-bee Sings in the bean-flower! Henceforth I shall know 60 That Nature ne'er deserts the wise and pure;
 No plot so narrow, be but Nature there,
 No waste so vacant, but may well employ Each faculty of sense, and keep the heart Awake to Love and Beauty! and sometimes 65 'Tis well to be bereft of promis'd good,
 That we may lift the soul, and contemplate
 With lively joy the joys we cannot share My gentle-hearted Charles! when the last 100 look
 Beat its straight path along the dusky air 70 Homewards, I blest it! deeming its black wing
 (Now a dim speck, now vanishing in light)
 Had cross'd the mighty orb's dilated glory, While thou stood'st gazing, or, when all was still,
 Flew creaking o'er thy head, and had a charm 75 For thee, my gentle-hearted Charles, to whom
 No sound is dissonant which tells of life

THE DUNGEON

1797 1798

And this place our forefathers made for
 man!
 This is the process of our love and wisdom.
 To each poor brother who offends against us—
 Most innocent, perhaps — and what if guilty?
 5 Is this the only cure? Merciful God!
 Each pore and natural outlet shrivell'd up By Ignorance and parching Poverty,
 His energies roll back upon his heart, And stagnate and corrupt, till chang'd to poison, 10 They break out on him, like a loathsome plague-spot,
 Then we call in our pamper'd moun-te-
 banks—
 And this is their best cure! uncomforted And friendless solitude, groaning and
 tears,
 And savage faces, at the clanking hour, 15 Seen through the steams and vapors of his dungeon,
 By the lamp's dismal twilight! So he lies Circled with evil, till his very soul Unmoulds its essence, hopelessly deform'd By sights of ever more deformity!

20 With other ministrations thou, O Nature!
 Healest thy wandering and distemper'd
 child.
 Thou pourest on him thy soft influences, Thy sunny hues, fair forms, and breathing sweets,
 Thy melodies of woods, and winds, and waters,
 25 Till he relent, and can no more endure
 To be a jarring and a dissonant thing, Amid this general dance and minstrelsy,
 But, bursting into tears, wins back his way,
 His angry spirit heal'd and harmoniz'd 30 By the benignant touch of Love and Beauty

THE RIME OF THE ANCIENT MARINER

IN SEVEN PARTS

1797-98

1798

ARGUMENT

How a Ship having passed the Line was driven by storms to the cold Country towards the South Pole, and how from thence she made her course to the tropical Latitude of the Great Pacific Ocean, and of the strange things that befell, and in what manner the Ancient Mariner came back to his own Country

PART I

It is an ancient Mariner,
 And he stoppeth one of three
 "By thy long gray beard and glittering
 eye,
 Now wherefore stopp'st thou me?
 5 The Bridegroom's doors are opened wide,
 And I am next of kin;
 The guests are met, the feast is set May'st hear the merry din."
 He holds him with his skinny hand, 10 "There was a ship," quoth he "Hold off! unhand me, gray-beard loon!"
 Eftsoons his hand dropt he.
 He holds him with his glittering eye—
 The Wedding-Guest stood still, 15 And listens like a three years' child.
 The Mariner hath his will
 The Wedding-Guest sat on a stone:
 He cannot choose but hear;
 And thus spake on that ancient man,
 20 The bright-eyed Mariner

1-12 An ancient Mariner meeteth three Gallants bidden to a wedding feast, and detaineth
 one

13-21 The Wedding-Guest is spell-bound by the eye of the old seafaring man, and constrained to hear his tale.

"The ship was cheered, the harbor cleared, Merrily did we drop Below the knik, below the hill,
Below the lighthouse top.

- 25 The Sun came up upon the left,
Out of the sea came he'
And he shone bright, and on the right
Went down into the sea.

- Higher and higher every day, 30 Till over the mast at noon—"
The Wedding-Guest here beat his breast,
For he heard the loud bassoon.

- The bride hath paced into the hall,
Red as a rose is she,
35 Nodding their heads before her goes
The merry minstrelsy

- The Wedding-Guest he beat his breast, Yet he cannot choose but hear,
And thus spake on that ancient man,
40 The bright-eyed Mariner

"And now the Storm-blast came, and he Was tyrannous and strong
He struck with his o'ertaking wings,
And chased us south along

- 45 With sloping masts and dipping prow,
As who pursued with yell and blow Still treads the shadow of his foe,
And forward bends his head,
The ship drove fast, loud roared the blast, 50 And southward aye we fled

And now there came both mist and snow,
And it grew wondrous cold
And ice, mast-high, came floating by,
As green as emerald

- 55 And through the drifts the snowy clifts
Did send a dismal sheen Nor shapes of men nor beasts we ken—
The ice was all between

- The ice was here, the ice was there, 60 The ice was all around It cracked and growled, and roared and howled,
Like noises in a swound!'

21-30. The Mariner tells how the ship sailed southward with a good wind and fair weather, till it reached the Line.

31-40. The Wedding-Guest heareth the bridal music, but the Mariner continueth his tale.

41-50. The ship driven by a storm toward the south pole.

51-62. The land of ice, and of fearful sounds, where no living thing was to be seen

'swound, dream

At length did cross an Albatross, Thorough the fog it came,
65 As if it had been a Christian soul,
We hailed it in God's name.

It ate the food it ne'er had eat,
And round and round it flew.
The ice did split with a thunder-fit, 70 The helmsman steered us through!

And a good south wind sprung up behind;
The Albatross did follow,
And every day, for food or play,
Came to the mariners' hollo!

- 75 In mist or cloud, on mast or shroud,
It perched for vespers nine, Whiles all the night, through fog-smoke
white,
Glimmered the white moon-shine."

- "God save thee, ancient Mariner!
80 From the fiends, that plague thee thus!— Why look'st thou so?'"—"With my crossbow
I shot the Albatross!"

PART II

- "The Sun now rose upon the right
Out of the sea came he,
85 Still hid in mist, and on the left
Went down into the sea.

And the good south wind still blew behind,
But no sweet bird did follow,
Nor any day for food or play
90 Came to the mariners' hollo!

- And I had done a hellish thing,
And it would work 'em woe
For all averred, I had killed the bird
That made the breeze to blow
95 'Ah wretch!' said they, 'the bird to slay,
That made the breeze to blow!'

- Nor dim nor red, like God's own head,
The glorious Sun uprist.
Then all averred, I had killed the bird
That brought the fog and mist.
100 'Twas right,' said they, 'such birds to slay,
That bring the fog and mist'

63-70. Till a great sea-bird called the Albatross, came through the snow-fog, and was received with great joy and hospitality

71-78. And lo! the Albatross proveth a bird of good omen, and followeth the ship as it returned northward through fog and floating ice

79-82. The ancient Mariner inhospitably kill eth the pious bird of good omen

83-86. His shipmates cry out against the ancient Mariner, for killing the bird of good luck.

87-102. But when the fog cleared off, they justify the same, and thus make themselves accomplices in the crime.

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow followed free;
105 We were the first that ever buist Into that silent sea.

Down dropt the breeze, the sails dropt
down,
'Twas sad as sad could be,
And we did speak only to break 110 The silence of the sea!

All in a hot and copper sky,
The bloody Sun, at noon,
Right up above the mast did stand,
No bigger than the Moon.

115 Day after day, day after day,
We stuck, nor breath nor motion,
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean

Water, water, everywhere, 120 And all the boards did shrink;
Water, water, everywhere,
Nor any drop to drink

The very deep did rot O Christ!
That ever this should be!
125 Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs Upon the slimy sea

About, about, in reel and rout
The death-fires¹ danced at night,
The water, like a witch's oils, 130 Burnt green, and blue, and white

And some in dreams assuréd were
Of the Spirit that plagued us so, Nine fathom deep he had followed us
From the land of mist and snow

135 And every tongue, through utter drought, Was withered at the root,
We could not speak, no more than if We had been choked with soot

103-106 The fair breeze continues, the ship enters the Pacific Ocean, and sails northward, even till it reaches the Line

107-118 The ship hath been suddenly becalmed

119-130 And the Albatross begins to be avenged

131-138 A Spirit had followed them, one of the invisible inhabitants of this planet, neither departed souls nor angels, concerning whom the learned Jew, Josephus and the Platonic Constantinopolitan, Michael Pselus, may be consulted. They are very numerous, and there is no climate or element without one or more

¹ phosphorescent lights (supposed to forebode death)

Ah! well-a-day! what evil looks 140 Had I from old and young!
Instead of the cross, the Albatross
About my neck was hung

PART III

"There passed a weary time Each throat
Was parched, and glazed each eye 145 A weary time! a weary time!
How glazed each weary eye,
When looking westward, I beheld
A something in the sky

At first it seemed a little speck, 150 And then it seemed a mist, It moved and moved, and took at last A certain shape, I wist.¹

A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist!
And still it neared and neared:
155 As if it dodged a water-sprite,
It plunged and tacked and veered.

With throats unslaked, with black lips
baked,
We could nor laugh nor wail,
Though utter drought all dumb we stood!
160 I bit my arm, I sucked the blood,
And cried, A sail! a sail!

With throats unslaked, with black lips
baked,
Agape they heard me call:
165 Gramercy!² they for joy did grin,
And all at once their breath drew in,
As they were drinking all.

See! see! (I cried) she tacks no more!
Hither to work us weal,
Without a breeze, without a tide, 170 She steadies with upright keel!

The western wave was all a-flame
The day was well nigh done!
Almost upon the western wave Rested the broad bright Sun, 175 When that strange shape drove suddenly Betwixt us and the Sun

130-142 The shipmates, in their sore distress, would fain throw the whole guilt on the ancient Mariner, in sign whereof they hang the dead sea-bird round his neck.

143-156 The ancient Mariner beholdeth a sign in the element afar off

157-163 At its nearer approach, it seemeth him to be a ship, and at a dear ransom he freeth his speech from the bonds of thirst

164-166 A flash of joy

167-176 And horror follows. For can it be a ship that comes onward without wind or tide?

² great thanks

And straight the Sun was flecked with bars, (Heaven's Mother send us grace!)

As if through a dungeon-grate he peered 180 With broad and burning face.

Alas! (thought I, and my heart beat loud)
How fast she nears and nears!
Are those her sails that glance in the Sun,
Like restless gossameres?¹

185 Are those her ribs through which the Sun Did peer, as through a grate?
And is that Woman all her crew?
Is that a Death? and are there two?
Is Death that woman's mate?

190 Her lips were red, her looks were free,
Her locks were yellow as gold.
Her skin was as white as leprosy,
The Nightmare Life-in-Death was she,
Who thicks man's blood with cold.

195 The naked hulk alongside came,
And the twain were casting dice,
'The game is done' I've won! I've won!
Quoth she, and whistles thrice.

The Sun's rim dips; the stars rush out:
200 At one stride comes the dark,
With far-heard whisper, o'er the sea,
Off shot the spectre-bark

We listened and looked sideways up!
Fear at my heart, as at a cup, 205 My life-blood seemed to sip!
The stars were dim, and thick the night,
The steersman's face by his lamp gleamed
white,

From the sails the dew did drip—Till clomb above the eastern bar 210 The horned Moon, with one bright star Within the nether tip.

One after one, by the star-dogged Moon,
Too quick for groan or sigh,
Each turned his face with a ghastly pang, 215 And cursed me with his eye.

Four times fifty living men,
(And I heard nor sigh nor groan)

177-186 It seemeth him but the skeleton of a ship. And its ribs are seen as bars on the face of the setting Sun

187-194 The Spectre-Woman and her Death mate, and no other on board the skeleton-ship. Like vessel, like crew!

195-198 Death and Life-in-Death have dined for the ship's crew, and she (the latter) winneth the ancient Mariner

199-202 No twilight within the courts of the Sun

203-223 At the rising of the Moon, one after another his shipmates drop down dead. But Life-in-Death begins her work on the ancient Mariner

With heavy thump, a lifeless lump,
They dropped down one by one.

220 The souls did from their bodies fly,—
They fled to bliss or woe!
And every soul, it passed me by,
Like the whizz of my cross-bow!"

PART IV

"I fear thee, ancient Mariner!
225 I fear thy skinny hand!
And thou art long, and lank, and brown,
As is the ribbed sea-sand.

I fear thee and thy glittering eye,
And thy skinny hand, so brown."— 230 "Fear not, fear not, thou Wedding-Guest!
This body dropt not down.

Alone, alone, all, all alone,
Alone on a wide, wide sea!
And never a saint took pity on 235 My soul in agony

The many men, so beautiful!
And they all dead did lie
And a thousand thousand slimy things Lived on, and so did I

240 I looked upon the rotting sea,
And drew my eyes away,
I looked upon the rotting deck,
And there the dead men lay

I looked to heaven, and tried to pray; 245 But or ever a prayer had gusht,
A wicked whisper came, and made
My heart as dry as dust.

I closed my lids, and kept them close,
And the balls like pulses beat; 250 For the sky and the sea, and the sea and the sky
Lay like a load on my weary eye,
And the dead were at my feet

The cold sweat melted from their limbs, Nor rot nor reek did they:
255 The look with which they looked on me
Had never passed away

An orphan's curse would drag to hell
A spirit from on high;
But oh! more horrible than that 260 Is the curse in a dead man's eye!
Seven days, seven nights, I saw that curse,
And yet I could not die.

224-235 The Wedding-Guest feareth that a Spirit is talking to him, but the ancient Mariner assureth him of his bodily life, and proceedeth to relate his horrible penance

236-252 He despiseth the creatures of the calm, and envleth that they should live, and so many lie dead

253-262 But the curse liveth for him in the eye of the dead men.

The moving moon went up the sky,
And nowhere did abide:
285 Softly she was going up,
And a star or two beside—

Her beams bemoaned the sultry main,
Like April hoar-frost spread,
But where the ship's huge shadow lay, 270 The charmed water burnt alway
A still and awful red.

Beyond the shadow of the ship,
I watched the water-snakes:
They moved in tracks of shining white, 275 And when they reared, the elfish light Fell off in hoary flakes.

Within the shadow of the ship
I watched their rich attire—Blue, glossy green, and velvet black 280 They coiled and swam, and every track Was a flash of golden fire.

O happy living things! no tongue
Their beauty might declare.
A spring of love gushed from my heart,
285 And I blessed them unaware Sure my kind saint took pity on me,
And I blessed them unaware

The self-same moment I could pray,
And from my neck so free 290 The Albatross fell off, and sank Like lead into the sea

PART V

“Oh sleep! it is a gentle thing, Beloved from pole to pole!
To Mary Queen the praise be given!
295 She sent the gentle sleep from Heaven,
That slid into my soul.

The silly¹ buckets on the deck,
That had so long remained,
I dreamt that they were filled with dew, 300 And when I awoke, it rained

283-271 In his loneliness and fixedness he yearneth towards the journeying Moon, and the stars that still sojourn, yet still move onward, and everywhere the blue sky belongs to them, and in their appointed rest, and their native country and their own natural homes, which they enter unannounced as lords that are certainly expected, and yet there is a silent joy at their arrival

272-281 By the light of the Moon he beholdeth God's creatures of the great calm 282-283. Their beauty and their happiness 284-287 He blesseth them in his heart 288-291 The spell begins to break 292-308 By grace of the holy Mother, the ancient Mariner is refreshed with rain

¹ Innocent (or, possibly, useless)

My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank;
Sure I had drunken in my dreams,
And still my body drank.

305 I moved, and could not feel my limbs I was so light—almost
I thought that I had died in sleep,
And was a blessed ghost.

And soon I heard a roaring wind 310 It did not come anear,
But with its sound it shook the sails,
That were so thin and sere.

The upper air burst into life!
And a hundred fire-flags sheen,¹ 315 To and fro they were hurried about!
And to and fro, and in and out,
The wan stars danced between

And the coming wind did roar more loud,
And the sails did sigh like sedge, 320 And the rain poured down from one black
cloud,
The Moon was at its edge.

The thick black cloud was cleft, and still The Moon was at its side Like water shot from some high crag, 325 The lightning fell with never a jag,
A river steep and wide

The loud wind never reached the ship, Yet now the ship moved on!
Beneath the lightning and the Moon 330 The dead men gave a groan

They groaned, they stirred, they all uprose, Nor spake, nor moved their eyes,
It had been strange, even in a dream,
To have seen those dead men rise

335 The helmsman steered, the ship moved on,
Yet never a breeze up-blew;
The mariners all 'gan work the ropes,
Where they were wont to do;
They raised their limbs like lifeless tools—340 We were a ghastly crew

309-326 He heareth sounds and seeth strange sights and commotions in the sky and the element

327-376 The bodies of the ship's crew are inspired, and the ship moves on, but not by the souls of the men, nor by demons of earth or middle air, but by a blessed troop of angelic spirits, sent down by the invocation of the guardian saint

¹ bright

The body of my brother's son Stood by me, knees to knee.
 The body and I pulled at one rope,
 But he said nought to me."

345 "I fear thee, ancient Mariner!"
 "Be calm, thou Wedding-Guest!
 'Twas not those souls that fled in pain,
 Which to their corpses came again,
 But a troop of spirits blest:

350 For when it dawned—they dropped their arms,
 And clustered round the mast, Sweet sounds rose slowly through their mouths,
 And from their bodies passed

Around, around, flew each sweet sound, 355 Then darted to the Sun;
 Slowly the sounds came back again,
 Now mixed, now one by one.

Sometimes a-dropping from the sky
 I heard the skylark sing; 360 Sometimes all little birds that are,
 How they seemed to fill the sea and air
 With their sweet jargoning!

And now 'twas like all instruments,
 Now like a lonely flute, 365 And now it is an angel's song,
 That makes the heavens be mute

It ceased, yet still the sails made on A pleasant noise till noon,
 A noise like of a hidden brook 370 In the leafy month of June,
 That to the sleeping woods all night
 Singeth a quiet tune.

Till noon we quietly sailed on,
 Yet never a breeze did breathe 375 Slowly and smoothly went the ship, Moved onward from beneath.

Under the keel nine fathom deep,
 From the land of mist and snow,
 The spirit slid: and it was he 380 That made the ship to go.
 The sails at noon left off their tune,
 And the ship stood still also.

The Sun, right up above the mast,
 Had fixed her to the ocean.
 385 But in a minute she 'gan stir,

377-392 The lonesome Spirit from the south-pole carries on the ship as far as the Line, in obedience to the angelic troop, but still requirerth vengeance.

With a short uneasy motion—
 Backwards and forwards half her length
 With a short uneasy motion.

Then like a pawing horse let go, 390 She made a sudden bound:
 It flung the blood into my head,
 And I fell down in a swoond.

How long in that same fit I lay,
 I have not¹ to declare;
 But ere my living life returned,
 I heard and in my soul discerned
 Two voices in the air.

'Is it he?' quoth one, 'Is this the man?
 By him who died on cross, 400 With his cruel bow he laid full low
 The harmless Albatross.

The spirit who bideth by himself
 In the land of mist and snow,
 He loved the bird that loved the man 405 Who shot him with his bow.'

The other was a softer voice,
 As soft as honey-dew:
 Quoth he, 'The man hath penance done,
 And penance more will do.'

PART VI

FIRST VOICE

410 "'But tell me, tell me!' speak again, Thy soft response renewing—
 What makes that ship drive on so fast?
 What is the ocean doing?'

SECOND VOICE

'Still as a slave before his lord, 415 The ocean hath no blast;
 His great bright eye most silently
 Up to the Moon is cast—

If he may know which way to go;
 For she guides him smooth or grim 420 See, brother, see! how graciously She looketh down on him.'

393-409. The Polar Spirit's fellow-demons, the invisible inhabitants of the element, take part in his wrong; and two of them relate one to the other, that penance long and heavy for the ancient Mariner hath been accorded to the Polar Spirit, who returneth southward.

410-429. The Mariner hath been cast into a trance; for the angelic power causeth the vessel to drive northward faster than human life could endure

¹ have not the power

FIRST VOICE

'But why drives on that ship so fast,
Without or wave or wind?'

SECOND VOICE

'The air is cut away before, 425 And closes from behind.

Fly, brother, fly! more high, more high!
Or we shall be belated.
For slow and slow that ship will go,
When the Mariner's trance is abated '

430 I woke, and we were sailing on As in a gentle weather.
'Twas night, calm night, the moon was
high;
The dead men stood together

All stood together on the deck, 435 For a charnel-dungeon fitter:
All fixed on me their stony eyes,
That in the Moon did glitter

The pang, the curse, with which they died,
Had never passed away
440 I could not draw my eyes from theirs, Nor turn them up to pray

And now this spell was snapt: once more
I viewed the ocean green,
And looked far forth, yet little saw 445 Of what had else been seen—

Like one, that on a lonesome road Doth walk in fear and dread,
And having once turned round walks on,
And turns no more his head, 450 Because he knows, a frightful fiend Doth close behind him tread.

But soon there breathed a wind on me,
Nor sound nor motion made Its path was not upon the sea, 455 In ripple or in shade

It raised my hair, it fanned my cheek
Like a meadow-gale of spring—
It mingled strangely with my fears, Yet it felt like a welcoming 460 Swiftly, swiftly flew the ship, Yet she sailed softly too Sweetly, sweetly blew the breeze—

On me alone it blew.

430-441. The supernatural motion is retarded; the Mariner awakes, and his penance begins anew

442-463 The curse is finally expiated

Oh! dream of joy! is this indeed 465 The light-house top I see?
Is this the hill? is this the kirk?
Is this mine own countree?

We drifted o'er the harbor-bar,
And I with sobs did pray—470 O let me be awake, my God!
Or let me sleep alway

The harbor-bay was clear as glass,
So smoothly it was strewn!
And on the bay the moonlight lay, 475 And the shadow of the Moon

The rock shone bright, the kirk no less,
That stands above the rock.
The moonlight steeped in silentness
The steady weathercock.

480 And the bay was white with silent light, Till rising from the same,
Full many shapes, that shadows were,
In crimson colors came

A little distance from the prow 485 Those crimson shadows were I turned my eyes upon the deck—
Oh, Christ! what saw I there!

Each corse lay flat, lifeless and flat,
And, by the holy rood!¹
490 A man all light, a seraph-man,
On every corse there stood.

This seraph-band, each waved his hand.
It was a heavenly sight!
They stood as signals to the land, 495 Each one a lovely light,

This seraph-band, each waved his hand,
No voice did they impart—
No voice, but oh! the silence sank Like music on my heart

500 But soon I heard the dash of oars,
I heard the Pilot's cheer,
My head was turned perforce away
And I saw a boat appear

The Pilot and the Pilot's boy, 505 I heard them coming fast.
Dear Lord in Heaven! it was a joy
The dead men could not blast

464-479 And the ancient Mariner beholdeth his native country 480-499 The angelic spirits leave the dead

¹ cross

I saw a third—I heard his voice.
It is the Hermit good!

- 510 He singeth loud his godly hymns
That he makes in the wood He'll shrive my soul, he'll wash away
The Albatross's blood.

PART VII

- “This Hermit good lives in that wood 515 Which slopes down to the sea
How loudly his sweet voice he hears!
He loves to talk with mariners That come from a far countree

- He kneels at morn, and noon, and eve—520 He hath a cushion plump
It is the moss that wholly hides
The rotted old oak-stump

- The skiff-boat neared I heard them talk, ‘Why this is strange, I trow!’
525 Where are those lights so many and fair, That signal made but now?’

- ‘Strange, by my faith!’ the Hermit said—‘And they answered not our cheer!
The planks look warped!’ and see those
sails,
530 How thin they are and sere!
I never saw aught like to them, Unless perchance it were

- Brown skeletons of leaves that lag
My forest-brook along, 535 When the ivy-tod¹ is heavy with snow,
And the owlet whoops to the wolf below,
That eats the she-wolf’s young’

- ‘Dear Lord!’ it hath a fiendish look’— (The Pilot made reply) 540 ‘I am a-fear’d’—‘Push on, push on!’
Said the Hermit cheerily

- The boat came closer to the ship,
But I nor spake nor stirred,
The boat came close beneath the ship, 545 And straight a sound was heard.

Under the water it rumbled on,
Still louder and more dread
It reached the ship, it split the bay;
The ship went down like lead.

- 550 Stunned by that loud and dreadful sound,
Which sky and ocean smote,

513-545 The Hermit of the Wood approacheth the ship with wonder.

548-549 The ship suddenly sinketh

Lake one that hath been seven days drowned
My body lay afloat,
But swift as dreams, myself I found 555 Within the Pilot’s boat.

Upon the whirl, where sank the ship,
The boat spun round and round,
And all was still, save that the hull Was telling of the sound

- 560 I moved my lips—the Pilot shrieked
And fell down in a fit,
The holy Hermit raised his eyes,
And prayed where he did sit

- I took the oars—the Pilot’s boy, 565 Who now doth crazy go, Laughed loud and long, and all the while His eyes went to and fro ‘Ha! ha!’ quoth he, ‘full plain I see,
The Devil knows how to row’

- And now, all in my own countree, 570 I stood on the firm land!
The Hermit stepped forth from the boat,
And scarcely he could stand

- ‘Oh shrive me, shrive me, holy man!’
575 The Hermit crossed his brow!
‘Sav quick,’ quoth he, ‘I bid thee say—What manner of man art thou?’

- Forthwith this frame of mine was wrenched
With a woful agony, 580 Which forced me to begin my tale,
And then it left me free

- Since then, at an uncertain hour,
That agony returns.
And till my ghastly tale is told, 585 This heart within me burns.

- I pass, like night, from land to land,
I have strange power of speech,
That moment that his face I see,
I know the man that must hear me 590 To him my tale I teach

What loud uproar bursts from that door!
The wedding-guests are there
But in the garden-bower the bride

550-578 The ancient Mariner is saved in the Pilot’s boat.

574-581 The ancient Mariner earnestly entreateth the Hermit to shrive him, and the penance of life falls on him.

582-625 And ever and anon throughout his future life an agony constraineth him to travel from land to land and to teach, by his own example, love and reverence to all things that God made and loveth

¹ made the sign of the cross on his forehead

And bride-maids singing are:
 595 And hark the little vesper bell,
 Which biddeth me to prayer!

O Wedding-Guest! this soul hath been Alone on a wide, wide sea
 So lonely 'twas, that God himself 600 Scarce seeméd there to be.

O sweeter than the marriage-feast,
 'Tis sweeter far to me,
 To walk together to the kirk
 With a goodly company!—

605 To walk together to the kirk,
 And all together pray,
 While each to his great Father bends, Old men, and babes, and loving friends
 And youths and maidens gay!

610 Farewell, farewell! but this I tell To thee, thou Wedding-Guest!
 He prayeth well, who loveth well Both man and bird and beast

He prayeth best, who loveth best 615 All things both great and small,
 For the dear God who loveth us,
 He made and loveth all!"

The Mariner, whose eye is bright, Whose beard with age is hoar, 620 Is gone and now the Wedding-Guest Turned from the bridegroom's door

He went like one that hath been stunned,
 And is of sense forlorn!
 A sadder and a wiser man, 625 He rose the morrow morn.

CHRISTABEL

1797 1800 1810

1797 1810

'Tis the middle of night by the castle clock,
 And the owls have awakened the crowing cock,

Tu—whit! — Tu—whoo!
 And hark, again! the crowing cock, 5 How drowsily it crew

Sir Leoline, the Baron rich, Hath a toothless mastiff bitch;
 From her kennel beneath the rock
 She maketh answer to the clock, 10 Four for the quarters, and twelve for the
 hour;

¹ deprived

Ever and aye, by shine and shower, Sixteen short howls, not over loud,
 Some say, she sees my lady's shroud.

Is the night chilly and dark?
 15 The night is chilly, but not dark
 The thin gray cloud is spread on high,
 It covers but not hides the sky.
 The moon is behind, and at the full,
 And yet she looks both small and dull 20 The night is chill, the cloud is gray.
 'Tis a month before the month of May,
 And the Spring comes slowly up this way

The lovely lady, Christabel, Whom her father loves so well, 25 What makes her in the wood so late,
 A furlong from the castle gate?
 She had dreams all yesternight
 Of her own betrothed knight,
 And she in the midnight wood will pray 30 For the weal of her lover that's far away

She stole along, she nothing spoke,
 The sighs she heaved were soft and low,
 And naught was green upon the oak
 But moss and rarest mistletoe:
 35 She kneels beneath the huge oak tree,
 And in silence prayeth she

The lady sprang up suddenly,
 The lovely lady, Christabel!
 It moaned as near, as near can be, 40 But what it is she cannot tell — On the other side it seems to be,
 Of the huge, broad-breasted, old oak tree.

The night is chill, the forest bare,
 Is it the wind that moaneth bleak?
 45 There is not wind enough in the air
 To move away the ringlet curl
 From the lovely lady's cheek—
 There is not wind enough to twirl
 The one red leaf, the last of its clan, 50 That dances as often as dance it can,
 Hanging so light, and hanging so high,
 On the topmost twig that looks up at the sky.

Hush, beating heart of Christabel!
 Jesu, Maria, shield her well!
 55 She folded her arms beneath her cloak,
 And stole to the other side of the oak.
 What sees she there?

There she sees a damsel bright,
 Drest in a silken robe of white, 60 That shadowy in the moonlight shone:
 The neck that made that white robe wan,

- Her stately neck, and arms were bare,
Her blue-veined feet unsandal'd were,
And wildly glittered here and there 65 The gems entangled in her hair.
I guess, 'twas frightful there to see A lady so richly clad as she—Beautiful exceedingly!
- "Mary Mother, save me now!"
70 Said Christabel; "and who art thou?"
- The lady strange made answer meet,
And her voice was faint and sweet —
"Have pity on my sore distress,
I scarce can speak for weariness:
75 Stretch forth thy hand, and have no
fear!"
Said Christabel, "How camest thou 125
here?"
And the lady, whose voice was faint and
sweet,
Did thus pursue her answer meet.—
- "My sire is of a noble line, 80 And my name is Geraldine:
Five warriors seized me yesternorn,
Me, even me, a maid forlorn:
They choked my cries with force and fright,
And tied me on a palfrey white 85 The palfrey was as fleet as wind,
And they rode furiously behind They spurred amain, their steeds were white:
And once we crossed the shade of night.
As sure as Heaven shall rescue me, 90 I have no thought what men they be, Nor do I know how long it is (For I have lain entranced I wis) Since one, the tallest of the five,
Took me from the palfrey's back, 95 A weary woman, scarce alive.
Some muttered words his comrades spoke
He placed me underneath this oak;
He swore they would return with haste;
Whither they went I cannot tell—100 I thought I heard, some minutes past, Sounds as of a castle bell Stretch forth thy hand"—thus ended she—
"And help a wretched maid to flee"
- Then Christabel stretched forth her hand, 105 And comforted fair Geraldine.
"O well, bright dame! may you command
The service of Sir Leoline;
And gladly our stout chivalry Will he send forth and friends withal
- 110 To guide and guard you safe and free Home to your noble father's hall."
- She rose: and forth with steps they passed That strove to be, and were not, fast.
Her gracious stars the lady blest, 115 And thus spake on sweet Christabel
"All our household are at rest,
The hall is silent as the cell,
Sir Leoline is weak in health,
And may not well awakened be,
120 But we will move as if in stealth,
And I beseech your courtesy,
This night, to share your couch with me."
- They crossed the moat, and Christabel Took the key that fitted well;
A little door she opened straight,
All in the middle of the gate;
The gate that was ironed within and without,
Where an army in battle array had marched out.
The lady sank, belike through pain,¹ 130 And Christabel with might and main Lifted her up, a weary weight,
Over the threshold of the gate:
Then the lady rose again.
And moved, as she were not in pain
- 135 So free from danger, free from fear, They crossed the court: right glad they
were.
And Christabel devoutly cried
To the lady by her side,
"Praise we the Virgin all divine 140 Who hath rescued thee from thy distress!"
"Alas, alas!" said Geraldine,
"I cannot speak for weariness."
So free from danger, free from fear,
They crossed the court right glad they
were.
- 145 Outside her kennel, the mastiff old Lay fast asleep, in moonshine cold.
The mastiff old did not awake, Yet she an angry moan did make!
And what can ail the mastiff bitch?
150 Never till now she uttered yell Beneath the eye of Christabel.
Perhaps it is the owl's scritch.
For what can ail the mastiff bitch?²

¹ Geraldine was an evil spirit and was unable without aid to cross the threshold, which had been blessed to keep evil spirits away

² Animals were supposed to know when super-natural beings were near.

They passed the hall, that echoes still, 155 Pass as lightly as you will!
 The brands were flat, the brands were dying,
 Amid their own white ashes lying,
 But when the lady passed, there came A tongue of light, a fit of flame, 160 And Christabel saw the lady's eye,
 And nothing else saw she thereby, Save the boss of the shield of Sir Leoline tall,
 Which hung in a murky old niche in the wall.
 "O softly tread," said Christabel, 165 "My father seldom sleepeth well."

Sweet Christabel her feet doth bare,
 And jealous of the listening air
 They steal their way from stair to stall,
 Now in glimmer, and now in gloom, 170 And now they pass the Baron's room,
 As still as death, with stifled breath!
 And now have reached her chamber door,
 And now doth Geraldine press down
 The rushes of the chamber floor.

175 The moon shines dim in the open air,
 And not a moonbeam enters here.
 But they without its light can see The chamber carved so curiously, Carved with figures strange and sweet, 180 All made out of the carver's brain,
 For a lady's chamber meet.
 The lamp with twofold silver chain Is fastened to an angel's feet.

The silver lamp burns dead and dim, 185 But Christabel the lamp will trim.
 She trimmed the lamp, and made it bright,
 And left it swinging to and fro,
 While Geraldine, in wretched plight, Sank down upon the floor below.

190 "O weary lady, Geraldine,
 I pray you, drink this cordial wine!
 It is a wine of virtuous powers,
 My mother made it of wild flowers."

"And will your mother pity me, 195 Who am a maiden most forlorn?" Christabel answered: "Woe is me!
 She died the hour that I was born
 I have heard the gray-haired friar tell How on her death-bed she did say, 200 That she should hear the castle-bell Strike twelve upon my wedding-day O mother dear! that thou wert here!"
 "I would," said Geraldine, "she were!"

But soon with altered voice, said she 205 "Off, wandering mother! Peak and pine!
 I have power to bid thee flee."
 Alas! what ails poor Geraldine?
 Why stares she with unsettled eye?
 Can she the bodiless dead espy?
 210 And why with hollow voice cries she,
 "Off, woman, off! this hour is mine—Though thou her guardian spirit be, Off, woman, off! 'tis given to me!"

Then Christabel knelt by the lady's side, 215 And raised to heaven her eyes so blue—
 "Alas!" said she, "this ghastly ride—Dear lady! it hath wildered you!"
 The lady wiped her moist cold brow,
 And faintly said, "'Tis over now!"

220 Again the wild-flower wine she drank
 Her fair large eyes 'gan glitter bright,
 And from the floor whereon she sank,
 The lofty lady stood upright.
 She was most beautiful to see, 225 Like a lady of a far countrée.

And thus the lofty lady spake
 "All they who live in the upper sky, Do love you, holy Christabel!
 And you love them, and for their sake 230 And for the good which me befel, Even I in my degree will try,
 Fair maiden, to requite you well
 But now unrobe yourself; for I Must pray, ere yet in bed I lie."

235 Quoth Christabel, "So let it be!"
 And as the lady bade, did she.
 Her gentle limbs did she undress,
 And lay down in her loveliness

But through her brain of weal and woe 240 So many thoughts moved to and fro,
 That vain it were her lids to close,
 So half-way from the bed she rose,
 And on her elbow did recline
 To look at the lady Geraldine.

245 Beneath the lamp the lady bowed,
 And slowly rolled her eyes around,
 Then drawing in her breath aloud,
 Like one that shuddered, she unbound
 The cincture from beneath her breast.
 250 Her silken robe, and inner vest, Dropt to her feet, and full in view, Behold! her bosom and half her side—
 A sight to dream of, not to tell!
 O shield her! shield sweet Christabel!

- 255 Yet Geraldine nor speaks nor stirs; Ah! what a stricken look was hers!
 Deep from within she seems half-way To lift some weight with sick assay,
 And eyes the maid and seeks delay;
 260 Then suddenly, as one defied, Collects herself in scorn and pride,
 And lay down by the maiden's side!—
 And in her arms the maid she took,
 Ah wel-a-day!
 265 And with low voice and doleful look These words did say—
 "In the touch of this bosom there worketh a spell,
 Which is lord of thy utterance, ('hristabel!
 Thou knowest tonight, and wilt know to-morrow, 270 This mark of my shame, this seal of my
 sorrow,
 But vainly thou warrest,
 For this is alone in Thy power to declare,
 That in the dim forest 275 Thou heard'st a low moaning.
 And found'st a bright lady, surpassingly
 fair,
 And didst bring her home with thee in love and in charity.
 To shield her and shelter her from the damp air "

THE CONCLUSION TO PART I

- It was a lovely sight to see 280 The lady Christabel, when she Was praying at the old oak tree.
 Amid the jagged shadows
 Of mossy leafless boughs, Kneeling in the moonlight, 285 To make her gentle vows,
 Her slender palms together prest, Heaving sometimes on her breast,
 Her face resigned to bliss or bale—
 Her face, oh, call it fair not pale, 290 And both blue eyes more bright than clear, Each about to have a tear.

- With open eyes (ah, woe is me!)
 Asleep, and dreaming fearfully, Fearfully dreaming, yet, I wis, 295 Dreaming that alone, which is—O sorrow and shame! Can this be she,
 The lady, who knelt at the old oak tree?
 And lo! the worker of these harms,
 That holds the maiden in her arms, 300 Seems to slumber still and mild,
 As a mother with her child.

- A star hath set, a star hath risen, O Geraldine! since arms of thine
 Have been the lovely lady's prison.
 305 O Geraldine! one hour was thine—Thou'st had thy will! By tairn and rill,
 The night-birds all that hour were still.
 But now they are jubilant anew,
 From cliff and tower, tu—whoo! tu—whoo!
 310 Tu—whoo! tu—whoo! from wood and fell!

- And see! the lady Christabel Gathers herself from out her trance,
 Her limbs relax, her countenance Grows sad and soft; the smooth thin lids 315 Close o'er her eyes, and tears she sheds—Large tears that leave the lashes bright!
 And oft the while she seems to smile
 As infants at a sudden light!
 Yea, she doth smile, and she doth weep, 320 Like a youthful hermitess, Beauteous in a wilderness,
 Who, praying always, prays in sleep.
 And, if she move unquietly, Perchance, 'tis but the blood so free 325 Comes back and tingles in her feet.
 No doubt, she hath a vision sweet.
 What if her guardian spirit 'twere, What if she knew her mother near?
 But this she knows, in joys and woes, 330 That saints will aid if men will call:
 For the blue sky bends over all!

1800

1816

- Each matin bell, the Baron saith, Knells us back to a world of death
 These words Sir Leoline first said, 335 When he rose and found his lady dead
 These words Sir Leoline will say Many a morn to his dying day!

- And hence the custom and law began That still at dawn the sacristan, 340 Who duly pulls the heavy bell, Five and forty beads must tell Between each stroke—a warning knell,
 Which not a soul can choose but hear From Bratha Head to Wyndermere.

- Saith Bracy the bard, "So let it knell"
 And let the drowsy sacristan Still count as slowly as he can!"
 There is no lack of such, I ween, As well fill up the space between.
 350 In Langdale Pike¹ and Witch's Lair,
 And Dungeon-ghyll² so foully rent,

¹ peak² valley

With ropes of rock and bells of an Three sinful sextons' ghosts are pent,
 Who all give back, one after t'other, 355 The death-note to their living brother,
 And oft too, by the knell offended,
 Just as their one! two! three! is ended,
 The devil mocks the doleful tale
 With a merry peal from Borodale.

360 The air is still! through mist and cloud That merry peal comes ringing loud,
 And Geraldine shakes off her dread,
 And rises lightly from the bed,
 Puts on her silken vestments white, 365 And tucks her hair in lovely plight,
 And nothing doubting of her spell Awakens the lady Christabel.
 "Sleep you, sweet lady Christabel!
 I trust that you have rested well."

370 And Christabel awoke and spied
 The same who lay down by her side—O rather say, the same whom she Raised up beneath the old oak tree!
 Nay, fairer yet! and yet more fair!
 375 For she belike hath drunken deep
 Of all the blessedness of sleep!
 And while she spake, her looks, her air Such gentle thankfulness declare,
 That (so it seemed) her girded vests 380 Grew tight beneath her heaving breasts.
 "Sure I have sinn'd!" said Christabel,
 "Now heaven be praised if all be well!"
 And in low faltering tones, yet sweet, Did she the lofty lady greet 385 With such perplexity of mind
 As dreams too lively leave behind

So quickly she rose, and quickly arrayed Her maiden limbs, and having prayed That He, who on the cross did groan, 390 Might wash away her sins unknown,
 She forthwith led fair Geraldine
 To meet her sire, Sir Leoline.

The lovely maid and the lady tall
 Are pacing both into the hall, 395 And pacing on through page and groom, Enter the Baron's presence-room.

The Baron rose, and while he prest
 His gentle daughter to his breast, With cheerful wonder in his eyes 400 The lady Geraldine espies,
 And gave such welcome to the same,
 As might beseem so bright a dame!

But when he heard the lady's tale,
 And when she told her father's name,

1 manner

405 Why waxed Sir Leoline so pale, Murmuring o'er the name again,
 Lord Roland de Vaux of Tryermaine!

Alas! they had been friends in youth,
 But whispering tongues can poison truth,
 410 And constancy lives in realms above;
 And life is thorny, and youth is vain,
 And to be wroth with one we love
 Doth work like madness in the brain.
 And thus it chanced, as I divine, 415 With Roland and Sir Leoline.
 Each spake words of high disdain
 And insult to his heart's best brother.
 They parted—ne'er to meet again!
 But never either found another
 420 To free the hollow heart from paining—
 They stood aloof, the scars remaining,
 Like cliffs which had been rent asunder;
 A dreary sea now flows between,—
 But neither heat, nor frost, nor thunder,
 425 Shall wholly do away, I ween,
 The marks of that which once hath been.

So Leoline, a moment's space,
 Stood gazing on the damsel's face:
 And the youthful Lord of Tryermaine 430 Came back upon his heart again.

O then the Baron forgot his age,
 His noble heart swelled high with rage,
 He swore by the wounds in Jesu's side
 He would proclaim it far and wide, 435 With trumpet and solemn heraldry,
 That they, who thus had wronged the dame,
 Were base as spotted infamy!
 "And if they dare deny the same,
 My herald shall appoint a week, 440 And let the recreant traitors seek My tourney court—that there and then I may dislodge their reptile souls
 From the bodies and forms of men!"

He spake his eye in lightning rolls!
 445 For the lady was ruthlessly seized, and he kenned
 In the beautiful lady the child of his friend!

And now the tears were on his face,
 And fondly in his arms he took Fair Geraldine, who met the embrace, 450 Prolonging it with joyous look.
 Which when she viewed, a vision fell Upon the soul of Christabel,
 The vision of fear, the touch and pain!
 She shrank and shuddered, and saw
 again—
 455 (Ah, woe is me! Was it for thee, Thou gentle maid! such sights to see!)

Agan she saw that bosom old,
 Agan she felt that bosom cold,
 And drew in her breath with a hissing
 sound.

460 Whereat the Knight turned wildly round,
 And nothing saw, but his own sweet maid
 With eyes upraised, as one that prayed

The touch, the sight, had passed away,
 And in its stead that vision blest, 465 Which comforted her after-rest While in the lady's arms she lay,
 Had put a rapture in her breast,
 And on her lips and o'er her eyes Spread smiles like light!

With new surprise,
 470 "What ails then my beloved child?"
 The Baron said—His daughter mild Made answer, "All will yet be well!"
 I ween, she had no power to tell Aught else so mighty was the spell

475 Yet he, who saw this Geraldine, Had deemed her sure a thing divine.
 Such sorrow with such grace she blended,
 As if she feared she had offended Sweet Christabel, that gentle maid!
 480 And with such lowly tones she prayed She might be sent without delay Home to her father's mansion.

"Nay!"

Nay, by my soul!" said Leoline
 "Ho! Bracy the bard, the charge be thine!" 485 Go thou, with music sweet and loud,
 And take two steeds with trappings proud,
 And take the youth whom thou lov'st best
 To bear thy harp, and learn thy song,
 And clothe you both in solemn vest, 490 And over the mountains haste along,
 Lest wandering folk, that are abroad,
 Detain you on the valley road

"And when he has crossed the Irthing
 flood,
 My merry bard! he hastes, he hastes 495 Up Knorren Moor, through Halegarth
 Wood,
 And reaches soon that castle good Which stands and threatens Scotland's wastes

"Bard Bracy! bard Bracy! your horses are fleet,
 Ye must ride up the hall, your music so
 sweet,
 500 More loud than your horses' echoing feet!
 And loud and loud to Lord Roland call,
 Thy daughter is safe in Langdale hall!
 Thy beautiful daughter is safe and free—

Sir Leoline greets thee thus through me!
 505 He bids thee come without delay
 With all thy numerous array
 And take thy lovely daughter home:
 And he will meet thee on the way
 With all his numerous array 510 White with their panting palfreys' foam.
 And, by mine honor! I will say,
 That I repent me of the day
 When I spake words of fierce disdain To Roland de Vaux of Tryermaine!— 515 —For since that evil hour hath flown, Many a summer's sun hath shone, Yet ne'er found I a friend again Like Roland de Vaux of Tryermaine!"

The lady fell, and clasped his knees, 520 Her face upraised, her eyes o'erflowing, And Bracy replied, with faltering voice,
 His gracious Hail on all bestowing!—
 "Thy words, thou sue of Christabel, Are sweeter than my harp can tell;
 525 Yet might I gain a boon of thee, This day my journey should not be,
 So strange a dream hath come to me,
 That I had vowed with music loud
 To clear yon wood from thing unblest, 530 Warned by a vision in my rest!
 For in my sleep I saw that dove,
 That gentle bird, whom thou dost love,
 And call'st by thy own daughter's name—Sir Leoline! I saw the same 535 Fluttering, and uttering fearful moan, Among the green herbs in the forest alone.
 Which when I saw and when I heard,
 I wonder'd what might ail the bird,
 For nothing near it could I see, 540 Save the grass and green herbs underneath the old tree

"And in my dream methought I went To search out what might there be found,
 And what the sweet bird's trouble meant,
 That thus lay fluttering on the ground.
 545 I went and peered, and could descry
 No cause for her distressful cry;
 But yet for her dear lady's sake
 I stooped, methought, the dove to take,
 When lo! I saw a bright green snake 550 Coiled around its wings and neck.
 Green as the herbs on which it couched,
 Close by the dove's its head it crouched,
 And with the dove it heaves and stirs,
 Swelling its neck as she swelled hers!
 555 I woke; it was the midnight hour,
 The clock was echoing in the tower,
 But though my slumber was gone by,
 This dream it would not pass away—
 It seems to live upon my eye!

560 And thence I vowed this self-same day With music strong and sauntly song
To wander through the forest bare, Lest aught unholy loiter there "

Thus Bracy said the Baron, the while, 565 Half-listening heard him with a smile, Then turned to Lady Geraldine,
His eyes made up of wonder and love,
And said in courtly accents fine.
"Sweet maid, Lord Roland's beauteous dove,

570 With arms more strong than harp or song.
Thy sire and I will crush the snake!"
He kissed her forehead as he spake,
And Geraldine in maiden wise Casting down her large bright eyes, 575 With blushing cheek and courtesy fine
She turned her from Sir Leoline, Softly gathering up her tram,
That o'er her right arm fell again,
And folded her arms across her chest, 580 And couched her head upon her breast,
And looked askance at Christabel—
Jesu, Maria, shield her well!

A snake's small eye blinks dull and shy,
And the lady's eyes they shrunk in her
head, 585 Each shrunk up to a serpent's eye,
And with somewhat of malice, and more of dread,
At Christabel she looked askance!—
One moment—and the sight was fled!
But Christabel in dizzy trance 590 Stumbling on the unsteady ground Shuddered aloud, with a hissing sound.
And Geraldine again turned round,
And like a thing, that sought relief,
Full of wonder and full of grief, 595 She rolled her large bright eyes divine Wildly on Sir Leoline.

The maid, alas! her thoughts are gone.
She nothing sees—no sight but one!
The maid, devoid of guile and sin, 600 I know not how, in fearful wise, So deeply had she drunken in That look, those shrunken serpent eyes,
That all her features were resigned
To this sole image in her mind 605 And passively did imitate
That look of dull and treacherous hate!
And thus she stood, in dizzy trance,
Still picturing that look askance With forced unconscious sympathy 610 Full before her father's view—As far as such a look could be In eyes so innocent and blue!

And when the trance was o'er, the maid Paused awhile, and only prayed 615 Then falling at the Baron's feet,
"By my mother's soul do I entreat That thou this woman send away!"
She said, and more she could not say For what she knew she could not tell, 620 O'er-mastered by the mighty spell

Why is thy cheek so wan and wild, Sir Leoline? Thy only child Lies at thy feet, thy joy, thy pride,
So fair, so innocent, so mild, 625 The same, for whom thy lady died!
O, by the pangs of her dear mother Think thou no evil of thy child!
For her, and thee, and for no other,
She prayed the moment ere she died.
630 Prayed that the babe for whom she died, Might prove her dear lord's joy and
pride!
That prayer her deadly pangs beguiled,
Sir Leoline!
And wouldst thou wrong thy only child, 635 Her child and thine?

Within the Baron's heart and biam
If thoughts, like these, had any share,
They only swelled his rage and pain,
And did but work confusion there 640 His heart was cleft with pain and rage,
His cheeks they quivered, his eyes were wild, Dishonored thus in his old age,
Dishonored by his only child,
And all his hospitality 645 To the wronged daughter of his friend
By more than woman's jealousy Brought thus to a disgraceful end—He rolled his eye with stern regard Upon the gentle minstrel bard, 650 And said in tones abrupt, austere—
"Why, Bracy! dost thou loiter here?
I bade thee hence!" The bard obeyed,
And turning from his own sweet maid,
The aged knight, Sir Leoline, 655 Led forth the lady Geraldine!

THE CONCLUSION TO PART II

A little child, a limber elf, Singing, dancing to itself,
A fairy thing with red round cheeks,
That always finds, and never seeks, 660 Makes such a vision to the sight
As fills a father's eyes with light,
And pleasures flow in so thick and fast Upon his heart, that he at last Must needs express his love's excess 665 With words of unmeant bitterness

Perhaps 'tis pretty to force together Thoughts so all unlike each other,
 To mutter and mock a broken charm,
 To dally with wrong that does no harm.
 670 Perhaps 'tis tender too and pretty At each wild word to feel within A sweet recoil of love and pity
 And what, if in a world of sin (O sorrow and shame should this be true!)
 675 Such giddiness of heart and brain Comes seldom save from rage and pain,
 So talks as it's most used to do.

FROST AT MIDNIGHT

1798

1798

The frost performs its secret ministry, Unhelped by any wind The owl's cry Came loud—and hark, again! loud as before 5 The inmates of my cottage, all at rest, Have left me to that solitude, which suits Abstruser musings: save that at my side My cradle infant slumbers peacefully
 'Tis calm indeed! so calm, that it disturbs
 And vexes meditation with its strange 10 And extreme silentness Sea, hill, and wood, This populous village! Sea, and hill, and
 wood,
 With all the numberless goings-on of life, Inaudible as dreams! the thin blue flame Lies on my low-burnt fire, and quivers not, 15 Only that film, which fluttered on the grate,¹
 Still flutters there, the sole unquiet thing Methinks, its motion in this hush of nature Gives it dim sympathies with me who live, Making it a companionable form, 20 Whose puny flaps and freaks the idling spirit
 By its own moods interprets, everywhere
 Echo or mirror seeking of itself,
 And makes a toy of thought.

But O! how oft,
 How oft, at school, with most believing
 mind,
 25 Presageful, have I gazed upon the bars, To watch that fluttering stranger! and as oft
 With unclosed lids, already had I dreamt Of my sweet birth-place, and the old church-tower,
 Whose bells, the poor man's only music, rang 30 From morn to evening, all the hot Fair-day, So sweetly, that they stirred and haunted
 me

¹ "In all parts of the kingdom, these films are called 'strangers' and supposed to portend the arrival of some absent friend"—Coleridge

With a wild pleasure, falling on mine ear Most like articulate sounds of things to come!
 So gazed I, till the soothing things, I dreamt, 35 Lulled me to sleep, and sleep prolonged my dreams!
 And so I brooded all the following morn.
 Awed by the stern preceptor's face, mine
 eye
 Fixed with mock study on my swimming book
 Save if the door half opened, and I snatched 40 A hasty glance, and still my heart leaped up.
 For still I hoped to see the stranger's face, Townsman, or aunt, or sister more beloved,
 My play-mate when we both were clothed alike!

Dear babe, that sleepest cradled by my
 side, 45 Whose gentle breathings, heard in this deep calm,
 Fill up the interspersed vacancies
 And momentary pauses of the thought!
 My babe so beautiful! it thrills my heart
 With tender gladness, thus to look at thee, 50 And think that thou shalt learn far other lore,
 And in far other scenes! For I was reared
 In the great city, pent 'mid cloisters dim, And saw nought lovely but the sky and
 stars!
 But thou, my babe! shalt wander like a breeze
 55 By lakes and sandy shores, beneath the crags
 Of ancient mountain, and beneath the
 clouds,
 Which image in their bulk both lakes and shores
 And mountain crags so shalt thou see and hear
 The lovely shapes and sounds intelligible 60 Of that eternal language, which thy God Utters, who from eternity doth teach Himself in all, and all things in himself Great universal Teacher! he shall mould Thy spirit, and by giving make it ask.

65 Therefore all seasons shall be sweet to
 thee,
 Whether the summer clothe the general
 earth
 With greenness, or the redbreast sit and

¹ See Wordsworth's The Prelude, 8, 433-37 (p. 256)

Betwixt the tufts of snow on the bare branch
 Of mossy apple-tree, while the nigh thatch 70 Smokes in the sun-thaw; whether the eave-drops fall
 Heard only in the trances of the blast,
 Or if the secret ministry of frost Shall hang them up in silent icicles, Quietly shining to the quiet moon.

FRANCE AN ODE

1798

1798

Ye Clouds! that far above me float and
 pause,
 Whose pathless march no mortal may control!
 Ye Ocean-Waves! that, wheresoe'er ye roll,
 Yield homage only to eternal laws!
 5 Ye Woods! that listen to the night-birds singing, Midway the smooth and perilous slope reclined,
 Save when your own imperious branches swinging,
 Have made a solemn music of the wind!
 Where, like a man beloved of God, 10 Through glooms, which never woodman trod,
 How oft, pursuing fancies holy,
 My moonlight way o'er flowering weeds I wound,
 Inspired, beyond the guess of folly,
 By each rude shape and wild unconquerable sound!
 15 O ye loud Waves! and O ye Forests high!
 And O ye Clouds that far above me soared!
 Thou rising Sun! thou blue rejoicing
 Sky!
 Yea, everything that is and will be
 free!
 Bear witness for me, wheresoe'er ye be, 20 With what deep worship I have still adored
 The spirit of divinest Liberty.

When France in wrath her giant-limbs upheared,
 And with that oath, which smote air,
 earth, and sea,
 Stamped her strong foot and said she would be free, 25 Bear witness for me, how I hoped and feared!
 With what a joy my lofty gratulation Unawed I sang, amid a slavish band.
 And when to whelm the disenchanting nation,

Like fiends embattled by a wizard's wand,
 30 The Monarchs marched in evil day,
 And Britain joined the dire array,¹ Though dear her shores and circling
 ocean,
 Though many friendships, many youthful loves
 Had swolln the patriot emotion 35 And flung a magic light o'er all her hills
 and groves;
 Yet still my voice, unaltered, sang defeat
 To all that braved the tyrant-quelling lance,
 And shame too long delayed and vain
 retreat!
 For ne'er, O Liberty! with partial aim 40 I dimmed thy light or damped thy holy flame,
 But blessed the paeans of delivered
 France,
 And hung my head and wept at Britain's
 name

"And what," I said, "though Blasphemy's loud scream
 With that sweet music of deliverance strove!
 45 Though all the fierce and drunken passions wove
 A dance more wild than e'er was maniac's dream!²
 Ye storms, that round the dawning
 East assembled,
 The Sun³ was rising, though ye hid his
 light!"
 And when, to soothe my soul, that hoped and trembled, 50 The dissonance ceased, and all seemed calm and bright,
 When France her front deep-sear'd and gory Concealed with clustering wreaths of glory,
 When, insupportably advancing,
 Her arm made mockery of the warrior's ramp,⁴ 55 While timid looks of fury glancing, Domestic treason, crushed beneath her fatal stamp, Writhed like a wounded dragon in his
 gore;
 Then I reproached my fears that would not flee,

¹ France declared war upon Prussia and Austria in 1792, and upon Holland and England in 1793

² A reference to the excesses of the French Revolution ³ Liberty.
⁴ act of advancing in warlike posture

"And soon," I said, "shall Wisdom teach her lore 60 In the low huts of them that toil and groan!
 And, conquering by her happiness alone, Shall France compel the nations to be
 free, Till Love and Joy look round, and call the Earth their own." 95

Forgive me, Freedom! O forgive those
 dreams!
 65 I hear thy voice, I hear thy loud lament,
 From bleak Helvetia's icy caverns
 sent—
 I hear thy groans upon her blood-stained streams!
 Heroes, that for your peaceful country perished,
 And ye that, fleeing, spot your mountain-snows 70 With bleeding wounds, forgive me, that I cherished
 One thought that ever blessed your cruel foes!
 To scatter rage, and traitorous guilt, Where Peace her jealous home had built,
 A patriot-race to disinherit 75 Of all that made their stormy wilds so
 dear,
 And with inexorable spirit To taint the bloodless freedom of the mountaineer—
 O France, that mockest Heaven, adulter-ous, blind,
 And patriot only in pernicious toils!
 80 Are these thy boasts, 'Champion of human kind?
 To mix with Kings in the low lust of
 away,
 Yell in the hunt, and share the murderous
 prey,
 To insult the shrine of Liberty with spoils From freemen torn, to tempt and to betray?

85 The Sensual and the Dark rebel in
 vain,
 Slaves by their own compulsion! In mad game
 They burst their manacles and wear the
 name
 Of Freedom, graven on a heavier
 chain!
 O Liberty! with profitless endeavor 90 Have I pursued thee, many a weary hour:

But thou nor swell'st the victor's strain, nor ever Didst breathe thy soul in forms of human power.
 Alike from all, howe'er they praise
 thee, (Nor prayer, nor boastful name delays
 thee)
 95 Alike from Priestcraft's harpy mun-ions,
 And factious Blasphemy's obscener slaves,
 Thou speedest on thy subtle pinions,
 The guide of homeless winds, and playmate of the waves!
 And there I felt thee!—on that seacliff's verge, 100 Whose pines, scarce travelled by the breeze above,
 Had made one murmur with the distant surge!
 Yes, while I stood and gazed, my temples bare,
 And shot my being through earth, sea,
 and air,
 Possessing all things with intensest love, 105 O Liberty! my spirit felt thee there.

LEWTI

OR THE CIRCASSIAN LOVE CHANT
 1798 1798

At midnight by the stream I loved,
 To forget the form I loved
 Image of Lewti! from my mind
 Depart, for Lewti is not kind

5 The moon was high, the moonlight gleam
 And the shadow of a star
 Heaved upon Tamaha's stream,
 But the rock shone brighter far,
 The rock half sheltered from my view 10 By pendent boughs of tressy yew.—
 So shines my Lewti's forehead fair, Gleaning through her sable hair,
 Image of Lewti! from my mind
 Depart; for Lewti is not kind 15 I saw a cloud of palest hue, Onward to the moon it passed;

 Still brighter and more bright it grew,
 With floating colors not a few,
 Till it reach'd the moon at last 20 Then the cloud was wholly bright,
 With a rich and amber light!
 And so with many a hope I seek And with such joy I find my Lewti;
 And even so my pale wan cheek 25 Drinks in as deep a flush of beauty!

Nay, treacherous image! leave my mind,
If Lewti never will be kind

The little cloud—it floats away,

Away it goes, away so soon!

30 Alas! it has no power to stay—

Its hues are dim, its hues are gray—

Away it passes from the moon!

How mournfully it seems to fly,

Ever fading more and more,

35 To joyless regions of the sky—

And now 'tis whiter than before!

As white as my poor cheek will be,

When, Lewti! on my couch I lie,

A dying man for love of thee

40 Nay, treacherous image! leave my mind—

And yet, thou didst not look unkind.

I saw a vapor in the sky,

Thin, and white, and very high;

I ne'er beheld so thin a cloud:

45 Perhaps the breezes that can fly

Now below and now above,

Have snatched aloft the lawn's shroud

Of Lady fair—that died for love

For maids, as well as youths, have perished

50 From fruitless love too fondly cherished

Nay, treacherous image! leave my mind—

For Lewti never will be kind

Hush! my heedless feet from under Slip the crumbling banks forever.

55 Like echoes to a distant thunder,

They plunge into the gentle river

The river-swans have heard my tread,

And startle from their reedy bed

O beauteous birds! methinks ye measure

60 Your movements to some heavenly tune!

O beauteous birds! 'tis such a pleasure

To see you move beneath the moon,

I would it were your true delight

To sleep by day and wake all night.

65 I know the place where Lewti lies,

When silent night has closed her eyes—

It is a breezy jasmine-bower,

The nightingale sings o'er her head—

Voice of the Night! had I the power

70 That leafy labyrinth to thread,

And creep, like thee, with soundless tread,

I then might view her bosom white

Heaving lovely to my sight,

As these two swans together heave

75 On the gently-swelling wave.

Oh! that she saw me in a dream,

And dreamt that I had died for care;

All pale and wasted I would seem,

Yet fair withal, as spirits are!

80 I'd die indeed, if I might see Her bosom heave, and heave for me!
Soothe, gentle image! soothe my mind!
Tomorrow Lewti may be kind

FEARS IN SOLITUDE

WRITTEN IN APRIL, 1798, DURING THE ALARM

OF AN INVASION¹

1798 1798

A green and silent spot, amid the hills,
A small and silent dell! O'er stiller place
No singing skylark ever poised himself
The hills are heathy, save that swelling

5 Which hath a gay and gorgeous covering
on,

All golden with the never-bloomless furze,
Which now blooms most profusely but the dell,

Bathed by the mist, is fresh and delicate As vernal corn-field,² or the unripe flax,

10 When, through its half-transparent stalks,
at eve,

The level sunshine glimmers with green
light.

Oh! 'tis a quiet spirit-healing nook!

Which all, methinks, would love; but chiefly he,

The humble man, who, in his youthful
years,

15 Knew just so much of folly, as had made His early manhood more securely wise!

Here he might lie on fern or withered
heath,

While from the singing lark (that sings unseen

The minstrelsy that solitude loves best),

20 And from the sun, and from the breezy
air,

Sweet influences trembled o'er his frame;
And he, with many feelings, many
thoughts,

Made up a meditative joy, and found Religious meanings in the forms of Nature!

25 And so, his senses gradually wrapt

In a half sleep, he dreams of better
worlds,

And dreaming hears thee still, O singing lark,

That singest like an angel in the clouds!

My God! it is a melancholy thing

30 For such a man, who would full fain preserve

¹ The French planned to invade both England and Ireland early in 1798.

² wheat-field

- His soul in calmness, yet perforce must feel
 For all his human brethren—O my God!
 It weighs upon the heart, that he must think What uproar and what strife may now be stirring
- 35 This way or that way o'er these silent hills—
 Invasion, and the thunder and the shout,
 And all the crash of onset, fear and rage,
 And undetermined conflict—even now, Even now, perchance, and in his native isle
- 40 Carnage and groans beneath this blessed sun!
 We have offended, Oh! my countrymen!
 We have offended very grievously,
 And been most tyrannous. From east to west
 A groan of accusation pierces Heaven!
- 45 The wretched plead against us, multitudes Countless and vehement, the sons of God, Our brethren! Like a cloud that travels on, Steamed up from Cairo's swamps of pestilence, Even so, my countrymen! have we gone forth
- 50 And borne to distant tribes slavery and pangs,
 And, deadlier far, our vices, whose deep taint With slow perdition murders the whole man, His body and his soul! Meanwhile, at home,
 All individual dignity and power
- 55 Engulfed in Courts, Committees, Institutions, Associations and Societies,
 A vain, speech-mouthing, speech-reporting Guild,
 One Benefit-Club for mutual flattery,
 We have drunk up, demure as at a grace,
- 60 Pollutions from the brimming cup of wealth; Contemptuous of all honorable rule, Yet bartering freedom and the poor man's life For gold, as at a market! The sweet words Of Christian promise, words that even yet
- 65 Might stem destruction, were they wisely preached,
 Are muttered o'er by men, whose tones proclaim How flat and wearisome they feel their trade:
 Rank scoffers some, but most too indolent
- To deem them falsehoods or to know their truth.
- 70 Oh! blasphemous! the Book of Life is made A superstitious instrument, on which We gabble o'er the oaths we mean to break;
 For all must swear—all and in every place,
 College and wharf, council and justice-court;
- 75 All, all must swear, the briber and the bribed, Merchant and lawyer, senator and priest,
 The rich, the poor, the old man and the young,
 All, all make up one scheme of perjury,
 That faith doth reel; the very name of God
- 80 Sounds like a juggler's charm, and, bold with joy, Forth from his dark and lonely hiding-place, (Portentous sight!) the owlet Atheism, Sailing on obscene wings athwart the noon, Drops his blue-fringed lid, and holds them close,
- 85 And hooting at the glorious sun in Heaven, Cries out, "Where is it?"
- Thankless too for peace, (Peace long preserved by fleets and perilous seas) Secure from actual warfare, we have loved To swell the war-whoop, passionate for war!
- 90 Alas! for ages ignorant of all Its ghastlier workings, (famine or blue plague, Battle, or siege, or flight through wintry snows.)
 We, this whole people, have been clamorous For war and bloodshed; animating sports,
- 95 The which we pay for as a thing we talk of, Spectators and not combatants! No guess Anticipative of a wrong unfelt,
 No speculation on contingency,
 However dim and vague, too vague and dim
- 100 To yield a justifying cause; and forth, (Stuffed out with big preamble, holy names, And adjurations of the God in Heaven,)
 We send our mandates for the certain death Of thousands and ten thousands! Boys and girls,
- 105 And women, that would groan to see a child

- Pull off an insect's leg, all read of war,
The best amusement for our morning meal!
The poor wretch, who has learnt his only prayers
From curses, who knows scarcely words enough 110 To ask a blessing from his Heavenly Father,
Becomes a fluent phraseman, absolute
And technical in victories and defeats,
And all our dainty terms for fratricide, Terms which we trundle smoothly o'er our tongues
115 Like mere abstractions, empty sounds to which We join no feeling and attach no form!
As if the soldier died without a wound,
As if the fibres of this godlike frame Were goled without a pang, as if the wretch,
120 Who fell in battle, doing bloody deeds, Passed off to Heaven, translated and not killed,
As though he had no wife to pine for him,
No God to judge him! Therefore, evil days Are coming on us, O my countrymen!
125 And what if all-avenging Providence, Strong and retributive, should make us
know
The meaning of our words, force us to feel
The desolation and the agony
Of our fierce doings?
- Spare us yet awhile,
- 130 Father and God! Oh! spare us yet awhile!
Oh! let not English women drag their flight Fainting beneath the burthen of their babes,
Of the sweet infants, that but yesterday Laughed at the breast! Sons, brothers, husbands, all 135 Who ever gazed with fondness on the forms
Which grew up with you round the same fire-side,
And all who ever heard the Sabbath-bells Without the infidel's scorn make yourselves pure!
Stand forth! be men! repel an impious foe, 140 Impious and false, a light yet cruel race,
Who laugh away all virtue, mingling mirth With deeds of murder, and still promising Freedom, themselves too sensual to be free.
Poison life's amities, and cheat the heart 145 Of faith and quiet hope, and all that soothes,
And all that lifts the spirit! Stand we
forth,
Render them back upon the insulted ocean,
- And let them toss as idly on its waves As the vile sea-weed, which some mountain-blast 150 Swept from our shores! And oh! may we return
Not with a drunken triumph, but with fear, Repenting of the wrongs with which we stung
So fierce a foe to frenzy!
- I have told,
- O Britons, O my brethren! I have told 155 Most bitter truth, but without bitterness Nor deem my zeal or factious or mistimed,
For never can true courage dwell with
them,
Who, playing tricks with conscience, dare not look At their own vices. We have been too long 160 Dupes of a deep delusion! Some, belike, Groaning with restless enmity, expect All change from change of constituted
power,
As if a government had been a robe,
On which our vice and wretchedness were tagged 165 Like fancy-points and fringes, with the robe
Pulled off at pleasure Fondly these attach A radical causation to a few Poor drudges of chastising Providence,
Who borrow all their hues and qualities 170 From our own folly and rank wickedness, Which gave them birth and nursed them (Others, meanwhile, Dote with a mad idolatry, and all Who will not fall before their images,
And yield them worship, they are enemies Even of their country!)
- Such have I been deemed —
- But, O dear Britain! O my Mother Isle!
Needs must thou prove a name most dear and holy
To me, a son, a brother, and a friend,
A husband, and a father! who revere 180 All bonds of natural love, and find them all Within the limits of thy rocky shores O native Britain! O my Mother Isle!
How shouldst thou prove aught else but dear and holy
To me, who from thy lakes and mountain-
hills, 185 Thy clouds, thy quiet dales, thy rocks and seas,
Have drunk in all my intellectual life,
All sweet sensations, all ennobling
thoughts,

All adoration of the God in nature,
 All lovely and all honorable things, 190 Whatever makes this mortal spirit feel The joy and greatness of its future being?²³⁰
 There lives nor form nor feeling in my soul Unborrowed from my country! O divine And beauteous Island! thou hast been my sole

195 And most magnificent temple, in the which I walk with awe, and sing my stately songs, Loving the God that made me!—

May my fears,
 My filial fears, be vain! and may the vaunts

And menace of the vengeful enemy 200 Pass like the gust, that roared and died
 away
 In the distant tree which heard, and only
 heard
 In this low dell, bowed not the delicate grass.

But now the gentle dew-fall sends
 abroad

205 The fruit-like perfume of the golden furze
 The light has left the summit of the hill, Though still a sunny gleam lies beautiful, Aslant the ivied beacon Now farewell, Farewell, awhile, O soft and silent spot!
 On the green sheep-track, up the heathy
 hill,

210 Homeward I wind my way, and lo! recalled From bodings that have well-nigh wearied
 me,

I find myself upon the brow, and pause Startled! And after lonely sojourning In such a quiet and surrounded nook,

215 This burst of prospect, here the shadowy
 main,

Dim-tinted, there the mighty majesty
 Of that huge amphitheatre of rich And elmy fields, seems like society—

220 Conversing with the mind, and giving it A livelier impulse and a dance of thought!
 And now, beloved Stowey! I behold

Thy church-tower, and, methinks, the four huge elms

Clustering, which mark the mansion of my friend,¹

And close behind them, hidden from my
 view,

225 Is my own lowly cottage, where my babe
 And my babe's mother dwell in peace!
 With light

And quickened footsteps thitherward I tend,

Remembering thee, O green and silent
 dell!

And grateful, that by nature's quietness 230 And solitary musings, all my heart Is softened, and made worthy to indulge Love, and the thoughts that yearn for human kind

THE NIGHTINGALE

1798

1798

No cloud, no relique of the sunken day Distinguishes the west, no long thin slip Of sullen light, no obscure trembling hues.
 Come, we will rest on this old mossy bridge!

5 You see the glimmer of the stream beneath,

But hear no murmuring: it flows silently, O'er its soft bed of verdure. All is still,
 A balmy night! and though the stars be dim,

10 Yet let us think upon the vernal showers That gladden the green earth, and we shall find

A pleasure in the dimness of the stars
 And hark! the Nightingale begins its song,
 "Most musical, most melancholy!"² bird!

15 A melancholy bird? Oh! idle thought!
 In Nature there is nothing melancholy But some night-wandering man whose heart was pierced

With the remembrance of a grievous
 wrong,

Or slow distemper, or neglected love, (And so, poor wretch! filled all things with himself,

20 And made all gentle sounds tell back the tale

Of his own sorrow) he, and such as he,
 First named these notes a melancholy
 strain.

And many a poet echoes the conceit,
 Poet who hath been building up the rhyme

25 When he had better far have stretched his limbs

Beside a brook in mossy forest-dell,
 By sun or moon-light, to the influxes Of shapes and sounds and shifting elements

Surrendering his whole spirit, of his song 30 And of his fame forgetful! so his fame

Should share in Nature's immortality, A venerable thing! and so his song

Should make all Nature lovelier, and itself Be loved like Nature! But 'twill not be so;

35 And youths and maidens most poetical,

² Il Penseroso, 61

Who lose the deepening twilights of the
spring
In ball-rooms and hot theatres, they still Full of meek sympathy must heave their sighs
O'er Philomela's pity-pleading strains.

40 My friend, and thou, our sister! we have learnt

A different lore we may not thus profane Nature's sweet voices, always full of love And joyance! 'Tis the merry Nightingale
That crowds, and hurries, and precipitates

45 With fast thick warble his delicious notes,
As he were fearful that an April night
Would be too short for him to utter forth His love-chant, and disburthen his full soul
Of all its music!

And I know a grove

50 Of large extent, hard by a castle huge,
Which the great lord inhabits not, and so This grove is wild with tangling under-
wood,

And the trim walks are broken up, and
grass,

Thin grass and king-cups grow within the paths.

55 But never elsewhere in one place I knew So many nightingales, and far and near,
In wood and thicket, over the wide grove, They answer and provoke each other's
song,

With skirmish and capricious passagings,

60 And murmurs musical and swift jug jug,
And one low piping sound more sweet than all—

Stirring the air with such a harmony, That should you close your eyes, you might almost

Forget it was not day! On moonlight bushes,

65 Whose dewy leaflets are but half-disclosed, You may perchance behold them on the twigs,

Their bright, bright eyes, their eyes both bright and full,

Glistening, while many a glow-worm in the shade

Lights up her love-torch.

A most gentle maid,

70 Who dwelleth in her hospitable home Hard by the castle, and at latest eve (Even like a lady vowed and dedicate To something more than Nature in the grove)

Glides through the pathways; she knows all their notes,

* Wordsworth and his sister Dorothy

75 That gentle maid! and oft, a moment's space,

What time the moon was lost behind a
cloud,

Hath heard a pause of silence; till the moon

Emerging, hath awakened earth and sky
With one sensation, and those wakeful
birds

80 Have all burst forth in choral minstrelsy, As if some sudden gale had swept at once A hundred airy harps! And she hath watched

Many a nightingale perch giddily On blossomy twig still swinging from the
breeze,

85 And to that motion tune his wanton song Like tipsy Joy that reels with tossing
head

Farewell, O Warbler! till tomorrow eve, And you, my friends! farewell, a short farewell!

We have been loitering long and pleasantly,

90 And now for our dear homes — That strain again!

Full fain it would delay me! My dear babe,
Who, capable of no articulate sound,
Mars all things with his imitative lisp, How he would place his hand beside his
ear,

95 His little hand, the small forefinger up,
And bid us listen! And I deem it wise To make him Nature's play-mate. He knows well

The evening-star; and once, when he awoke

In most distressful mood (some inward
pain

100 Had made up that strange thing, an infant's dream—)

I hurried with him to our orchard-plot,
And he beheld the moon, and, hushed at
once,

Suspends his sobs, and laughs most silently, While his fair eyes, that swam with un-dropped tears,

105 Did glitter in the yellow moon-beam!
Well!—

It is a father's tale. But if that Heaven Should give me life, his childhood shall grow up

Familiar with these songs, that with the
night

He may associate joy — Once more, farewell,

110 Sweet Nightingale! once more, my friends!
farewell.

THE BALLAD OF THE DARK LADIE

1798

1834

Beneath yon birch with silver bark,
And boughs so pendulous and fair,
The brook falls scatter'd down the rock:
And all is mossy there!

And there upon the moss she sits,
The Dark Ladie in silent pain;
The heavy tear is in her eye,
And drops and swells again

Three times she sends her little page
Up the castled mountain's breast,
If he might find the Knight that wears
The Griffin for his crest

The sun was sloping down the sky,
And she had linger'd there all day, Counting moments, dreaming fears—Oh wherefore can he stay!

She hears a rustling o'er the brook,
She sees far off a swinging bough!
"Tis he! 'Tis my betrothed Knight!
Lord Falkland, it is thou!"

She springs, she clasps him round the neck,
She sobs a thousand hopes and fears,
Her kisses glowing on his cheeks
She quenches with her tears

* * * * *

"My friends with rude ungente words
They scoff and bid me fly to thee!
O give me shelter in thy breast!
O shield and shelter me!"

"My Henry, I have given thee much,
I gave what I can ne'er recall,
I gave my heart, I gave my peace, O Heaven! I gave thee all!"

The Knight made answer to the maid, While to his heart he held her hand,
"Nine castles hath my noble sire, None stateher in the land

"The fairest one shall be my love's,
The fairest castle of the nine!
Wait only till the stars peep out,
The fairest shall be thine."

"Wait only till the hand of eve Hath wholly closed yon western bars,
And through the dark we two will steal Beneath the twinkling stars!"—

The dark? the dark? No! not the dark!
The twinkling stars! How, Henry! How!
O God! 'twas in the eye of noon
He pledged his sacred vow!

"And in the eye of noon my love Shall lead me from my mother's door, Sweet boys and girls all clothed in white Strewing flowers before:

"But first the noddling minstrels go With music meet for lordly bowers,
The children next in snow-white vests, Strewing buds and flowers!

"And then my love and I shall pace,
My jet black hair in pearly braids, Between our comely bachelors
And blushing bridal maids"

KUBLA KHAN

1798

1818

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree Where Alph, the sacred river, ran Through caverns measureless to man Down to a sunless sea.

So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And there were gardens bright with sun-uous rills,
Where blossomed many an incense-bearing
tree;

And here were forests ancient as the
hills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

But oh! that deep romantic chasm which slanted
Down the green hill athwart a cedarn cover!

A savage place! as holy and enchanted As e'er beneath a waning moon was haunted

By woman wailing for her demon-lover!
And from this chasm, with ceaseless turmoil seething,
As if this earth in fast thick pants were breathing,

A mighty fountain momentarily was forced:
Amid whose swift half-intermitted burst Huge fragments vaulted like rebounding
hail,

Or chaffy grain beneath the thresher's flail:

And 'mid these dancing rocks at once and ever

It flung up momentarily the sacred river.
 25 Five miles meandering with a mazy motion Through wood and dale the sacred river ran,
 Then reached the caverns measureless to man,
 And sank in tumult to a lifeless ocean:
 And 'mid this tumult Kubla heard from far 30 Ancestral voices prophesying war!
 The shadow of the dome of pleasure Floated midway on the waves,
 Where was heard the mingled measure
 From the fountain and the caves.
 35 It was a miracle of rare device,
 A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!

A damsel with a dulcimer
 In a vision once I saw:
 It was an Abyssinian maid, 40 And on her dulcimer she played, Singing of Mount Abora Could I revive within me
 Her symphony and song,
 To such a deep delight 'twould win me, 45 That with music loud and long,
 I would build that dome in air,
 That sunny dome! those caves of ice!
 And all who heard should see them there,
 And all should cry, Beware! Beware!
 50 His flashing eyes, his floating hair!
 Weave a circle round him thrice,
 And close your eyes with holy dread,
 For he on honey-dew hath fed,
 And drunk the milk of Paradise

WRITTEN IN THE ALBUM AT ELBINGERODE, IN THE HARTZ FOREST
 1799 1799

I stood on Brocken's sovran height, and saw Woods crowding upon woods, hills over hills,
 A surging scene, and only limited By the blue distance. Heavily my way 5 Downward I dragged through fir groves evermore,
 Where bright green moss heaves in sepulchral forms
 Speckled with sunshine; and, but seldom
 heard,
 The sweet bird's song became a hollow
 sound;
 And the breeze, murmuring indivisibly, 10 Preserved its solemn murmur most distinct From many a note of many a waterfall,

And the brook's chatter; 'mid whose islet-
 stones
 The dingy kudding with its tinkling bell Leaped frolicsome, or old romantic goat 15 Sat, his white beard slow waving. I moved on
 In low and languid mood: for I had found That outward forms, the loftiest, still receive
 Their finer influence from the life within;— Fair cyphers else: fair, but of import vague 20 Or unconcerning, where the heart not finds History or prophecy of friend, or child,
 Or gentle maid, our first and early love,
 Or father, or the venerable name
 Of our ador'd country! O thou Queen, 25 Thou delegated Deity of Earth, O dear, dear England! how my longing
 eye
 Turned westward, shaping in the steady
 clouds
 Thy sands and high white cliffs!

My native land!
 Filled with the thought of thee this heart was proud, 30 Yea, mine eye swam with tears: that all the view
 From sovran Brocken, woods and woody
 hills,
 Floated away, like a departing dream, Feeble and dim! Stranger, these impulses Blame thou not lightly; nor will I profane, 35 With hasty judgment or injurious doubt.
 That man's sublimer spirit, who can feel That God is everywhere! the God who framed
 Mankind to be one mighty family, Himself our Father, and the world our home

1799 1799

All thoughts, all passions, all delights, Whatever stirs this mortal frame,
 All are but ministers of Love,
 And feed his sacred flame.
 5 Oft in my waking dreams do I Live o'er again that happy hour,
 When midway on the mount I lay,
 Beside the ruined tower.
 The moonshine, stealing o'er the scene 10 Had blended with the lights of eve;
 And she was there, my hope, my jey,
 My own dear Genevieve!

She leant against the arméd man,
The statue of the arméd knight;
15 She stood and listened to my lay,
Amid the lingering light.

Few sorrows hath she of her own,
My hope! my joy! my Genevieve!
She loves me best, whene'er I sing 20 The songs that make her grieve.

I played a soft and doleful air,
I sang an old and moving story—
An old rude song, that suited well
That ruin wild and hoary

25 She listened with a fitting blush,
With downcast eyes and modest grace,
For well she knew, I could not choose But gaze upon her face

I told her of the Knight that wore 30 Upon his shield a burning brand,
And that for ten long years he wooed
The Lady of the Land.

I told her how he pined and ah!
The deep, the low, the pleading tone 35 With which I sang another's love, Interpreted my own

She listened with a fitting blush,
With downcast eyes, and modest grace;
And she forgave me that I gazed 40 Too fondly on her face!

But when I told the cruel scorn
That crazed that bold and lovely Knight,
And that he crossed the mountain-woods,
Nor rested day nor night;

45 That sometimes from the savage den,
And sometimes from the darksome shade,
And sometimes starting up at once In green and sunny glade,—

There came and looked him in the face 50 An angel beautiful and bright;
And that he knew it was a fiend,
This miserable Knight!

And that unknowing what he did,
He leaped amid a murderous band, 55 And saved from outrage worse than death
The Lady of the Land!

And how she wept, and clasped his knees;
And how she tended him in vain—
And ever strove to expiate 60 The scorn that crazed his brain;—

And that she nursed him in a cave;
And how his madness went away,
When on the yellow forest-leaves
A dying man he lay;—

65 His dying words—but when I reached That tenderest strain of all the ditty, My faltering voice and pausing harp Disturbed her soul with pity!

All impulses of soul and sense 70 Had thrilled my guileless Genevieve;
The music and the doleful tale,
The rich and balmy eve;

And hopes, and fears that kindle hope,
An undistinguishable throng, 75 And gentle wishes long subdued, Subdued and cherished long!

She wept with pity and delight,
She blushed with love, and virgin-shame,
And like the murmur of a dream, 80 I heard her breathe my name

Her bosom heaved—she stepped aside, As conscious of my look she stepped—Then suddenly, with timorous eye
She fled to me and wept.

85 She half enclosed me with her arms,
She pressed me with a meek embrace,
And bending back her head, looked up,
And gazed upon my face

'Twas partly love, and partly fear, 90 And partly 'twas a bashful art,
That I might rather feel, than see,
The swelling of her heart.

I calmed her fears, and she was calm,
And told her love with virgin pride, 95 And so I won my Genevieve,
My bright and beauteous bride

DEJECTION. AN ODE

1802

1802

Late, late yestern I saw the new Moon,
With the old Moon in her aim,
And I fear, I fear, my Master dear
We shall have a deadly storm

Ballad of Sir Patrick Spence

Well! If the bard was weather-wise, who made
The grand old ballad of Sir Patrick Spence,
This night, so tranquil now, will not go
hence
Unroused by winds, that ply a busier trade

5 Than those which mould yon cloud in lazy flakes,
 Or the dull sobbing draft, that moans and rakes
 Upon the strings of this Æolian lute,
 Which better far were mute.
 10 For lo! the New-moon winter-bright!
 And overspread with phantom light, (With swimming phantom light o'er-
 spread
 But rimmed and circled by a silver thread)
 I see the old Moon in her lap, foretelling
 The coming-on of rain and squally blast.
 15 And oh! that even now the gust were swelling,
 And the slant night-shower driving loud and fast!
 Those sounds which oft have raised me, whilst they awed,
 And sent my soul abroad,
 Might now perhaps their wonted impulse
 give,
 20 Might startle this dull pain, and make it move and live!

 A grief without a pang, void, dark, and
 dear,
 A stifled, drowsy, unimpassioned grief,
 Which finds no natural outlet, no relief,
 In word, or sigh, or tear—25 O Lady! in this wan and heartless mood,
 To other thoughts by yonder throstle woo'd,
 All this long eve, so balmy and serene,
 Have I been gazing on the western sky,
 And its peculiar tint of yellow green.
 30 And still I gaze—and with how blank an
 eye!
 And those thin clouds above, in flakes and bars,
 That give away their motion to the stars, Those stars, that glide behind them or between,
 Now sparkling, now bedimmed, but always
 seen 35 Yon crescent Moon, as fixed as if it grew In its own cloudless, starless lake of blue;
 I see them all so excellently fair,
 I see, not feel, how beautiful they are!

 My genial spirits fail;
 40 And what can these avail To lift the smothering weight from off my breast?
 It were a vain endeavor,
 Though I should gaze forever
 On that green light that lingers in the west:
 45 I may not hope from outward forms to win
 The passion and the life, whose fountains are within

O Lady! we receive but what we give,
 And in our life alone does Nature live.
 Ours is her wedding garment, ours her shroud!
 50 And would we aught behold, of higher worth,
 Than that inanimate cold world allowed
 To the poor loveless ever-anxious crowd, Ah! from the soul itself must issue forth A light, a glory, a fair luminous cloud 55 Enveloping the earth—
 And from the soul itself must there be sent A sweet and potent voice, of its own
 birth,
 Of all sweet sounds the life and element!

 O pure of heart! thou need'st not ask of
 me 60 What this strong music in the soul may
 be!
 What, and wherein it doth exist,
 This light, this glory, this fair luminous mist,
 This beautiful and beauty-making power.
 Joy, virtuous Lady! Joy that ne'er was given,
 65 Save to the pure, and in their purest hour.
 Life, and life's effluence, cloud at once and shower,
 Joy, Lady! is the spirit and the power,
 Which wedding Nature to us gives in dower
 A new earth and new heaven, 70 Undreamt of by the sensual and the proud—
 Joy is the sweet voice, Joy the luminous
 cloud—
 We in ourselves rejoice!
 And thence flows all that charms our ear or sight,
 All melodies the echoes of that voice, 75 All colors a suffusion from that light.

 There was a time when, though my path was rough,
 This joy within me dallied with distress,
 And all misfortunes were but as the stuff Whence Fancy made me dreams of happiness.
 80 For hope grew round me, like the twining vine,
 And fruits, and foliage, not my own, seemed mine
 But now afflictions bow me down to earth:
 Nor care I that they rob me of my mirth;
 But oh! each visitation 85 Suspends what nature gave me at my
 birth,
 My shaping spirit of Imagination
 For not to think of what I needs must feel,
 But to be still and patient, all I can,

And haply by abstruse research to steal 90 From my own nature all the natural
 man—

This was my sole resource, my only plan:

Till that which suits a part infects the
 whole,

And now is almost grown the habit of my soul

Hence, viper thoughts, that coil around my mind,

95 Reality's dark dream!

I turn from you, and listen to the wind, Which long has raved unnoticed What a scream

Of agony by torture lengthened out That lute sent forth! Thou Wind, that rav'st without,

100 Bare crag, or mountain-tairn, or blasted
 tree,

Or pine-grove whither woodman never clomb,

Or lonely house, long held the witches'
 home,

Methinks were fitter instruments for
 thee,

Mad lutanist! who in this month of
 showers,

105 Of dark-brown gardens, and of peeping
 flowers,

Mak'st Devils' yule, with worse than wintry song,

The blossoms, buds, and timorous leaves
 among

Thou actor, perfect in all tragic sounds!
 Thou mighty poet, e'en to frenzy bold!

110 What tell'st thou now about?

'Tis of the rushing of an host in rout, With groans, of trampled men, with smarting wounds—

At once they groan with pain, and shudder with the cold!

But hush! there is a pause of deepest silence!

115 And all that noise, as of a rushing
 crowd,

With groans, and tremulous shudderings—all is over—

It tells another tale, with sounds less deep and loud!

A tale of less affright,
 And tempered with delight,

120 As Otway's self had framed the tender
 lay,—

'Tis of a little child
 Upon a lonesome wild,

Not far from home, but she hath lost her
 way.

And now moans low in bitter grief and
 fear,

125 And now screams loud, and hopes to make her mother hear.¹

'Tis midnight, but small thoughts have I of sleep:

Full seldom may my friend such vigils
 keep!

Visit her, gentle Sleep! with wings of healing,

And may this storm be but a mountain-
 birth,

130 May all the stars hang bright above her dwelling,

Silent as though they watched the sleeping earth!

With light heart may she rise,

Gay fancy, cheerful eyes,

Joy lift her spirit, joy attune her voice;

135 To her may all things live, from pole to pole,

Their life the eddying of her living soul!

O simple spirit, guided from above,

Dear Lady! friend devotest of my choice,
 Thus mayest thou ever, evermore rejoice.

HYMN BEFORE SUNRISE, IN THE VALE OF CHAMOUNI

1802

1802

Hast thou a charm to stay the morning-star In his steep course? So long he seems to pause

On thy bald awful head, O sovran Blanc,
 The Arve and Arveiron at thy base

5 Rave ceaselessly, but thou, most awful Form!

Risest from forth thy silent sea of pines,
 How silently! Around thee and above

Deep is the air and dark, substantial, black,
 An ebon mass: methinks thou piercest it,

10 As with a wedge! But when I look again, It is thine own calm home, thy crystal shrine,

Thy habitation from eternity!

O dread and silent Mount! I gazed upon
 thee,

Till thou, still present to the bodily sense, 15 Didst vanish from my thought: entranced in prayer

I worshipped the Invisible alone

Yet, like some sweet beguiling melody, So sweet, we know not we are listening to it,

¹ A reference to Wordsworth's Lucy Gray. In the first version of the poem, "William's" appeared in l. 120 instead of "Otway's."

Thou, the meanwhile, wast blending with
my thought,
20 Yea, with my life and life's own secret joy Till the dilating Soul, enrapt, transfused, Into the mighty vision passing—there As in her natural form, swelled vast to Heaven!

Awake, my soul! not only passive praise 25 Thou owest! not alone these swelling tears, Mute thanks and secret ecstasy! Awake, Voice of sweet song! Awake, my heart, awake!
Green vales and icy cliffs, all join my hymn

Thou first and chief, sole sovereign of the Vale!
30 O struggling with the darkness all the
night,
And visited all night by troops of stars, Or when they climb the sky or when they sink
(Companion of the morning-star at dawn, Thyself Earth's rosy star, and of the dawn
35 (Co-herald wake, O wake, and utter praise!
Who sank thy sunless pillars deep in
Earth?
Who filled thy countenance with rosy
light?
Who made thee parent of perpetual
streams?

And you, ye five wild torrents fiercely
glad!
40 Who called you forth from night and utter death,
From dark and icy caverns called you
forth,
Down those precipitous, black, jagged
rocks,
Forever shattered and the same forever?
Who gave you your invulnerable life, 45 Your strength, your speed, your fury, and your joy,
Unceasing thunder and eternal foam?
And who commanded (and the silence
came),
Here let the billows stiffen, and have rest!

Ye ice-falls! ye that from the mountain's brow
50 Adown enormous ravines slope amain—Torrents, methinks, that heard a mighty
voice,
And stopped at once amid their maddest plunge!
Motionless torrents! silent cataracts!

Who made you glorious as the gates of
Heaven
55 Beneath the keen full moon! Who bade the sun (Clothe you with rainbows? Who, with living flowers
Of loveliest blue, spread garlands at your
feet?—
God! let the torrents, like a shout of nations,
Answer! and let the ice-plains echo, God!
60 (God! sing ye meadow-streams with glad-some voice!
Ye pine-groves, with your soft and soul-like sounds!
And they too have a voice, yon piles of
snow,
And in their perilous fall shall thunder,
God!

Ye living flowers that skirt the eternal frost!
65 Ye wild goats sporting round the eagle's nest!
Ye eagles, play-mates of the mountain-
storm!
Ye lightnings, the dread arrows of the
clouds!
Ye signs and wonders of the element!
Utter forth God, and fill the hills with praise!

70 Thou too, hoar Mount! with thy sky-pointing peaks,
Oft from whose feet the avalanche, un-
heard,
Shoots downward, glittering through the pure serene
Into the depth of clouds, that veil thy
breast—
Thou too again, stupendous Mountam!
thou 75 That as I raise my head, awhile bowed
low
In adoration, upward from thy base Slow travelling with dim eyes suffused with tears,
Solemnly seemest, like a vapory cloud,
To rise before me—Rise, O ever rise, 80 Rise like a cloud of incense from the Earth!
Thou kingly Spirit throned among the
hills,
Thou dread ambassador from Earth to
Heaven,
Great Hierarch! tell thou the silent sky,
And tell the stars, and tell yon rising sun 85 Earth, with her thousand voices, praises
God

INSCRIPTION FOR A FOUNTAIN ON A HEATH

1802

1802

- This sycamore, oft musical with bees, Such tents the patriarchs loved. O long unharm'd
May all its aged boughs o'er-canopy
The small round basin, which this jutting
stone 5 Keeps pure from falling leaves. Long may the spring,
Quietly as a sleeping infant's breath,
Send up cold waters to the traveller With soft and even pulse; nor ever cease Yon tiny cone of sand its soundless
dance, 10 Which at the bottom, like a fairy's page,
As merry and no taller, dances still, Nor wrinkles the smooth surface of the fount
Here twilight is, and coolness; here is moss,
A soft seat, and a deep and ample shade.
15 Thou may'st toil far and find no second
tree Drink, pilgrim, here! Here rest! And if thy heart
Be innocent, here too shalt thou refresh
Thy spirit, listening to some gentle sound, Or passing gale or hum of murmuring bees.

ANSWER TO A CHILD'S QUESTION

1802

1802

- Do you ask what the birds say? The Sparrow, the Dove,
The Linnet and Thrush say, "I love and I love!"
In the winter they're silent—the wind is so strong;
What it says, I don't know, but it sings a loud song.
5 But green leaves, and blossoms, and sunny warm weather,
And singing, and loving—all come back together.
But the Lark is so brimful of gladness
and love,
The green fields below him, the blue sky
above,
That he sings, and he sings; and forever sings he—10 "I love my Love, and my Love loves
me!"

THE PAINS OF SLEEP

1803

1816

- Ere on my bed my limbs I lay,
It hath not been my use to pray
With moving lips or bended knees;
But silently, by slow degrees, 5 My spirit I to Love compose,
In humble trust mine eye-lids close,
With reverential resignation,
No wish conceived, no thought exprest,
Only a sense of supplication;
10 A sense o'er all my soul imprest
That I am weak, yet not unblest, Since in me, round me, everywhere Eternal Strength and Wisdom are But yester-night I prayed aloud 15 In anguish and in agony,
Up-starting from the fiendish crowd Of shapes and thoughts that tortured me
A lurid light, a trampling throng, Sense of intolerable wrong, 20 And whom I scorned, those only strong!
Thirst of revenge, the powerless will Still baffled, and yet burning still!
Desire with loathing strangely mixed On wild or hateful objects fixed.
25 Fantastic passions! maddening brawl!
And shame and terror over all!
Deeds to be hid which were not hid,
Which all confused I could not know Whether I suffered, or I did:
30 For all seemed guilt, remorse, or woe,
My own or other still the same Life-stifling fear, soul-stifling shame.
So two nights passed the night's dismay Saddened and stunned the coming day 35 Sleep, the wide blessing, seemed to me Distemper's worst calamity.
The third night, when my own loud scream
Had waked me from the fiendish dream, O'ercome with sufferings strange and
wild, 40 I wept as I had been a child;
And having thus by tears subdued
My anguish to a milder mood, Such punishments, I said, were due To natures deepest stained with sin,— 45 For aye entempesting anew
The unfathomable hell within,
The horror of their deeds to view,
To know and loathe, yet wish and do!
Such griefs with such men well agree, 50 But wherefore, wherefore fall on me?
To be beloved is all I need,
And whom I love, I love indeed.

TO A GENTLEMAN¹

COMPOSED ON THE NIGHT AFTER HIS RECITATION OF A POEM ON THE GROWTH OF AN INDIVIDUAL MIND 1806 1817

Friend of the wise! and teacher of the good!
Into my heart have I received that lay More than historic, that prophetic lay Wherein (high theme by thee first sung aright) 5 Of the foundations and the building up Of a human spirit thou hast dared to tell What may be told, to the understanding mind Revealable, and what within the mind
By vital breathings secret as the soul 10 Of vernal growth, oft quickens in the heart Thoughts all too deep for words!²—

Theme hard as high!
Of smiles spontaneous, and mysterious fears (The first-born they of Reason and twin-birth), Of tides obedient to external force, 15 And currents self-determined, as might seem,
Or by some inner Power, of moments awful,
Now in thy inner life, and now abroad,
When power streamed from thee, and thy soul received The light reflected, as a light bestowed—20 Of fancies fair, and milder hours of youth, Hyblean³ murmurs of poetic thought Industrious in its joy, in vales and glens Native or outland, lakes and famous hills!
Or on the lonely high-road, when the stars 25 Were rising, or by secret mountain-streams,
The guides and the companions of thy way!

Of more than Fancy, of the Social Sense Distending wide, and man beloved as man, Where France in all her towns lay vibrating Like some becalmed bark beneath the burst 30 Of Heaven's immediate thunder, when no cloud Is visible, or shadow on the main.
For thou wert there, thine own brows garlanded, Amid the tremor of a realm aglow, 35 Amid a mighty nation jubilant,

³ smooth; sweet (Hybla was an ancient town of Sicily famous for its honey)

When from the general heart of human kind Hope sprang forth like a full-born Deity!
—Of that dear Hope afflicted and struck down,
So summoned homeward, thenceforth calm and sure 40 From the dread watch-tower of man's absolute self,
With light unwaning on her eyes, to look Far on—herself a glory to behold,
The Angel of the vision! Then (last strain)
Of Duty, chosen Laws controlling choice, 45 Action and joy!—An Orphic⁴ song indeed, A song divine of high and passionate thoughts
To their own music chanted!

O great bard!
Ere yet that last strain dying awed the air,
With steadfast eye I viewed thee in the choir 50 Of ever-enduring men. The truly great Have all one age, and from one visible space Shed influence! They, both in power and act, Are permanent, and Time is not with them, Save as it worketh for them, they in it 55 Nor less a sacred roll, than those of old,
And to be placed, as they, with gradual fame
Among the archives of mankind, thy work
Makes audible a linked lay of Truth,
Of Truth profound a sweet continuous lay, 60 Not learnt, but native, her own natural notes!
Ah! as I listened with a heart forlorn,
The pulses of my being beat anew:
And even as life returns upon the drowned, Life's joy rekindling roused a throng of pains—65 Keen pangs of Love, awakening as a babe Turbulent, with an outcry in the heart;
And fears self-willed, that shunned the eye of Hope;
And Hope that scarce would know itself from Fear, Sense of past Youth, and Manhood come in vain, 70 And Genius given, and Knowledge won in vain;
And all which I had culled in wood-walks wild,
And all which patient toil had reared, and all,

⁴ entrancing, like the music ascribed to Orpheus

Commune with thee had opened out—but
flowers

Strewed on my corse, and borne upon my bier

75 In the same coffin, for the self-same grave! 110

That way no more! and ill becoms it
me,

Who came a welcome in herald's guise,
Singing of Glory, and Futurity,

80 To wander back on such unhealthful road, Plucking the poisons of self-harm! And ill Such intertwine becoms triumphal wreaths Strew'd before thy advancing!

Nor do thou,

Sage bard! impan the memory of that hour
Of thy communion with my nobler mind

85 By pity or grief, already felt too long!

Nor let my words import more blame than needs

The tumult rose and ceased. For Peace is nigh

Where Wisdom's voice has found a listening heart

Amid the howl of more than wintry 10
storms.

90 The halcyon¹ hears the voice of vernal
hours

Already on the wing

Ever following eve,

Dear tranquil time, when the sweet sense of home

Is sweetest! moments for their own sake hailed

And more desired, more precious, for thy
song,

95 In silence listening, like a devout child, My soul lay passive, by thy various strain

Driven as in surges now beneath the stars,
With momentary stars of my own birth,

Fair constellated foam, still darting off 100 Into the darkness, now a tranquil sea,

Outspread and bright, yet swelling to the moon

And when—O friend! my comforter and guide!

Strong in thyself, and powerful to give
strength!—

Thy long sustained song finally closed,

105 And thy deep voice had ceased—yet thou thyself

Wert still before my eyes, and round us both

¹ A bird which was fabled to nest at sea about the time of the winter solstice

That happy vision of beloved faces—

Scarce conscious, and yet conscious of its close

I sate, my being blended in one thought (Thought was it? or aspiration? or resolve?)

Absorbed, yet hanging still upon the
sound—

And when I rose, I found myself in prayer.

TIME REAL AND IMAGINARY

AN ALLEGORY

1812 (?) 1817

On the wide level of a mountain's head, (I knew not where, but 'twas some fairy place)

Then pinnons, ostrich-like, for sails out-
spread.

Two lovely children run an endless race,

5 A sister and a brother!

Thus far outstrip the other.

Yet ever runs she with reverted face,
And looks and listens for the boy behind.

For he, alas! is blind!

10 O'er rough and smooth with even step he passed,

And knows not whether he be first or last.

From REMORSE

HEAR, SWEET SPIRIT, HEAR THE SPELL

1812 1813

Hear, sweet spirit, hear the spell,
Lest a blacker charm compel!
So shall the midnight breezes swell
With thy deep long-lingering knell.

5 And at evening evermore,

In a chapel on the shore,

Shall the chanters sad and saintly,

Yellow tapers burning faintly,

Doleful masses chant for thee,

10 Miserere Domine!

Hark! the cadence dies away

On the quiet moonlight sea.

The boatmen rent their oars and say,

Miserere Domine!

Act III, 1. 69-82.

From ZAPOLYA

A SUNNY SHAFT DID I BEHOLD

1815 1817

A sunny shaft did I behold,

From sky to earth it slanted:

And poised therein a bird so bold—

Sweet bird, thou wert enchanted!

¹ Lord, have mercy

5 He sank, he rose, he twinkled, he trolled Within that shaft of sunny mist;
 His eyes of fire, his beak of gold,
 All else of amethyst!

And thus he sang: "Adieu! adieu!
 10 Love's dreams prove seldom true.
 The blossoms they make no delay.
 The sparkling dew-drops will not stay.
 Sweet month of May,
 We must away;
 15 Far, far away!
 Today! today!"

Act II, 1, 65-80

THE KNIGHT'S TOMB

1817 (?)

1834

Where is the grave of Sir Arthur O'Kellyn?
 Where may the grave of that good man
 By the side of a spring, on the breast of Helvellyn,
 Under the twigs of a young birch tree!
 5 The oak that in summer was sweet to hear,
 And rustled its leaves in the fall of the
 year,
 And whistled and roared in the winter
 alone,
 Is gone,—and the birch in its stead is grown —
 The Knight's bones are dust, 10 And his good sword rust,— His soul is with the saints, I trust.

TO NATURE

1820 (?)

1836

It may indeed be phantasy, when I Essay to draw from all created things Deep, heartfelt, inward joy that closely clings,
 And trace in leaves and flowers that round me lie
 5 Lessons of love and earnest piety So let it be; and if the wide world rings
 In mock of this belief, it brings Nor fear, nor grief, nor vain perplexity
 So will I build my altar in the fields, 10 And the blue sky my fretted dome shall be,
 And the sweet fragrance that the wild flower yields
 Shall be the incense I will yield to Thee, Thee only God! and Thou shalt not despise
 Even me, the priest of this poor sacrifice.

YOUTH AND AGE

1823-32

1828-32

Verse, a breeze mid blossoms straying, Where Hope clung feeding, like a bee—Both were mine! Life went a-maying With Nature, Hope and Poesy, 5 When I was young!

When I was young?—Ah, woful When!
 Ah! for the change 'twixt Now and Then!
 This breathing house not built with hands,
 This body that does me grievous wrong, 10 O'er aery cliffs and glittering sands, How lightly then it flashed along!— Like those trim skiffs, unknown of yore,
 On winding lakes and rivers wide,
 That ask no aid of sail or oar, 15 That fear no spite of wind or tide!
 Nought cared this body for wind or weather
 When Youth and I lived in't together.

Flowers are lovely, love is flower-like,
 Friendship is a sheltering tree, 20 O' the joys, that came down shower-like,
 Of friendship, love, and liberty,
 Ere I was old!

Ere I was old? Ah, woful Ere,
 Which tells me, Youth's no longer here!
 25 O Youth! for years so many and sweet,
 'Tis known that thou and I were one,
 I'll think it but a fond conceit—
 It cannot be that thou art gone!
 Thy vesper-bell hath not yet toll'd.— 30 And thou wert aye a masker bold!
 What strange disguise hast now put on,
 To make believe that thou art gone?
 I see these locks in silvery slips,
 This drooping gait, this altered size.
 35 But spring-tide blossoms on thy lips,
 And tears take sunshine from thine eyes!
 Life is but thought: so think I will That Youth and I are house-mates still

Dew-drops are the gems of morning, 40 But the tears of mournful eve!
 Where no hope is, life's a warning
 That only serves to make us grieve,
 When we are old:

That only serves to make us grieve
 45 With oft and tedious taking-leave, Like some poor nigh-related guest,
 That may not rudely be dismiss'd;
 Yet hath outstay'd his welcome while,
 And tells the jest without the smile.

WORK WITHOUT HOPE

1825

1828

All Nature seems at work. Slugs leave their lair—

The bees are stirring—birds are on the
wing—

And Winter slumbering in the open air, Wears on his smiling face a dream of Spring!

5 And I the while, the sole unbusy thing, Nor honey make, nor pan, nor build, nor sing.

Yet well I ken the banks where amaranths blow,
Have traced the fount whence streams of nectar flow.

Bloom, O ye amaranths! bloom for whom ye may,

10 For me ye bloom not! Glide, rich streams,
away!

With lips unbrightened, wreathless brow,
I stroll.

And would you learn the spells that drowse my soul?

Work without Hope draws nectar in a sieve,

And Hope without an object cannot live

THE GARDEN OF BOCCACCIO

1828

1829

Of late, in one of those most weary hours, When life seems emptied of all genial
powers,

A dreary mood, which he who ne'er has known

May bless his happy lot, I sate alone;

5 And, from the numbing spell to win relief, 'Call'd on the Past for thought of glee or grief.

In vain! bereft alike of grief and glee,
I sate and cower'd o'er my own vacancy!
And as I watch'd the dull continuous ache,

10 Which, all else slumb'ring, seemed alone to wake;

O friend! long wont to notice yet conceal,
And soothe by silence what words cannot heal,

I but half saw that quiet hand of thine Place on my desk this exquisite design²

15 Boccaccio's Garden and its faery,
The love, the joyance, and the gallantry!
An idyll, with Boccaccio's spirit warm, Framed in the silent poesy of form

² Stothard's engraving, The Garden of Boccaccio

Like flocks adown a newly-bathed steep 20 Emerging from a mist, or like a stream Of music soft that not dispels the sleep, But casts in happier moulds the slumberer's dream,

Gazed by an idle eye with silent might The picture stole upon my inward sight

25 A tremulous warmth crept gradual o'er my chest,

As though an infant's finger touch'd my breast

And one by one (I know not whence) were brought

All spirits of power that most had stir'd
my thought

30 In selfless boyhood, on a new world tost (Of wonder, and in its own fancies lost, Or charm'd my youth, that, kindled from above,

Loved ere it loved, and sought a form for
love;

On lent a lustre to the earnest scan Of manhood, musing what and whence is
man!

worn caves

Rehears'd their war-spell to the winds and waves,

Or fateful hymn of those prophetic maids,²

That call'd on Hertha in deep forest glades,

Or minstrel lay, that cheer'd the baron's feast;

40 Or rhyme of city pomp, of monk and priest,

Judge, mayor, and many a guild in long
array,

To high-church pacing on the great saint's
day

And many a verse which to myself I sang, That woke the tear, yet stole away the pang

45 Of hopes, which in lamenting I renew'd And last, a matron now, of sober mien, Yet radiant still and with no earthly sheen, Whom as a faery child my childhood woo'd

Even in my dawn of thought—Philosophy.

50 Though then unconscious of herself, pardie,³

She bore no other name than Poesy.

And, like a gift from Heaven, in life's full glee,

That had but newly left a mother's knee, Prattled and play'd with bird and flower, and stone,

55 As if with elfin playfellows well known,
And life reveal'd to innocence alone.

- A lovely form there sate beside my bed,
And such a feeding calm its presence

Is't history? vision? or an idle song?
15 Or rather say at once, within what space Of time this wild disastrous change took

EPITAPH

1833 1834

Stop, Christian passer-by!—Stop, child of God,
And read with gentle breast. Bencath this sod
A poet lies, or that which once seem'd he.
O, lift one thought in prayer for S T C ; 5 That he who many a year with toil of breath
Found death in life, may here find life in death!
Mercy for praise—to be forgiven for fame He ask'd, and hoped, through Christ. Do thou the same!

THE WANDERINGS OF CAIN

1798 1828

· CANTO II

"A little further, O my father, yet a little further, and we shall come into the open moonlight." Their road was through a forest of fir-trees, at its entrance the trees stood at distances from each other, and the path was broad, and the moonlight and the moonlight shadows reposed upon it, and appeared quietly to inhabit that solitude.
But soon the path winded and became narrow, the sun at high noon sometimes speckled, but never illumined it, and now it was dark as a cavern

"It is dark, O my father!" said Enos,
"but the path under our feet is smooth and soft, and we shall soon come out into the open moonlight."

"Lead on, my child!" said Cain, "guide me, little child!" And the innocent little child clasped a finger of the hand which had murdered the righteous Abel, and he guided his father. "The fir branches drip 5 upon thee, my son." "Yea, pleasantly, father, for I ran fast and eagerly to bring thee the pitcher and the cake, and my body is not yet cool. How happy the squirrels are that feed on these fir-trees! they leap 10 from bough to bough, and the old squirrels play round their young ones in the nest. I clomb a tree yesterday at noon, O my father, that I might play with them, but they leaped away from the branches, even to the slender twigs did they leap, and in a moment I beheld them on another tree. Why, O my father, would they not play with me? I would be good to them as thou art good to me, and I groaned to 20 them even as thou groanest when thou givest me to eat, and when thou coverest me at evening, and as often as I stand at thy knee and thine eyes look at me." Then Cain stopped, and stifling his groans, he sank to the earth, and the child Enos stood in the darkness beside him.

And Cain lifted up his voice and cried bitterly, and said, "The Mighty One that persecuteth me is on this side and on that, 30 he pursueth my soul like the wind, like the sand-blast he passeth through me, he is around me even as the air! O that I might be utterly no more! I desire to die—yea, the things that never had life, neither move they upon the earth—behold! they seem precious to mine eyes. O that a man might live without the breath of his nostrils! So I might abide in darkness, and blackness, and an empty space! Yea, I would lie 40 down, I would not rise, neither would I stir my limbs till I became as the rock in the den of the lion, on which the young lion resteth his head whilst he sleepeth. For the torrent that roareth far off hath a 50 voice, and the clouds in heaven look terribly on me; the Mighty One who is against me speaketh in the wind of the cedar grove, and in silence am I dried up." Then Enos spake to his father, "Arise, my father, arise; we are but a little way from the place where I found the cake and the pitcher." And Cain said, "How knowest thou?" and the child answered—"Behold the bare rocks are a few of thy strides distant from the forest; and while even now thou wert lifting up thy voice, I heard the echo." Then the child took hold of his father, as if he would raise him: and Cain being faint and feeble rose slowly on his knees and pressed himself against the trunk of a fir, and stood upright and followed the child.

The path was dark till within three strides' length of its termination, when it turned suddenly; the thick black trees formed a low arch, and the moonlight appeared for a moment like a dazzling portal. Enos ran before and stood in the open air, and when Cain, his father, emerged from the darkness, the child was affrighted. For the mighty limbs of Cain were wasted as by fire, his hair was as the matted curls on the bison's forehead, and so glared his fierce and sullen eye beneath: and the black abundant locks on either side, a rank and tangled mass, were stained and scorched, as though the grasp of a burning iron hand had striven to rend them; and his countenance told in a strange and terrible language of agonies that had been, and were, and were still to continue to be.

The scene around was desolate, as far as the eye could reach it was desolate the bare rocks faced each other, and left a long and wide interval of thin white sand. You might wander on and look round and round, and peep into the crevices of the rocks and discover nothing that acknowledged the influence of the seasons. There was no spring, no summer, no autumn and the winter's snow, that would have been lovely, tell not on these hot rocks and scorching sands. Never morning lark had poised himself over this desert, but the huge serpent often hissed there beneath the talons of the vulture, and the vulture screamed, his wings imprisoned within the coils of the serpent. The pointed and shattered summits of the ridges of the rocks made a rude mimicry of human concerns, and seemed to prophesy mutely of things that then were not; steeples, and battlements, and ships with naked masts. As far from the wood as a boy might sling a pebble of the brook, there was one rock by itself at a small distance from the main ridge. It had been precipitated there perhaps by the groan which the Earth uttered when our first father fell. Before you approached, it appeared to lie flat on the ground, but its base slanted from its point, and between its point and the sands a tall man might stand upright. It was here that Enos had found the pitcher and cake, and to this place he led his father. But ere they had reached the rock they beheld a human shape: his back was towards them, and they were advancing unperceived, when they heard him smite his breast and cry aloud, "Woe is me! woe is me! I must never die again, and yet I am perishing with thirst and hunger."

Pallid, as the reflection of the sheeted lightning on the heavy-sailing night-cloud, became the face of Cain; but the child Enos took hold of the shaggy skin, his father's robe, and raised his eyes to his father, and listening whispered, "Ere yet I could speak, I am sure, O my father, that I heard that voice. Have not I often said that I remembered a sweet voice? O my father! this is it!" and Cain trembled exceedingly. The voice was sweet indeed, but it was thin and querulous, like that of a feeble slave in misery, who despairs altogether, yet cannot refrain himself from weeping and lamentation. And, behold! Enos glided forward, and creeping softly round the base of the rock, stood before the stranger, and looked up into his face. And the Shape shrieked, and turned round, and Cain beheld him, that his limbs and his face were those of his brother Abel whom he had killed! And Cain stood like one who struggles in his sleep because of the exceeding terribleness of a dream.

Thus as he stood in silence and darkness of soul, the Shape fell at his feet, and embraced his knees, and cried out with a bitter outcry, "Thou eldest born of Adam, whom Eve, my mother, brought forth, cease to torment me! I was feeding my flocks in green pastures by the side of quiet rivers,¹ and thou killedst me, and now I am in misery!" Then Cain closed his eyes, and hid them with his hands; and again he opened his eyes, and looked around him, and said to Enos, "What beholdest thou? Didst thou hear a voice, my son?" "Yes, my father, I beheld a man in unclean garments, and he uttered a sweet voice, full of lamentation." Then Cain raised up the Shape that was like Abel, and said "The Creator of our father, who had respect unto thee, and unto thy offering, wherefore hath he forsaken thee?" Then the Shape shrieked a second time, and rent his garment, and his naked skin was like the white sands beneath their feet, and he shrieked yet a third time, and threw himself on his face upon the sand that was black with the shadow of the rock, and Cain and Enos sat beside him; the child by his right hand, and Cain by his left. They were all three under the rock, and within the shadow. The Shape that was like Abel raised himself up, and spake to the child, "I know where the cold waters are, but I may not drink, wherefore didst thou then take away my pitcher?" But Cain said, "Didst thou not find favor in the sight of the Lord thy God?" The Shape answered, "The Lord is God of the living only, the dead have another God." Then the child Enos lifted up his eyes and prayed; but Cain rejoiced secretly in his heart "Wretched shall they be all the days of their mortal life," exclaimed the Shape, "who sacrifice worthy and acceptable sacrifices to the God of the dead; but after death their toil ceaseth Woe is me, for I was well beloved by the God of the living, and cruel wert thou, O my brother, who didst snatch me away from his power and his dominion." Having uttered these words, he rose suddenly, and fled over the sands and Cain said in his heart, "The curse of the Lord is on me; but who is the God of the dead?" and he ran after the Shape, and the Shape fled shrieking over the sands, and the sands rose like white mists behind the steps of Cain, but the feet of him that was like Abel disturbed not the sands. He greatly outran Cain, and turning short, he wheeled round, and came again to the rock where they had been sitting, and where Enos still stood; and the child caught hold of his garment as he passed by, and he fell upon the ground. And Cain stopped, and beholding him not, said, "He has passed into the dark woods," and he walked slowly back to the rocks, and when he reached it the child told him that he had caught hold of his garment as he passed by, and that the man had fallen upon the ground and Cain once more sate beside him, and said, "Abel, my brother, I would lament for thee, but that the spirit within me is withered, and burnt up with extreme agony. Now, I pray thee, by thy flocks, and by thy pastures, and by the quiet rivers which thou lovedst, that thou tell me all that thou knowest. Who is the God of the dead? where doth he make his dwelling? what sacrifices are acceptable unto him? for I have offered, but have not been received; I have prayed, and have not been heard, and how can I be afflicted more than I already am?" The Shape arose and answered, "O that thou hadst had pity on me as I will have pity on thee. Follow me, Son of Adam! and bring thy child with thee!"

And they three passed over the white sands between the rocks, silent as the shadows.

CHAPTER XIV

- 5 Occasion of the Lyrical Ballads, and the objects originally proposed—Preface to the second edition—The ensuing controversy, its causes and acrimony—Philosophic definitions of a Poem and Poetry with scholia

During the first year that Mr. Wordsworth and I were neighbors,¹ our conversations turned frequently on the two cardinal points of poetry, the power of exciting the sympathy of the reader by a faithful adherence to the truth of nature, and the power of giving the interest of novelty by the modifying colors of imagination. The sudden charm, which accidents of light and shade, which moonlight or sunset diffused over a known and familiar landscape, appeared to represent the practicability of combining both. These are the poetry of nature. The thought suggested itself (to which of us I do not recollect) that a series of poems might be composed of two sorts. In the one, the incidents and agents were to be, in part at least, supernatural, and the excellence aimed at was to consist in the interesting of the affections by the dramatic truth of such emotions, as would naturally accompany such situations, supposing them real. And real in this sense they have been to every human being who, from whatever source of delusion, has at any time believed himself under supernatural agency. For the second class, subjects were to be chosen from ordinary life; the characters and incidents were to be such as will be found in every village and its vicinity, where there is a meditative and feeling mind to seek after them, or to notice them, when they present themselves.

In this idea originated the plan of the Lyrical Ballads; in which it was agreed, that my endeavors should be directed to persons and characters supernatural, or at least romantic; yet so as to transfer from our inward nature a human interest and a semblance of truth sufficient to procure for these shadows of imagination that willing suspension of disbelief for the moment, which constitutes poetic faith. Mr. Wordsworth, on the other hand, was to propose to himself as his object, to give the charm of novelty to things of every day, and to excite a feeling analogous to the supernatural, by awakening the mind's attention to the lethargy of custom, and directing it to the loveliness and the wonders of the world before us; an inexhaustible treasure, but for which, in consequence of the film of familiarity and selfish solicitude, we have eyes, yet see not, ears that hear not, and hearts that neither feel nor understand.¹

With this view I wrote The Ancient Mariner, and was preparing, among other poems, The Dark Ladie, and the Christabel, in which I should have more nearly realized my ideal, than I had done in my first attempt. But Mr Wordsworth's industry had proved so much more successful, and the number of his poems so much greater, that my compositions, instead of forming a balance, appeared rather an interpolation of heterogeneous matter. Mr. Wordsworth added two or three poems written in his own character, in the impassioned, lofty, and sustained diction, which is characteristic of his genius. In this form the Lyrical Ballads were published, and were presented by him, as an experiment, whether subjects, which from their nature rejected the usual ornaments and extra-colloquial style of poems in general, might not be so managed in the language of ordinary life as to produce the pleasurable interest, which it is the peculiar business of poetry to impart. To the second edition he added a preface of considerable length, in which, notwithstanding some passages of apparently a contrary import, he was understood to contend for the extension of this style to poetry of all kinds, and to reject as vicious and indefensible all phrases and forms of speech that were not included in what he (unfortunately, I think, adopting an equivocal expression) called the language of real life. From this preface, prefixed to poems in which it was impossible to deny the presence of original genius, however mistaken its direction might be deemed, arose the whole long-continued controversy.² For from the conjunction of perceived power with supposed heresy, I explain the inveteracy and in some instances, I grieve to say, the acrimonious passions, with which the controversy has been conducted by the assailants.

Had Mr Wordsworth's poems been the silly, the childish things, which they were for a long time described as being, had they been really distinguished from the compositions of other poets merely by meanness of language and inanity of thought; had they indeed contained nothing more than what is found in the parodies

and pretended imitations of them, they must have sunk at once, a dead weight, into the slough of oblivion, and have dragged the preface along with them. But year after year increased the number of Mr Wordsworth's admirers. They were found, too, not in the lower classes of the reading public, but chiefly among young men of strong sensibility and meditative minds; and their admiration (inflamed perhaps in some degree by opposition) was distinguished by its intensity, I might almost say, by its religious fervor. These facts, and the intellectual energy of the author, which was more or less consciously felt, where it was outwardly and even boisterously denied, meeting with sentiments of aversion to his opinions, and of alarm at their consequences, produced an eddy of criticism, which would of itself have borne up the poems by the violence with which it whirled them round and round. With many parts of this preface in the sense attributed to them and which the words undoubtedly seem to authorize, I never concurred, but on the contrary objected to them as erroneous in principle, and as contradictory (in appearance at least) both to other parts of the same preface, and to the author's own practice in the greater part of the poems themselves. Mr Wordsworth in his recent collection has, I find, degraded this prefatory disquisition to the end of his second volume, to be read or not at the reader's choice. But he has not, as far as I can discover, announced any change in his poetic creed. At all events, considering it as the source of a controversy, in which I have been honored more than I deserve by the frequent conjunction of my name with his, I think it expedient to declare once for all, in what points I coincide with the opinions supported in that preface, and in what points I altogether differ. But in order to render myself intelligible I must previously, in as few words as possible, explain my ideas, first, of a poem; and secondly, of poetry itself, in kind and in essence.

The office of philosophical disquisition consists in just distinction, while it is the privilege of the philosopher to preserve himself constantly aware that distinction is not division. In order to obtain adequate notions of any truth, we must intellectually separate its distinguishable parts; and this is the technical process of philosophy. But having so done, we must then restore them in our conceptions to the unity, in which

² Over Wordsworth's theory and practice of poetic art they actually coexist; and this is the result of philosophy. A poem contains the same elements as a prose composition; the difference, therefore, must consist in a different combination of them, in consequence of a different object being proposed. According to the difference of the object will be the difference of the combination. It is possible that the object may be merely to facilitate the recollection of any given facts or observations by artificial arrangement; and the composition will be a poem, merely because it is distinguished from prose by metre, or by rhyme, or by both conjointly. In this, the lowest sense, a man might attribute the name of a poem to the well-known enumeration of the days in the several months.

Thirty days hath September, April, June, and November, &c.

and others of the same class and purpose. And as a particular pleasure is found in anticipating the recurrence of sounds and quantities, all compositions that have this charm superadded, whatever be their contents, may be entitled poems.

So much for the superficial form. A difference of object and contents supplies an additional ground of distinction. The immediate purpose may be the communication of truths, either of truth absolute and demonstrable, as in works of science, or of facts experienced and recorded, as in history. Pleasure, and that of the highest and most permanent kind, may result from the attainment of the end, but it is not itself the immediate end. In other works the communication of pleasure may be the immediate purpose; and though truth, either moral or intellectual, ought to be the ultimate end, yet this will distinguish the character of the author, not the class to which the work belongs. Blest indeed is that state of society, in which the immediate purpose would be baffled by the perversion of the proper ultimate end, in which no charm of diction or imagery could exempt the Bathylus even of an Anacreon, or the Alexis of Virgil, from disgust and aversion!

But the communication of pleasure may be the immediate object of a work not metrically composed; and that object may have been in a high degree attained, as in novels and romances. Would then the mere super-addition of metre, with or without rhyme, entitle these to the name of poems? The answer is, that nothing can permanently please, which does not contain in itself the reason why it is so, and not otherwise. If metre be superadded, all other parts must be made consonant with it. They must be such as to justify the perpetual and distinct attention to each part, which an exact correspondent recurrence of accent and sound are calculated to excite. The final definition then, so deduced, may be thus worded. A poem is that species of composition, which is opposed to works of science, by proposing for its immediate object pleasure, not truth, and from all other species (having this object in common with it) it is discriminated by proposing to itself such delight from the whole, as is compatible with a distinct gratification from each component part.

Controversy is not seldom excited in consequence of the disputants attaching each a different meaning to the same word; and in few instances has this been more striking, than in disputes concerning the present subject. If a man chooses to call every composition a poem, which is rhyme, or measure, or both, I must leave his opinion uncontroverted. The distinction is at least competent to characterize the writer's intention. If it were subjoined, that the whole is likewise entertaining or affecting, as a tale, or as a series of interesting reflections, I of course admit this as another fit ingredient of a poem, and an additional merit. But if the definition sought for be that of a legitimate poem, I answer, it must be one the parts of which mutually support and explain each other; all in their proportion harmonizing with, and supporting the purpose and known influences of metrical arrangement. The philosophic critics of all ages coincide with the ultimate judgment of all countries, in equally denying the praises of a just poem, on the one hand, to a series of striking lines or distiches, each of which, absorbing the whole attention of the reader to itself, disjoins it from its context, and makes it a separate whole, instead of a harmonizing part; and on the other hand, to an unsustained composition, from which the reader collects rapidly the general result unattracted by the component parts. The reader should be carried forward, not merely or chiefly by the mechanical impulse of curiosity, or by a restless desire to arrive at the final solution; but by the pleasurable activity of mind excited by the attractions of the journey itself. Like the motion of a serpent, which the Egyptians made the emblem of intellectual power; or like the path of sound through the air; at every step he pauses and half recedes, and from the retrogressive movement collects the force which again carries him onward. Præcipiendus est liber spiritus,¹ says Petronius Arbitrator most happily. The epithet, liber, here balances the preceding verb; and it is not easy to conceive more meaning condensed in fewer words.

But if this should be admitted as a satisfactory character of a poem, we have still to seek for a definition of poetry. The writings of Plato, and Bishop Taylor, and the Theoria Sacra of Burnet, furnish undeniable proofs that poetry of the highest kind may exist without metre, and even without the contradistinguishing objects of a poem. The first chapter of Isaiah (indeed a very large portion of the whole book) is poetry in the most emphatic sense, yet it would be not less irrational than strange to assert, that pleasure, and not truth, was the immediate object of the prophet. In short, whatever specific import we attach to the word, poetry, there will be found involved in it, as a necessary consequence, that a poem of any length neither can be, nor ought to be, all poetry.² Yet if an harmonious whole is to be produced, the remaining parts must be preserved in keeping with the poetry, and this can be no otherwise effected than by such a studied selection and artificial arrangement as will partake of one, though not a peculiar property of poetry. And this again can be no other than the property of exciting a more continuous and equal attention than the language of prose aims at, whether colloquial or written.

My own conclusions on the nature of poetry, in the strictest use of the word, have been in part anticipated in the preceding discussion on the fancy and imagination.³ What is poetry? is so nearly the same question with, What is a poet? that the answer to the one is involved in the solution of the other. For it is a distinction resulting from the poetic genius itself, which sustains and modifies the images, thoughts, and emotions of the poet's own mind.

The poet, described in ideal perfection, brings the whole soul of man into activity, with the subordination of its faculties to each other according to their relative worth and dignity. He diffuses a tone and spirit of unity, that blends, and (as it were) fuses, each into each, by that synthetic and magical power, to which I would exclusively appropriate the name of imagination. This power, first put in action by the will and understanding, and retained under their irremissive, though gentle and unnoticed, control (laxis effertur habemus)¹ reveals itself in the balance or reconciliation of opposite or discordant qualities of sameness, with difference, of the general, with the concrete, the idea, with the image, the individual, with the representative, the sense of novelty and freshness, with old and familiar objects; a more than usual state of emotion, with more than usual order, judgment ever awake and steady self-possession, with enthusiasm and feeling profound or vehement, and while it blends and harmonizes the natural and the artificial, still subordinates art to nature; the manner to the matter; and our admiration of the poet to our sympathy with the poetry. "Doubtless," as Sir John Davies observes of the soul² (and his words may with slight alteration be applied, and even more appropriately, to the poetic imagination),—

Doubtless this could not be, but that she turns Bodies to spirit by sublimation strange,
As she converts to fire the things it burns,
As we our food into our nature change

From their gross matter she abstracts their forms,
And draws a kind of quintessence from things Which to her proper nature she transforms To bear them light on her celestial wings

Thus does she, when from individual states
She doth abstract the universal kinds Which then re-clothed in divers names and fates Steal access through the senses to our minds

Finally, good sense is the body of poetic genius, fancy its drapery, motion its life, and imagination the soul that is everywhere, and in each, and forms all into one graceful and intelligent whole.

CHAPTER XVII

Examination of the tenets peculiar to Mr. Wordsworth—Rustic life (above all, low and rustic life) especially unfavorable to the formation of a human diction—The best parts of language the product of philosophers, not of clowns or shepherds—Poetry essentially ideal and generic—The language of Milton as much the language of real life, vera, incomparably more so than that of the cottager

As far, then, as Mr. Wordsworth in his preface contended, and most ably contended, for a reformation in our poetic diction; as far as he has evinced the truth of passion, and the dramatic propriety of those figures and metaphors in the original poets, which, stripped of their justifying reasons and converted into mere artifices of connection or ornament, constitute the characteristic falsity in the poetic style of the moderns, and as far as he has, with equal acuteness and clearness, pointed out the process by which this change was effected, and the resemblances between that state into which the reader's mind is thrown by the pleasurable confusion of thought from an unaccustomed train of words and images, and that state which is induced by the natural language of impassioned feeling; he undertook a useful task, and deserves all praise, both for the attempt and for the execution. The provocations to this remonstrance in behalf of truth and nature were still of perpetual recurrence before and after the publication of this preface. I cannot likewise but add, that the comparison of such poems of merit, as have been given to the public within the last ten or twelve years, with the majority of those produced previously to the appearance of that preface, leave no doubt on my mind, that Mr Wordsworth is fully justified in believing his efforts to have been by no means ineffectual. Not only in the verses of those who have professed their admiration of his genius, but even of those who have distinguished themselves by hostility to his theory, and depreciation of his writings, are the impressions of his principles plainly visible. It is possible that with these principles others may have been blended, which are not equally evident, and some which are unsteady and subvertible from the narrowness or imperfection of their basis. But it is more than possible that these errors of defect or exaggeration, by kindling and feeding the controversy, may have conducted not only to the wider propagation of the accompanying truths, but that, by their frequent presentation to the mind in an excited state, they may have won for them a more permanent and practical result. A man will borrow a part from his opponent the more easily, if he feels himself justified in continuing to reject a part. While there remain important points in which he can still feel himself in the right, in which he still finds firm footing for continued resistance, he will gradually adopt those opinions, which were the least remote from his own convictions, as not less congruous with his own theory than with that which he reprobates. In like manner with a kind of instinctive prudence, he will abandon by little and little his weakest posts, till at length he seems to forget that they had ever belonged to him, or affects to consider them at most as accidental and "petty annexments," the removal of which leaves the citadel unhurt and unendangered.

My own differences from certain supposed parts of Mr. Wordsworth's theory ground themselves on the assumption that his words had been rightly interpreted, as purporting that the proper diction for poetry in general consists altogether in a language taken, with due exceptions, from the mouths of men in real life, a language which actually constitutes the natural conversation of men under the influence of natural feelings. My objection is, first, that in any sense this rule is applicable only to certain classes of poetry, secondly, that even to these classes it is not applicable, except in such a sense, as hath never by any one (as far as I know or have read) been denied or doubted, and lastly, that as far as, and in that degree in which it is practicable, it is yet, as a rule, useless, if not injurious, and, therefore, either need not or ought not to be practised. The poet informs his reader that he had generally chosen low and rustic life; but not as low and rustic, or in order to repeat that pleasure of doubtful moral effect, which persons of elevated rank and of superior refinement oftentimes derive from a happy imitation of the rude unpolished manners and discourse of their inferiors. For the pleasure so derived may be traced to three exciting causes. The first is the naturalness, in fact, of the things represented. The second is the apparent naturalness of the representation, as raised and qualified by an imperceptible infusion of the author's own knowledge and talent, which infusion does, indeed, constitute it an imitation as distinguished from a mere copy. The third cause may be found in the reader's conscious feeling of his superiority, awakened by the contrast presented to him, even as for the same purpose the kings and great barons of yore retained sometimes actual clowns and fools but more frequently shrewd and witty fellows in that character. These, however, were not Mr Wordsworth's objects. He chose low and rustic life, "because in that condition the essential passions of the heart find a better soil, in which they can attain their maturity, are less under restraint, and speak a plainer and more emphatic language; because in that condition of life our elementary feelings coexist in a state of greater simplicity, and consequently may be more accurately contemplated, and more forcibly communicated; because the manners of rural life germinate from those elementary feelings; and from the necessary character of rural occupations are more easily comprehended, and are more durable; and, lastly, because in that condition the passions of men are incorporated with the beautiful and permanent forms of nature "

Now it is clear to me that in the most interesting of the poems, in which the author is more or less dramatic, as The Brothers, Michael, Ruth, The Mad Mother,¹ etc., the persons introduced are by no means taken from low or rustic life in the common acceptation of those words, and it is not less clear that the sentiments and language, as far as they can be conceived to have been really transferred from the minds and conversation of such persons, are attributable to causes and circumstances not necessarily connected with "their occupations and abode." The thoughts, feelings, language, and manners of the shepherd-farmers in the vales of Cumberland and Westmoreland, as far as they are actually adopted in those poems, may be accounted for from causes, which will and do produce the same results in every state of life, whether in town or country. As the two principal I rank that independence which raises a man above servitude, or daily toil for the profit of others, yet not above the necessity of industry and a frugal simplicity of domestic life, and the accompanying unambitious, but solid and religious, education which has rendered few books familiar but the Bible and the liturgy or hymn book. To this latter cause, indeed, which is so far accidental that it is the blessing of particular countries and a particular age, not the product of particular places or employments, the poet owes the show of probability, that his personages might really feel, think, and talk with any tolerable resemblance to his representation. It is an excellent remark of Dr. Henry More's, that "a man of confined education, but of good parts, by constant reading of the Bible, will naturally form a more winning and commanding rhetoric than those that are learned, the intermixture of tongues and of artificial phrases debasing their style."²

It is, moreover, to be considered that to the formation of healthy feelings, and a reflecting mind, negations involve impediments not less formidable than sophistication and vicious intermixture. I am convinced that for the human soul to prosper in rustic life a certain vantage-ground is prerequisite. It is not every man that is likely to be improved by a country life or by country labors. Education, or original sensibility, or both, must pre-exist, if the changes, forms, and incidents of nature are to prove a sufficient stimulant. And where these are not sufficient, the mind contracts and hardens by want of stimulants, and the man becomes selfish, sensual, gross, and hard-hearted. Let the management of the Poor Laws in Liverpool, Manchester, or Bristol be compared with the ordinary dispensation of the poor rates¹ in agricultural villages, where the farmers are the overseers and guardians of the poor. If my own experience have not been particularly unfortunate, as well as that of the many respectable country clergymen with whom I have conversed on the subject, the result would engender more than skepticism concerning the desirable influences of low and rustic life in and for itself. Whatever may be concluded on the other side, from the stronger local attachments and enterprising spirit of the Swiss, and other mountaineers, applies to a particular mode of pastoral life, under forms of property that permit and beget manners truly republican, not to rustic life in general, or to the absence of artificial cultivation. On the contrary, the mountaineers, whose manners have been so often eulogized, are in general better educated and greater readers than men of equal rank elsewhere. But where this is not the case, as among the peasantry of North Wales, the ancient mountains, with all their terrors and all their glories, are pictures to the blind, and music to the deaf.

I should not have entered so much into detail upon this passage, but here seems to be the point to which all the lines of difference converge as to their source and centre—I mean, as far as, and in whatever respect, my poetic creed does differ from the doctrines promulgated in this preface. I adopt with full faith the principle of Aristotle, that poetry, as poetry, is essentially ideal,² that it avoids and excludes all accident, that its apparent individualities of rank, character, or occupation must be representative of a class; and that the persons of poetry must be clothed with generic attributes, with the common attributes of the class; not with such as one gifted individual might possibly possess, but such as from his situation it is most probable before-hand that he would possess. If my premises are right and my deductions legitimate, it follows that there can be no poetic medium between the swains of Theocritus and those of an imaginary golden age.¹

The characters of the vicar and the shepherd-maid in the poem of The Brothers, and that of the shepherd of Green-head Ghyll² in the Michael, have all the verisimilitude and representative quality that the purposes of poetry can require. They are persons of a known and abiding class, and their manners and sentiments the natural product of circumstances common to the class. Take Michael for instance.

An old man, stout of heart and strong of limb.
His bodily frame had been from youth to age
Of an unusual strength his mind was keen,
Intense, and frugal, apt for all affairs,
And in his shepherd's calling he was prompt
And watchful more than ordinary men
Hence he had learned the meaning of all winds,
Of blasts of every tone and oftentimes
When others heeded not, he heard the South
Make subterraneous music, like the noise
Of bagpipes on distant Highland hills
The shepherd, at such warning, of his flock
Bethought him, and he to himself would say,
"The winds are now devising work for me."
And truly, at all times, the storm, that drives
The traveller to a shelter, summoned him
Up to the mountains, he had been alone
Amid the heat of many thousand mist,
That came to him and left him on the heights.
So lived he, until his eightieth year was past
And grossly that man errs, who should suppose
That the green valleys, and the streams and rocks,
Were things indifferent to the shepherd's thoughts.
Fields, where with cheerful spirits he had breathed
The common air, the hills, which he so oft Had climbed with vigorous steps, which had impressed
So many incidents upon his mind
Of hardship, skill or courage, joy or fear
Which, like a book, preserved the memory
Of the dumb animals, whom he had saved,
Had fed or sheltered, linking to such acts,
So grateful in themselves, the certainty
Of honorable gain these fields, these hills Which were his living Being, even more Than his own blood—what could they less³ had laid
Strong hold on his affections, were to him
A pleasurable feeling of blind love,
The pleasure which there is in life itself.

On the other hand, in the poems which are pitched in a lower key, as the Harry Gill, and The Idiot Boy, etc., the feelings are those of human nature in general; though the poet has judiciously laid the scene in the country, in order to place himself in the vicinity of interesting images, without the necessity of ascribing a sentimental perception of their beauty to the persons of his drama. In The Idiot Boy, indeed, the mother's character is not so much the real and native product of a "situation where the essential passions of the heart find a better soil, in which they can attain their maturity and speak a plainer and more emphatic language," as it is an impersonation of an instinct abandoned by judgment. Hence the two following charges seems to me not wholly groundless, at least, they are the only plausible objections which I have heard to that fine poem. The one is, that the author has not, in the poem itself, taken sufficient care to preclude from the reader's fancy the disgusting images of ordinary, morbid idiocy, which yet it was by no means his intention to represent. He was even by the "burr, burr, burr,"⁴ uncounteracted by any preceding description of the boy's beauty, assisted in recalling them. The other is, that the idiocy of the boy is so evenly balanced by the folly of the mother, as to present to the general reader rather a laughable burlesque on the blindness of anile⁵ dotage, than an analytic display of maternal affection in its ordinary workings.

In The Thorn, the poet himself acknowledges in a note the necessity of an introductory poem, in which he should have portrayed the character of the person from whom the words of the poem are supposed to proceed—a superstitious man moderately imaginative, of slow faculties and deep feelings, "a captain of a small trading vessel, for example, who, being past the middle age of life, had retired upon an annuity, or small independent income, to some village or country town of which he was not a native, or in which he had not been accustomed to live. Such men having nothing to do become credulous and talkative from indolence." But in a poem, still more in a lyric poem (and the Nurse in Romeo and Juliet alone prevents me from extending the remark even to dramatic poetry, if indeed even the Nurse can be deemed altogether a case in point) it is not possible to imitate truly a dull and garrulous discourser, without repeating the effects of dullness and garrulity. However this may be, I dare assert that the parts (and these form the far larger portion of the whole) which might as well or still better have proceeded from the poet's own imagination, and have been spoken in his own character, are those which have given, and which will continue to give, universal delight, and that the passages exclusively appropriate to the supposed narrator, such as the last couplet of the third stanza, the seven last lines of the tenth, and the five following stanzas, with the exception of the four admirable lines at the commencement of the fourteenth, are felt by many unprejudiced and unsophisticated hearts, as sudden and unpleasant sinkings from the height to which the poet had previously lifted them, and to which he again re-elevates both himself and his reader

If then I am compelled to doubt the theory, by which the choice of characters was to be directed, not only a priori, from grounds of reason, but both from the few instances in which the poet himself need be supposed to have been governed by it, and from the comparative inferiority of these instances, still more must I hesitate in my assent to the sentence which immediately follows the former citation, and which I can neither admit as particular fact, nor as general rule. "The language, too, of these men has been adopted (purified indeed from what appear to be its real defects, from all lasting and rational causes of dislike or disgust) because such men hourly communicate with the best objects from which the best part of language is originally derived, and because, from their rank in society and the sameness and narrow circle of their intercourse, being less under the action of social vanity, they convey their feelings and notions in simple and unelaborated expressions." To this I reply that a rustic's language, purified from all provincialism and grossness, and so far reconstructed as to be made consistent with the rules of grammar (which are in essence no other than the laws of universal logic, applied to psychological materials) will not differ from the language of any other man of common sense, however learned or refined he may be, except as far as the notions, which the rustic has to convey, are fewer and more indiscriminate. This will become still clearer, if we add the consideration (equally important though less obvious) that the rustic, from the more imperfect development of his faculties, and from the lower state of their cultivation, aims almost solely to convey insulated facts, either those of his scanty experience or his traditional belief; while the educated man chiefly seeks to discover and express those connections of things, or those relative bearings of fact to fact, from which some more or less general law is deducible. For facts are valuable to a wise man, chiefly as they lead to the discovery of the indwelling law, which is the true being of things, the sole solution of their modes of existence, and in the knowledge of which consists our dignity and our power.

As little can I agree with the assertion that from the objects with which the rustic hourly communicates, the best part of language is formed. For first, if to communicate with an object implies such an acquaintance with it as renders it capable of being discriminately reflected on, the distinct knowledge of an uneducated rustic would furnish a very scanty vocabulary. The few things and modes of action requisite for his bodily conveniences would alone be individualized, while all the rest of nature would be expressed by a small number of confused general terms. Secondly, I deny that the words and combinations of words derived from the objects with which the rustic is familiar, whether with distinct or confused knowledge, can be justly said to form the best part of language. It is more than probable that many classes of the brute creation possess discriminating sounds, by which they can convey to each other notices of such objects as concern their food, shelter, or safety. Yet we hesitate to call the aggregate of such sounds a language, otherwise than metaphorically. The best part of human language, properly so called, is derived from reflection on the acts of the mind itself. It is formed by a voluntary appropriation of fixed symbols to internal acts, to processes and results of imagination, the greater part of which have no place in the consciousness of uneducated man, though in civilized society, by imitation and passive remembrance of what they hear from their religious instructors and other superiors, the most uneducated share in the harvest which they neither sowed nor reaped. If the history of the phrases in hourly currency among our peasants were traced, a person not previously aware of the fact would be surprised at finding so large a number which three or four centuries ago were the exclusive property of the universities and the schools, and at the commencement of the Reformation had been transferred from the school to the pulpit, and thus gradually passed into common life. The extreme difficulty, and often the impossibility, of finding words for the simplest moral and intellectual processes of the languages of uncivilized tribes has proved perhaps the weightiest obstacle to the progress of our most zealous and adroit missionaries. Yet these tribes are surrounded by the same nature as our peasants are, but in still more impressive forms; and they are, moreover, obliged to particularize many more of them. When, therefore, Mr. Wordsworth adds, "accordingly, such a language" (meaning, as before, the language of rustic life purified from provincialism) "arising out of repeated experience and regular feelings, is a more permanent, and a far more philosophical language, than that which is frequently substituted for it by poets, who think that they are conferring honor upon themselves and their art in proportion as they indulge in arbitrary and capricious habits of expression," it may be answered that the language which he has in view can be attributed to rustics with no greater right than the style of Hooker or Bacon to Tom Brown or Sir Roger L'Estrange.¹ Doubtless, if what is peculiar to each were omitted in each, the result must needs be the same. Further, that the poet who uses an illogical diction, or a style fitted to excite only the low and changeable pleasure of wonder by means of groundless novelty, substitutes a language of folly and vanity, not for that of the rustic, but for that of good sense and natural feeling.

Here let me be permitted to remind the reader that the positions which I controvert are contained in the sentences—"a selection of the real language of men;"—"the language of these men" (that is, men in low and rustic life) "has been adopted; I have proposed to myself to imitate, and, as far as is possible, to adopt the very language of men." "Between the language of prose and that of metrical composition, there neither is nor can be any essential difference." It is against these exclusively that my opposition is directed.

I object, in the very first instance, to an equivocation in the use of the word "real." Every man's language varies according to the extent of his knowledge, the activity of his faculties, and the depth or quickness of his feelings. Every man's language has, first, its individualities; secondly, the common properties of the class to which he belongs; and thirdly, words and phrases of universal use. The language of Hooker,

Bacon, Bishop Taylor, and Burke differs from the common language of the learned class only by the superior number and novelty of the thoughts and relations which they had to convey. The language of Algernon Sidney differs not at all from that which every well-educated gentleman would wish to write, and (with due allowances for the undeliberateness, and less connected train, of thinking natural and proper to conversation) such as he would wish to talk. Neither one nor the other differ half as much from the general language of cultivated society, as the language of Mr. Wordsworth's homeliest composition differs from that of a common peasant. For "real," therefore, we must substitute ordinary, or lingua communis. And this, we have proved, is no more to be found in the phraseology of low and rustic life than in that of any other class. Omit the peculiarities of each, and the result of course must be common to all. And assuredly the omissions and changes to be made in the language of rustics, before it could be transferred to any species of poem, except the drama or other professed imitation, are at least as numerous and weighty as would be required in adapting to the same purpose the ordinary language of tradesmen or manufacturers. Not to mention that the language so highly extolled by Mr. Wordsworth varies in every county, nay, in every village, according to the accidental character of the clergyman, the existence or non-existence of schools, or even, perhaps, as the exciseman, publican, and barber happen to be, or not to be, zealous politicians and readers of the weekly newspaper pro bono publico. Anterior to cultivation the lingua communis of every country, as Dante has well observed,¹ exists everywhere in parts, and nowhere as a whole.

Neither is the case rendered at all more tenable by the addition of the words, "in a state of excitement." For the nature of a man's words, where he is strongly affected by joy, grief, or anger, must necessarily depend on the number and quality of the general truths, conceptions, and images, and of the words expressing them, with which his mind had been previously stored. For the property of passion is not to create, but to set in increased activity. At least, whatever new connections of thoughts or images, or (which is equally, if not more than equally, the appropriate effect of strong excitement) whatever generalizations of truth or experience the heat of passion may produce, yet the terms of their conveyance must have pre-existed in his former conversations, and are only collected and crowded together by the unusual stimulation. It is indeed very possible to adopt in a poem the unmeaning repetitions, habitual phrases, and other blank counters, which an unfurnished or confused understanding interposes at short intervals, in order to keep hold of his subject, which is still slipping from him, and to give him time for recollection; or, in mere aid of vacancy, as in the scanty companies of a country stage the same player pops backwards and forwards, in order to prevent the appearance of empty spaces, in the processions of Macbeth, or Henry VIII. But what assistance to the poet, or ornament to the poem, these can supply, I am at a loss to conjecture. Nothing assuredly can differ either in origin or in mode more widely from the apparent tautologies of intense and turbulent feeling, in which the passion is greater and of longer endurance than to be exhausted or satisfied by a single representation of the image or incident exciting it. Such repetitions I admit to be a beauty of the highest kind, as illustrated by Mr. Wordsworth himself from the song of Deborah. "At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down: at her feet he bowed, he fell: where he bowed, there he fell down dead."¹

² See De Vulgari Eloquentia (Concerning Vernacular Speech), 1, 10.

FROM CHAPTER XVIII

I conclude, therefore, that the attempt is impracticable, and that, were it not impracticable, it would still be useless. For the very power of making the selection implies the previous possession of the language selected. Or where can the poet have lived? And by what rules could he direct his choice, which would not have enabled him to select and arrange his words by the light of his own judgment? We do not adopt the language of a class by the mere adoption of such words exclusively as that class would use, or at least understand; but likewise by following the order in which the words of such men are wont to succeed each other. Now this order, in the intercourse of uneducated men, is distinguished from the diction of their superiors in knowledge and power, by the greater disjunction and separation in the component parts of that, whatever it be, which they wish to communicate. There is a want of that prospectiveness of mind, that surview, which enables a man to foresee the whole of what he is to convey, appertaining to any one point, and by this means so to subordinate and arrange the different parts according to their relative importance, as to convey it at once, and as an organized whole.

Now I will take the first stanza, on which I have chanced to open, in the Lyrical Ballads. It is one of the most simple and the least peculiar in its language

In distant countries have I been,
And yet I have not often seen
A healthy man, a man full grown, Weep in the public roads, alone.
But such a one, on English ground,
And in the broad highway, I met.
Along the broad highway he came,
His cheeks with tears were wet Sturdy he seemed, though he was sad,
And in his arms a lamb he had.²

The words here are doubtless such as are current in all ranks of life, and of course not less so in the hamlet and cottage than in the shop, manufactory, college, or palace. But is this the order in which the rustic would have placed the words? I am grievously deceived, if the following less compact mode of commencing the same tale be not a far more faithful copy. "I have been in a many parts, far and near, and I don't know that I ever saw before a man crying by himself in the public road, a grown man I mean, that was neither sick nor hurt," etc, etc. But when I turn to the following stanza in The Thorn—

At all times of the day and night
This wretched woman thither goes,
And she is known to every star,
And every wind that blows
And there, beside the thorn, she sits,
When the blue day-light's in the skies,
And when the whirlwind's on the hill,
Or frosty air is keen and still,
And to herself she cries,
"Oh misery! Oh misery!
Oh woe is me! Oh misery!"

and compare this with the language of ordinary men, or with that which I can conceive at all likely to proceed, in real life, from such a narrator as is supposed in the note to the poem—compare it either in the succession of the images or of the sentences—I am reminded of the sublime prayer and hymn of praise which Milton, in opposition to an established liturgy, presents as a fair specimen of common extemporaneous devotion, and such as we might expect to hear from every self-inspired minister of a conventicle!³

The Vision and the Faculty divine¹

CHAPTER XXII

The characteristic defects of Wordsworth's poetry, with the principles from which the judgment that they are defects, is deduced—Their proportion to the beauties—For the greatest part characteristic of his theory only.

If Mr Wordsworth have set forth principles of poetry which his arguments are insufficient to support, let him and those who have adopted his sentiments be set right by the confutation of those arguments, and by the substitution of more philosophical principles. And still let the due credit be given to the portion and importance of the truths which are blended with his theory; truths, the too exclusive attention to which had occasioned its errors by tempting him to carry those truths beyond their proper limits. If his mistaken theory have at all influenced his poetic compositions, let the effects be pointed out, and the instances given. But let it likewise be shown, how far the influence has acted, whether diffusively, or only by starts; whether the number and importance of the poems and passages thus infected be great or trifling compared with the sound portion, and lastly, whether they are inwoven into the texture of his works, or are loose and separable. The result of such a trial would evince beyond a doubt, what it is high time to announce decisively and aloud, that the supposed characteristics of Mr. Wordsworth's poetry, whether admired or reprobated, whether they are simplicity or simpleness, faithful adherence to essential nature, or wilful selections from human nature of its meanest forms and under the least attractive associations; are as little the real characteristics of his poetry at large, as of his genius and the constitution of his mind.

In a comparatively small number of poems, he chose to try an experiment; and this experiment we will suppose to have failed. Yet even in these poems it is impossible not to perceive that the natural tendency of the poet's mind is to great objects and elevated conceptions. The poem entitled Fidelity is for the greater part written in language as unraised and naked as any perhaps in the two volumes. Yet take the following stanza and compare it with the preceding stanzas of the same poem.

There sometimes doth a leaping fish
Send through the tarn a lonely cheer;
The crags repeat the raven's croak,
In symphony austere,
Thither the rainbow comes—the cloud—
And mists that spread the flying shroud,
And sun-beams, and the sounding blast,
That, if it could, would hurry past;
But that enormous harrier holds it fast

Or compare the four last lines of the concluding stanza with the former half

Yes, proof was plain that, since the day
On which the traveller thus had died,
The dog had watched about the spot,
Or by his master's side
*How nourish'd there through such long time
He knows, who gave that love sublime
And gave that strength of feeling, great Above all human estimate!*

Can any candid and intelligent mind hesitate in determining which of these best represents the tendency and native character of the poet's genius? Will he not decide that the one was written because the poet would so write, and the other because he could not so entirely repress the force and grandeur of his mind, but that he must in some part or other of every composition write otherwise? In short, that his only disease is the being out of his element, like the swan, that, having amused himself, for a while, with crushing the weeds on the river's bank, soon returns to his own majestic movements on its reflecting and sustaining surface. Let it be observed that I am here supposing the imagined judge, to whom I appeal, to have already decided against the poet's theory, as far as it is different from the principles of the art, generally acknowledged.

I cannot here enter into a detailed examination of Mr Wordsworth's works; but I will attempt to give the main results of my own judgment, after an acquaintance of many years, and repeated perusals. And though to appreciate the defects of a great mind it is necessary to understand previously its characteristic excellences, yet I have already expressed myself with sufficient fulness to preclude most of the ill effects that might arise from my pursuing a contrary arrangement. I will therefore commence with what I deem the prominent defects of his poems hitherto published.

The first characteristic, though only occasional defect, which I appear to myself to find in these poems is the inconstancy of the style. Under this name I refer to the sudden and unprepared transitions from lines or sentences of peculiar felicity (at all events striking and original) to a style, not only unimpassioned but undistinguished. He sinks too often and too abruptly to that style which I should place in the second division of language, dividing it into the three species; first, that which is peculiar to poetry, second, that which is only proper in prose, and third, the neutral or common to both. There have been works, such as Cowley's Essay on Cromwell, in which prose and verse are intermixed (not as in the Consolation of Boetius, or the Argenis of Barclay, by the insertion of poems supposed to have been spoken or composed on occasions previously related in prose, but) the poet passing from one to the other, as the nature of the thoughts or his own feelings dictated. Yet this mode of composition does not satisfy a cultivated taste. There is something unpleasant in the being thus obliged to alternate states of feeling so dissimilar, and this too in a species of writing, the pleasure from which is in part derived from the preparation and previous expectation of the reader. A portion of that awkwardness is felt which hangs upon the introduction of songs in our modern comic operas, and to prevent which the judicious Metastasio (as to whose exquisite taste there can be no hesitation, whatever doubts may be entertained as to his poetic genius) uniformly placed the *aria*¹ at the end of the scene, at the same time that he almost always raises and impassions the style of the recitative immediately preceding. Even in real life, the difference is great and evident between words used as the arbitrary marks of thought, our smooth market-com of intercourse, with the image and superscription worn out by currency, and those which convey pictures either borrowed from one outward object to enliven and particularize some other, or used allegorically to body forth the inward state of the person speaking; or such as are at least the exponents of his peculiar turn and unusual extent of faculty. So much so indeed, that in the social circles of private life we often find a striking use of the latter put a stop to the general flow of conversation, and by the excitement arising from concentrated attention produce a sort of damp and interruption for some minutes after. But in the perusal of works of literary art, we prepare ourselves for such language, and the business of the writer, like that of a painter whose subject requires unusual splendor and prominence, is so to raise the lower and neutral tints, that what in a different style would be the commanding colors, are here used as the means of that gentle degradation requisite in order to produce the effect of a whole. Where this is not achieved in a poem, the metre merely reminds the reader of his claims in order to disappoint them, and where this defect occurs frequently, his feelings are alternately startled by anticlimax and hyperclimax.

I refer the reader to the exquisite stanzas cited for another purpose¹ from The Blind Highland Boy, and then annex, as being in my opinion instances of this disharmony in style, the two following

And one, the rarest, was a shell
Which he, poor child, had studied well
The shell of a green turtle, thin
And hollow,—you might sit therein, It was so wide, and deep

Our Highland Boy oft visited
The house which held this prize, and, led By choice or chance, did thither come One day, when no one was at home,
And found the door unbarred

Or page 172, vol I²

'Tis gone—forgotten—let me do My best. There was a smile or two—I can remember them, I see The smiles worth all the world to me
Dear Baby, I must lay thee down
Thou troublest me with strange alarms, Smiles hast thou, sweet ones of thine own;
I cannot keep thee in my arms,
For they confound me as if in,
I have forgot those smiles of his.

Or page 269, vol I³

Thou hast a nest, for thy love and thy rest,
And though little troubled with sloth,
Drunk lark! thou wouldst be loth
To be such a traveller as I
Happy, happy liver!
With a soul as strong as a mountain river
Pouring out praise to th' Almighty Giver,
Joy and jollity be with us both!
Hearing thee or else some other,
As merry a brother
I on the earth will go plodding on By myself cheerfully till the day is done

The incongruity which I appear to find in this passage, is that of the two noble lines in italics with the preceding and following. So vol II, page 30⁴

Close by a pond upon the further side,
He stood alone, a minute's space I guess,
I watch'd him, he continuing motionless
To the pool's further margin then I drew,
He being all the while before me full in view.

Compare this with the repetition of the same image, in the next stanza but two

And still as I drew near with gentle pace, Beside the little pond or moorish flood Motionless as a cloud the old man stood,
That heareth not the loud winds when they call,
And moveth altogether, if it move at all

Or lastly, the second of the three following stanzas, compared both with the first and the third.

My former thoughts returned, the fear that kills,
And hope that is unwilling to be fed,
Cold, pain, and labor, and all fleshly ills,
And mighty poets in their misery dead
But now, perplex'd by what the old man had said,
My question eagerly did I renew,
"How is it that you live, and what is it you do?"

He with a smile did then his words repeat;
And said, that gathering leeches far and wide
He travell'd, stirring thus about his feet
The waters of the ponds where they abide "Once I could meet with them on every side,
But they have dwindled long by slow decay Yet still I persevere, and find them where I may."

While he was talking thus, the lonely place,
The old man's shape, and speech, all troubled me.
In my mind's eye I seemed to see him pace
About the weary moors continually,
Wandering about alone and silently

Indeed this fine poem is especially characteristic of the author. There is scarce a defect or excellence in his writings of which it would not present a specimen. But it would be unjust not to repeat that this defect is only occasional. From a careful reperusal of the two volumes of poems, I doubt whether the objectionable passages would amount in the whole to one hundred lines, not the eighth part of the number of pages. In The Excursion the feeling of incongruity is seldom excited by the diction of any passage considered in itself, but by the sudden superiority of some other passage forming the context.

The second defect I can generalize with tolerable accuracy, if the reader will pardon an uncouth and new-coined word. There is, I should say, not seldom a matter-of-factness in certain poems. This may be divided into, first, a laborious minuteness and fidelity in the representation of objects, and their positions, as they appeared to the poet himself; secondly, the insertion of accidental circumstances, in order to the full explanation of his living characters, their dispositions and actions, which circumstances might be necessary to establish the probability of a statement in real life, where nothing is taken for granted by the hearer, but appear superfluous in poetry, where the reader is willing to believe for his own sake. To this accidentality I object, as contravening the essence of poetry, which Aristotle pronounces to be σπουδαίοντα καὶ φιλοσοφάοντα γένος,¹ the most intense, weighty and philosophical product of human art, adding, as the reason, that it is the most catholic and abstract. The following passage from Davenant's prefatory letter to Hobbes well expresses this truth. "When I considered the actions which I meant to describe (those inferring the persons), I was again persuaded rather to choose those of a former age, than the present, and in a century so far removed, as might preserve me from their improper examinations, who know not the requisites of a poem, nor how much pleasure they lose (and even the pleasures of heroic poesy are not unprofitable) who take away the liberty of a poet, and fetter his feet in the shackles of an historian. For why should a poet doubt in story to mend the intrigues of fortune by more delightful conveyances of probable fictions, because austere historians have entered into bond to truth? An obligation, which were in poets as foolish and unnecessary, as is the bondage of false martyrs, who he in chains for a mistaken opinion. But by this I would imply that truth, narrative and past, is the idol of historians (who worship a dead thing), and truth operative, and by effects continually alive, is the mistress of poets, who hath not her existence in matter, but in reason."

For this minute accuracy in the painting of local imagery, the lines in The Excursion, pp. 96, 97, and 98,¹ may be taken, if not as a striking instance, yet as an illustration of my meaning. It must be some strong motive (as, for instance, that the description was necessary to the intelligibility of the tale) which could induce me to describe in a number of verses what a draughtsman could present to the eye with incomparably greater satisfaction by half a dozen strokes of his pencil, or the painter with as many touches of his brush. Such descriptions too often occasion in the mind of a reader, who is determined to understand his author, a feeling of labor not very dissimilar to that with which he would construct a diagram, line by line, for a long geometrical proposition. It seems to be like taking the pieces of a dissected map out of its box. We first look at one part, and then at another, then join and dovetail them; and when the successive acts of attention have been completed, there is a retrogressive effort of mind to behold it as a whole. The poet should paint to the imagination, not to the fancy; and I know no happier case to exemplify the distinction between these two faculties. Masterpieces of the former mode of poetic painting abound in the writings of Milton, for example:

The fig-tree, not that kind for fruit renown'd,
But such as at this day, to Indians known,
In Malabar or Ilocan spreads her arms Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The beaded twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother tree, a pillar'd shade High over-arch'd and echoing walks between There oft the Indian herdsman, shunning heat, Shelters in cool, and tends his panturing herd
At loopholes cut through thicket shade.¹

This is creation rather than painting, or if painting, yet such, and with such co-presence of the whole picture flashed at once upon the eye, as the sun paints in a camera obscura. But the poet must likewise understand and command what Bacon calls the *vestigia communia*² of the senses, the latency of all in each, and more especially as by a magical penna duplici,³ the excitement of vision by sound and the exponents of sound. Thus, "The echoing walks between," may be almost said to reverse the fable in tradition of the head of Memnon, in the Egyptian statue.⁴ Such may be deservedly entitled the creative words in the world of imagination.

The second division respects an apparent minute adherence to matter-of-fact in character and incidents, a biographical attention to probability, and an anxiety of explanation and retrospect. Under this head I shall deliver, with no feigned diffidence, the results of my best reflection on the great point of controversy between Mr. Wordsworth and his objectors, namely, on the choice of his characters. I have already declared and, I trust, justified, my utter dissent from the mode of argument which his critics have hitherto employed. To their question, Why did you choose such a character, or a character from such a rank of life? the poet might, in my opinion, fairly retort: Why with the conception of my character did you make wilful choice of mean or ludicrous associations not furnished by me, but supplied from your own sickly and fastidious feelings? How was it, indeed, probable that such arguments could have any weight with an author whose plan, whose guiding principle, and main object it was to attack and subdue that state of association which leads us to place the chief value on those things on which man differs from man, and to forget or disregard the high dignities, which belong to Human Nature, the sense and the feeling, which may be, and ought to be, found in all ranks? The feelings with which, as Christians, we contemplate a mixed congregation rising or kneeling before their common Maker, Mr. Wordsworth would have us entertain at all times, as men, and as readers; and by the excitement of this lofty, yet prideless impartiality in poetry, he might hope to have encouraged its continuance in real life. The praise of good men be his! In real life, and, I trust, even in my imagination, I honor a virtuous and wise man, without reference to the presence or absence of artificial advantages. Whether in the person of an aimed baron, a laurelled bard, or of an old pedlar, or still older leech-gatherer, the same qualities of head and heart must claim the same reverence. And even in poetry I am not conscious that I have ever suffered my feelings to be disturbed or offended by any thoughts or images which the poet himself has not presented.

But yet I object, nevertheless, and for the following reasons. First, because the object in view, as an immediate object, belongs to the moral philosopher, and would be pursued, not only more appropriately, but in my opinion with far greater probability of success, in sermons or moral essays, than in an elevated poem. It seems, indeed, to destroy the main fundamental distinction, not only between a poem and prose, but even between philosophy and works of fiction, inasmuch as it proposes truth for its immediate object, instead of pleasure. Now till the blessed time shall come, when truth itself shall be pleasure, and both shall be so united, as to be distinguishable in words only, not in feeling, it will remain the poet's office to proceed upon that state of association, which actually exists as general; instead of attempting first to make it what it ought to be, and then to let the pleasure follow. But here is unfortunately a small hysteron-proteron.⁵ For the communication of pleasure is the introductory means by which alone the poet must expect to moralize his readers. Secondly, though I were to admit, for a moment, this argument to be groundless: yet how is the moral effect to be produced, by merely attaching the name of some low profession to powers which are least likely, and to qualities which are assuredly not more likely, to be found in it? The poet, speaking in his own person, may at once delight and improve us by sentiments which teach us the independence of goodness, of wisdom, and even of genius, on the favors of fortune.

To use a colloquial phrase, such sentiments, in such language, do one's heart good; though I, for my part, have not the fullest faith in the truth of the observation. On the contrary, I believe the instances to be exceedingly rare; and should feel almost as strong an objection to introduce such a character in a poetic fiction, as a pair of black swans on a lake, in a fancy landscape. When I think how many, and how much better books than Homer, or even than Herodotus, Pindar, or Æschylus, could have read, are in the power of almost every man, in a country where almost every man is instructed to read and write; and how restless, how difficultly hidden, the powers of genius are; and yet find even in situations the most favorable, according to Mr. Wordsworth, for the formation of a pure and poetic language—in situations which ensure familiarity with the grandest objects of the imagination—but one Burns, among the shepherds of Scotland, and not a single poet of humble life among those of English lakes and mountains, I conclude, that Poetic Genius is not only a very delicate, but a very rare plant

But be this as it may; the feelings with which are widely different from those with which I should read a poem, where the author, having occasion for the character of a poet and a philosopher in the fable of his narration, has chosen to make him a chimney-sweeper; and then, in order to remove all doubts on the subject, had sevented an account of his birth, parentage, and education, with all the strange and fortunate accidents which had concurred in making him at once poet, philosopher, and sweep! Nothing but biography can justify this. If it be admissible even in a novel, it must be one in the manner of De Foe's, that were meant to pass for histories, not in the manner of Fielding's: in The Life of Moll Flanders, or Colonel Jack, not in a Tom Jones, or even a Joseph Andrews. Much less, then, can it be legitimately introduced in a poem, the characters of which, amid the strongest individualization, must still remain representative. The precepts of Horace,¹ on this point, are grounded on the nature both of poetry and of the human mind. They are not more peremptory, than wise and prudent. For, in the first place, a deviation from them perplexes the reader's feelings, and all the circumstances which are feigned in order to make such accidents less improbable, divide and disquiet his faith, rather than aid and support it. Spite of all attempts, the fiction will appear, and unfortunately not as fictitious but as false. The reader not only knows that the sentiments and language are the poet's own, and his own, too, in his artificial character, as poet; but by the fruitless endeavors to make him think the contrary, he is not even suffered to forget it. The effect is similar to that produced by an epic poet, when the fable and the characters are derived from Scripture history, as in The Messiah of Klopstock, or in Cumberland's Calvary; and not merely suggested by it as in the Paradise Lost of Milton. That illusion, contradistinguished from delusion, that negative faith, which simply permits the images presented to work by their own force, without either denial or affirmation of their real existence by the judgment, is rendered impossible by their immediate neighborhood to words and facts of known and absolute truth. A faith which transcends even historic belief must absolutely put out this mere poetic *analogon*² of faith, as the summer sun is said to extinguish our household fires, when it shines full upon them. What would otherwise have been yielded to as pleasing fiction, is repelled as revolting falsehood. The effect produced in this latter case by the solemn belief of the reader, is in a less degree brought about in the instances to which I have been objecting, by the baffled attempts of the author to make him believe.

Add to all the foregoing the seeming uselessness both of the project and of the anecdotes from which it is to derive support. Is there one word, for instance, attributed to the pedlar in The Excursion, characteristic of a pedlar? one sentiment that might not more plausibly, even without the aid of any previous explanation, have proceeded from any wise and beneficent old man, of a rank or profession in which the language of learning and refinement are natural and to be expected? Need the rank have been at all particularized, where nothing follows which the knowledge of that rank is to explain or illustrate? when on the contrary this information renders the man's language, feelings, sentiments, and information a riddle, which must itself be solved by episodes of anecdote? Finally, when this, and this alone, could have induced a genuine poet to interweave in a poem of the loftiest style, and on subjects the loftiest and of most universal interest, such minute matters of fact, (not unlike those furnished for the obituary of a magazine by the friends of some obscure "ornament of society lately deceased" in some obscure town,) as

Among the hills of Athol he was born;
There, on a small hereditary farm,
An unproductive slip of rugged ground,
His father dwelt, and died in poverty
While he, whose lowly fortune I retrace,
The youngest of three sons, was yet a babe,
A little one—unconscious of their loss,
But ere he had outgrown his infant days
His widowed mother, for a second mate, Espoused the teacher of the village school,
Who on her offspring zealously bestowed Needful instruction

From his sixth year the boy of whom I speak,
In summer tended cattle on the hills;
But, through the inclement and the perilous days
Of long continuing winter, he repaired
To his step-father's school;¹ etc

For all the admirable passages interposed in this narration, might, with trifling alterations, have been far more appropriately, and with far greater verisimilitude, told of a poet in the character of a poet, and without incurring another defect which I shall now mention, and a sufficient illustration of which will have been here anticipated

Third, an undue predilection for the dramatic form in certain poems, from which one or other of two evils result. Either the thoughts and diction are different from that of the poet, and then there arises an incongruity of style, or they are the same and indistinguishable, and then it presents a species of ventriloquism, where two are represented as talking, while in truth one man only speaks.

The fourth class of defects is closely connected with the former; but yet are such as arise likewise from an intensity of feeling disproportionate to such knowledge and value of the objects described, as can be fairly anticipated of men in general, even of the most cultivated classes, and with which therefore few only, and those few particularly circumstanced, can be supposed to sympathize. In this class, I comprise occasional prolixity, repetition, and an eddying, instead of progression, of thought. Instances, see pages 27, 28,¹ and 62² of the Poems, Vol I, and the first eighty lines of the Sixth Book of The Excursion

Fifth and last; thoughts and images too great for the subject. This is an approximation to what might be called mental bombast, as distinguished from verbal foet, as in the latter there is a disproportion of the expressions to the thoughts, so in this there is a disproportion of thought to the circumstance and occasion. This, by the bye, is a fault of which none but a man of genius is capable. It is the awkwardness and strength of Hercules with the distaff of Omphale.

It is a well-known fact that bright colors in motion both make and leave the strongest impressions on the eye. Nothing is more likely too, than that a vivid image or visual spectrum, thus originated, may become the link of association in recalling the feelings and images that had accompanied the original impression. But if we describe this in such lines as

They flash upon that inward eye,
Which is the bliss of solitude³ in what words shall we describe the joy of retrospection, when the images and virtuous actions of a whole well-spent life pass before that conscience which is indeed the inward eye which is indeed "the bliss of solitude?" Assuredly we seem to sink most abruptly, not to say halesquely, and almost as in a wedley, from this couplet to—

And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils⁴

Vol I, p. 320

The second instance is from Vol II, page 12,⁴ where the poet, having gone out for a day's tour of pleasure, meets early in the morning with a knot of Gipsies, who had pitched their blanket-tents and straw-beds, together with their children and asses, in some field by the roadside. At the close of the day on his return our tourist found them in the same place. "Twelve hours," says he,

Twelve hours, twelve bounteous hours are gone, while I Have been a traveller under open sky,
Much witnessing of change and cheer,
Yet as I left I find them here!

Whereat the poet, without seeming to reflect that the poor tawny wanderers might probably have been tramping for weeks together through road and lane, over moor and mountain, and consequently must have been right glad to rest themselves, their children and cattle, for one whole day; and overlooking the obvious truth, that such repose might be quite as necessary for them, as a walk of the same continuance was pleasing or healthful for the more fortunate poet; expresses his indignation in a series of lines, the diction and imagery of which would have been rather above, than below the mark, had they been applied to the immense empire of China improgressive for thirty centuries:

The weary Sun betook himself to rest —
—Then issued Vesper from the fulgent west, Outshining, like a visible God,
The glorious path in which he trod!
And now, ascending, after one dark hour,
And one night's diminution of her power, Behold the mighty Moon! this way She looks, as if at them—but they Regard not her —oh, better wrong and strife, Better vain deeds or evil than such life!
The silent Heavens have goings on The stars have tasks!—But these have none!

The last instance of this defect (for I know no other than these already cited) is from the Ode,¹ page 351, Vol. II, where, speaking of a child, "a six years' darling of a pigmy size," he thus addresses him

Thou best philosopher, who yet dost keep
Thy heritage! Thou eye among the blind,
That deaf and silent, read'st the eternal deep,
Haunted forever by the Eternal Mind,—
Mighty Prophet! Seer blest!
On whom those truths do rest,
Which we are toiling all our lives to find!
Thou, over whom thy immortality
Broods like the day, a master o'er a slave,
A presence which is not to be put by!

Now here, not to stop at the daring spirit of metaphor which connects the epithets "deaf and silent," with the apostrophized eye: or (if we are to refer it to the preceding word, "philosopher") the faulty and equivocal syntax of the passage; and without examining the propriety of making a "master brood o'er a slave," or "the day" brood at all; we will merely ask, What does all this mean? In what sense is a child of that age a philosopher? In what sense does he read "the eternal deep"? In what sense is he declared to be "forever haunted" by the Supreme Being? or so inspired as to deserve the splendid titles of a mighty prophet, a blessed seer? By reflection? by knowledge? by conscious intuition? or by any form or modification of consciousness? These would be tidings indeed; but such as would presuppose an immediate revelation to the inspired communicator, and require miracles to authenticate his inspiration. Children at this age give us no such information of themselves; and at what time were we dipped in the Lethe, which has produced such utter oblivion of a state so god-like? There are many of us that still possess some remembrances, more or less distinct, respecting themselves at six years old; pity that the worthless straws only should float, while treasures, compared with which all the mines of Golconda and Mexico were but straws, should be absorbed by some unknown gulf into some unknown abyss.

But if this be too wild and exorbitant to be suspected as having been the poet's meaning; if these mysterious gifts, faculties, and operations, are not accompanied with consciousness, who else is conscious of them? or how can it be called the child, if it be no part of the child's conscious being? For aught I know, the thinking Spirit within me may be substantially one with the principle of life, and of vital operation. For aught I know, it might be employed as a secondary agent in the marvellous organization and organic movements of my body. But, surely, it would be strange language to say that I construct my heart! or that I propel the finer influences through my nerves! or that I compress my brain, and draw the curtains of sleep round my own eyes! Spinoza and Behmen were, on different systems, both Pantheists; and among the ancients there were philosophers, teachers of the EN KAI PAN,¹ who not only taught that God was All, but that this All constituted God. Yet not even these would confound the part, as a part, with the whole, as the whole. Nay, in no system is the distinction between the individual and God, between the modification, and the one only substance, more sharply drawn, than in that of Spinoza. Jacobi indeed relates of Lessing, that, after a conversation with him at the house of the poet Gleim (the Tyrtæus and Anacreon of the German Parnassus) in which conversation Lessing had avowed privately to Jacobi his reluctance to admit any personal existence of the Supreme Being, or the possibility of personality except in a finite Intellect, and while they were sitting at table, a shower of rain came on unexpectedly. Gleim expressed his regret at the circumstance, because they had meant to drink their wine in the garden. upon which Lessing, in one of his half-earnest, half-joking moods, nodded to Jacob, and said, "It is I, perhaps, that am doing that," i. e., raining!—and Jacob answered, "or perhaps I;" Gleim contented himself with staring at them both, without asking for any explanation.

² one and the whole (pantheism)

So with regard to this passage. In what sense can the magnificent attributes, above quoted, be appropriated to a child, which would not make them equally suitable to a bee, or a dog, or a field of corn; or even to a ship, or to the wind and waves that propel it? The omnipresent Spirit works equally in them, as in the child; and the child is equally unconscious of it as they. It cannot surely be that the four lines immediately following are to contain the explanation?

To whom the grave
Is but a lonely bed without the sense or sight Of day or the warm light
A place of thought where we in waiting lie.¹

Surely, it cannot be that this wondrous apostrophe is but a comment on the little poem, We are Seven? that the whole meaning of the passage is reducible to the assertion that a child, who, by the bye, at six years old would have been better instructed in most Christian families, has no other notion of death than that of lying in a dark cold place? And still, I hope, not as in a place of thought! not the frightful notion of lying awake in his grave! The analogy between death and sleep is too simple, too natural, to render so horrid a belief possible for children; even had they not been in the habit, as all Christian children are, of hearing the latter term used to express the former. But if the child's belief be only that "he is not dead, but sleepeth,"² wherein does it differ from that of his father and mother, or any other adult and instructed person? To form an idea of a thing's becoming nothing, or of nothing becoming a thing; is impossible to all finite beings alike, of whatever age, and however educated or uneducated. Thus it is with splendid paradoxes in general. If the words are taken in the common sense, they convey an absurdity; and if, in contempt of dictionaries and custom, they are so interpreted as to avoid the absurdity, the meaning dwindles into some bald truism. Thus you must at once understand the words contrary to their common import, in order to arrive at any sense; and according to their common import, if you are to receive from them any feeling of sublimity or admiration.

Though the instances of this defect in Mr. Wordsworth's poems are so few that for themselves it would have been scarcely just to attract the reader's attention toward them, yet I have dwelt on it, and perhaps the more for this very reason. For being so very few, they cannot sensibly detract from the reputation of an author who is even characterized by the number of profound truths in his writings, which will stand the severest analysis; and yet few as they are, they are exactly those passages which his blind admirers would be most likely, and best able, to imitate. But Wordsworth, where he is indeed Wordsworth, may be mimicked by copyists, he may be plundered by plagiarists; but he cannot be imitated, except by those who are not born to be imitators. For without his depth of feeling and his imaginative power his sense would want its vital warmth and peculiarity; and without his strong sense, his mysticism would become suckly—mere fog, and dimness!

To these defects which, as appears by the extracts, are only occasional, I may oppose, with far less fear of encountering the dissent of any candid and intelligent reader, the following (for the most part correspondent) excellencies. First, an austere purity of language both grammatically and logically, in short a perfect appropriateness of the words to the meaning. Of how high value I deem this, and how particularly estimable I hold the example at the present day, has been already stated:³ and in part, too, the reasons on which I ground both the moral and intellectual importance of habituating ourselves to a strict accuracy of expression. It is noticeable how limited an acquaintance with the masterpieces of art will suffice to form a correct and even a sensitive taste, where none but masterpieces have been seen and admired: while, on the other hand, the most correct notions, and the widest acquaintance with the works of excellence of all ages and countries, will not perfectly secure us against the contagious familiarity with the far more numerous offspring of tastelessness or of a perverted taste. If this be the case, as it notoriously is, with the arts of music and painting, much more difficult will it be to avoid the infection of multiplied and daily examples in the practice of an art which uses words, and words only, as its instruments. In poetry, in which every line, every phrase, may pass the ordeal of deliberation and deliberate choice, it is possible, and barely possible, to attain that ultimatum which I have ventured to propose as the infallible test of a blameless style,—namely, its untranslatableness in words of the same language without injury to the meaning. Be it observed, however, that I include in the meaning of a word not only its correspondent object, but likewise all the associations which it recalls. For language is framed to convey not the object alone, but likewise the character, mood, and intentions of the person who is representing it. In poetry it is practicable to preserve the diction uncorrupted by the affections and misappropriations which promiscuous authorship, and reading not promiscuous only because it is disproportionately most conversant with the compositions of the day, have rendered general. Yet even to the poet, composing in his own province, it is an arduous work: and as the result and pledge of a watchful good sense, of fine and luminous distinction, and of complete self-possession, may justly claim all the honor which belongs to an attainment equally difficult and valuable, and the more valuable for being rare. It is at all times the proper food of the understanding; but in an age of corrupt eloquence it is both food and antidote.

In prose I doubt whether it be even possible to preserve our style wholly unalloyed by the vicious phraseology which meets us everywhere, from the sermon to the newspaper, from the harangue of the legislator to the speech from the convivial chair, announcing a toast or sentiment. Our chains rattle, even while we are complaining of them. The poems of Boetius rise high in our estimation when we compare them with those of his contemporaries, as Sardonius Apollinarius, &c. They might even be referred to a purer age, but that the prose in which they are set, as jewels in a crown of lead or iron, betrays the true age of the writer. Much, however, may be effected by education. I believe not only from grounds of reason, but from having in great measure assured myself of the fact by actual though limited experience, that, to a youth led from his first boyhood to investigate the meaning of every word and the reason of its choice and position, logic presents itself as an old acquaintance under new names.

On some future occasion, more especially demanding such disquisition, I shall attempt to prove the close connection between veracity and habits of mental accuracy; the beneficial after-effects of verbal precision in the preclusion of fanaticism, which masters the feelings more especially by indistinct watchwords; and to display the advantages which language alone, at least which language with incomparably greater ease and certainty than any other means, presents to the instructor of impressing modes of intellectual energy so constantly, so imperceptibly, and, as it were, by such elements and atoms, as to secure in due time the formation of a second nature. When we reflect that the cultivation of the judgment is a positive command of the moral law, since the reason can give the principle alone, and the conscience bears witness only to the motive, while the application and effects must depend on the judgment when we consider that the greater part of our success and comfort in life depends on distinguishing the similar from the same, that which is peculiar in each thing from that which it has in common with others, so as still to select the most probable, instead of the merely possible or positively unfit, we shall learn to value earnestly and with a practical seriousness a mean, already prepared for us by nature and society, of teaching the young mind to think well and wisely by the same unremembered process and with the same never-forgotten results, as those by which it is taught to speak and converse. Now how much warmer the interest is, how much more genial the feelings of reality and practicability, and thence how much stronger the impulses to imitation are, which a contemporary writer, and especially a contemporary poet, excites in youth and commencing manhood, has been treated of in the earlier pages of these sketches¹ I have only to add that all the praise which is due to the exertion of such influence for a purpose so important, joined with that which must be claimed for the infrequency of the same excellence in the same perfection, belongs in full right to Mr. Wordsworth. I am far, however, from denying that we have poets whose general style possesses the same excellence, as Mr. Moore, Lord Byron, Mr. Bowles, and, in all his later and more important works, our laurel-honoring Laureate.¹ But there are none in whose works I do not appear to myself to find more exceptions than in those of Wordsworth. Quotations or specimens would here be wholly out of place, and must be left for the critic who doubts and would invalidate the justice of this eulogy so applied.

The second characteristic excellence of Mr. Wordsworth's work is: a correspondent weight and sanity of the thoughts and sentiments, won, not from books, but from the poet's own meditative observation. They are fresh and have the dew upon them. His muse, at least when in her strength of wing, and when she hovers aloft in her proper element,

Makes audible a linked lay of truth,
Of truth profound a sweet continuous lay,
Not learnt, but native, her own natural notes.²

Even throughout his smaller poems there is scarcely one which is not rendered valuable by some just and original reflection.

See page 25, vol. II.³ or the two following passages in one of his humblest compositions.⁴

O reader ' had you in your mind
Such stores as silent thought can bring,
O gentle reader ' you would find
A tale in every thing;

and

I've heard of hearts unkind kind deeds
With coldness still returning,
Alas ' the gratitude of men
Has oftener left me mourning, or in a still higher strain the six beautiful quatrains, page 134.⁵

Thus fares it still in our decay
And yet the wiser mind
Mourns less for what age takes away
Than what it leaves behind

The blackbird in the summer trees,
The lark upon the hill,
Let loose their carols when they please,
Are quiet when they will.

With Nature never do they wage
A foolish strife, they see
A happy youth, and their old age
Is beautiful and free⁶

But we are pressed by heavy laws,
And often glad no more,
We wear a face of joy, because
We have been glad of yore

If there is one who need bemoan
His kindred laid in earth,
The household hearts that were his own,
It is the man of mirth

My days, my friend, are almost gone,
My life has been approved,

And many love me; but by none
Am I enough beloved;

or the sonnet on Buonaparté,¹ page 202, vol. II; or finally (for a volume would scarce suffice to exhaust the instances), the last stanza of the poem on the withered Celandine,² vol. II, p. 312.

To be a prodigal's favorite—then, worse truth,
A miser's pensioner—behold our lot!
O man ' that from thy fair and shining youth Age might but take the things youth needed not.

Both in respect of this and of the former excellence, Mr Wordsworth strikingly resembles Samuel Daniel, one of the golden writers of our golden Elizabethan age, now most causelessly neglected Samuel Daniel, whose diction bears no mark of time, no distinction of age, which has been, and as long as our language shall last, will be so far the language of the today and forever, as that it is more intelligible to us than the transitory fashions of our own particular age. A similar praise is due to his sentiments. No frequency of perusal can deprive them of their freshness. Nor though they are brought into the full daylight of every reader's comprehension, yet are they drawn up from depths which few in any age are privileged to visit, into which few in any age have courage or inclination to descend. If Mr Wordsworth is not equally with Daniel alike intelligible to all readers of average understanding in all passages of his works, the comparative difficulty does not arise from the greater impurity of the ore, but from the nature and uses of the metal. A poem is not necessarily obscure because it does not aim to be popular. It is enough if a work be perspicuous to those for whom it is written, and flux and reflux of their inmost nature, to venture at times into the twilight realms of consciousness, and to feel a deep interest in modes of inmost being, to which they know that the attributes of time and space are inapplicable and alien, but which yet can not be conveyed, save in symbols of time and space. For such readers the sense is sufficiently plain, and they will be as little disposed to charge Mr. Wordsworth with believing the Platonic pre-existence, in the ordinary interpretation of the words, as I am to believe that Plato himself ever meant or taught it.

Third (and wherein he soars far above Daniel), the sinewy strength and originality of single lines and paragraphs: the frequent *curiosa felicitas*² of his diction, of which I need not here give specimens, having anticipated them in a preceding page. This beauty, and as eminently characteristic of Wordsworth's poetry, his rudest assailants have felt themselves compelled to acknowledge and admire

Fourth, the perfect truth of nature in his images and descriptions as taken immediately from nature, and proving a long and genial intimacy with the spirit which gives the physiognomic expression to all the works of nature. Like a green field reflected in a calm and perfectly transparent lake, the image is distinguished from the reality only by its greater softness and lustre. Like the moisture or the polish on a pebble, genius neither distorts nor false-colors its objects, but on the contrary brings out many a vein and many a tint, which escape the eye of common observation, thus raising to the rank of gems what had been often kicked away by the hurrying foot of the traveller on the dusty high road of custom

Let me refer to the whole description of skating, vol. I, page 42 to 47,¹ especially to the lines

- 5 So through the darkness and the cold we flew,
 And not a voice was idle with the din
 Meanwhile the precipices rang aloud,
 The leafless trees and every icy crag
 Tinkled like iron, while the distant hills
 Into the tumult sent an alien sound
 Of melancholy, not unnoticed, while the stars

Or to the poem on The Green Linnet, vol I, page 244. What can be more accurate yet more lovely than the two concluding stanzas?

Upon yon tuft of hazel trees,
 That twinkle to the gusty breeze
 Behold him perched in ecstasies,
 Yet seeming still to hover,
 There ' where the flutter of his wings
 Upon his back and body flings
 Shadows and sunny glimmerings,
 That cover him all over

While thus before my eyes he gleams, A brother of the leaves he seems,
 When in a moment forth he teems
 His little song in gushes
 As if it pleased him to disdain
 And mock the form which he did feign While he was dancing with the train Of leaves among the bushes

- Or the description of the blue-cap, and of the noontide silence, page 284,² or the poem to the cuckoo, page 299,³ or, lastly though I might multiply the references to ten times the number, to the poem, so completely Wordsworth's, commencing

Three years she grew in sun and shower—

- Fifth, a meditative pathos, a union of deep and subtle thought with sensibility, a sympathy with man as man, the sympathy indeed of a contemplator, rather than a fellow-sufferer or co-mate (*spectator, hand particeps*⁴), but of a contemplator, from whose view no difference of rank conceals the sameness of the nature; no injuries of wind or weather, or toil, or even of ignorance, wholly disguise the human face divine. The superscription and the image of the Creator still remain legible to him under the dark lines with which guilt or calamity had cancelled or cross-barred it. Here the man and the poet lose and find themselves in each other, the one as glorified, the latter as substantiated. In this mild and philosophic pathos, Wordsworth appears to me without a compeer. Such as he is: so he writes. See vol. I, pages 134 to 136,¹ or that most affecting composition, The Affliction of Margaret — of —, pages 165 to 168, which no mother, and, if I may judge by my own experience, no parent can read without a tear. Or turn to that genuine lyric, in the former edition, entitled The Mad Mother,² pages 174 to 178, of which I cannot refrain from quoting two of the stanzas, both of them for their pathos, and the former of the fine transition in the two concluding lines of the stanza, so expressive of that deranged state in which, from the increased sensibility, the sufferer's attention is abruptly drawn off by every trifle, and in the same instant plucked back again by the one despotic thought, bringing home with it, by the blending, fusing power of Imagination and Passion, the alien object to which it had been so abruptly diverted, no longer an alien but an ally and an inmate.

Suck, little babe, oh suck again!
It cools my blood, it cools my brain;
Thy lips, I feel them, baby! they
Draw from my heart the pain away
(Oh! press me with thy little hand;
It loosens something at my chest;
About that tight and deadly band
I feel thy little fingers prest
The breeze I see is in the tree!
It comes to cool my babe and me.

Thy father cares not for my breast,
'Tis thine, sweet baby, there to rest;
'Tis all thine own—and if its hue
Be changed, that was so fair to view,
'Tis fair enough for thee, my dove!
My beauty, little child, is down,
But thou wilt live with me in love;
And what if my poor cheek be brown?
'Tis well for me, thou canst not see
How pale and wan it else would be.

Last, and pre-eminently, I challenge for this poet the gift of Imagination in the highest and strictest sense of the word. In the play of fancy, Wordsworth, to my feelings, is not always graceful, and sometimes recondite. The likeness is occasionally too strange, or demands too peculiar a point of view, or is such as appears the creature of predetermined research, rather than spontaneous presentation. Indeed, his fancy seldom displays itself as mere and unmodified fancy. But in imaginative power he stands nearest of all modern writers to Shakespeare and Milton, and yet in a kind perfectly unborrowed and his own. To employ his own words, which are at once an instance and an illustration, he does indeed to all thoughts and to all objects—

add the gleam,
The light that never was, on sea or land,
The consecration, and the poet's dream³

I shall select a few examples as most obviously manifesting this faculty; but if I should ever be fortunate enough to render my analysis of Imagination, its origin and characters, thoroughly intelligible to the reader, he will scarcely open on a page of this poet's works without recognizing, more or less, the presence and the influences of this faculty.

While he was talking thus, the lonely place,
The old man's shape, and speech, all troubled me
In my mind's eye I seemed to see him pace

Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting.
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God, who is our home
Heaven lies about us in our infancy!
Shades of the prison-house begin to close
Upon the growing boy,
But he beholds the light, and whence it flows,
He sees it in his joy!

And pages 352 to 354 of the same ode.

O joy! that in our embers
Is something that doth live,
That nature yet remembers
What was so fugitive!
The thought of our past years in me doth breed Perpetual benedictions not indeed
For that which is most worthy to be blest;
Delight and liberty, the simple creed
Of childhood, whether busy or at rest,
With new-fledged hope still fluttering in his breast—

Not for these I raise
The song of thanks and praise;
But for those obstinate questionings
Of sense and outward things,
Fallings from us, vanishings;
Blank misgivings of a creature
Moving about in worlds not realised, High instincts, before which our mortal nature
Did tremble like a guilty thing surprised!
But for those first affections,
Those shadowy recollections,
Which, be they what they may,
Are yet the fountain light of all our day,
Are yet a master light of all our seeing,
Uphold us—cherish—and have power to make Our noisay years seem moments in the being
Of the eternal silence; truths that wake
To perish never;

Which neither listlessness, nor mad endeavor,
Nor man nor boy,
Nor all that is at enmity with joy,
Can utterly abolish or destroy!
Hence, in a season of calm weather,
Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither,
Can in a moment travel thither,—
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.

And since it would be unfair to conclude with an extract which, though highly characteristic, must yet, from the nature of the thoughts and the subject, be interesting or perhaps intelligible, to but a limited number of readers, I will add, from the poet's last published work, a passage equally Wordsworthian, of the beauty of which, and of the imaginative power displayed therein, there can be but one opinion, and one feeling. See White Doe, page 5.

Fast the church-yard fills:—anon
Look again and they all are gone;
The cluster round the porch, and the folk Who sat in the shade of the Prior's Oak,
And scarcely have they disappeared Ere the prelusive hymn is heard:—
With one consent the people rejoice, Filling the church with a lofty voice!
They sing a service which they feel For 'tis the sun-rise now of zeal:
And faith and hope are in their prime In great Eliza's golden time

A moment ends the fervent din.
And all is hushed, without and within;
For though the priest, more tranquilly, Recites the holy liturgy,
The only voice which you can hear Is the river murmuring near.
When soft!—the dusky trees between,

And down the path through the open green,
Where is no living thing to be seen;
And through yon gateway, where is found,
Beneath the arch with ivy bound,
Free entrance to the church-yard ground;
And right across the verdant sod,
Towards the very house of God;
Comes gliding in with lovely gleam, Comes gliding in serene and slow,
Soft and silent as a dream.
A solitary doe!
White she is as Hly of June,
And beauteous as the silver moon
When out of sight the clouds are driven
And she is left alone in heaven!
Or like a ship some gentle day
In sunshine sailing far away—
A glittering ship that hath the plain Of ocean for her own domain.

What harmonious pensive changes Wait upon her as she ranges Round and through this pile of state Overthrown and desolate!
Now a step or two her way
Is through space of open day
Where the enamored sunny light Brightens her that was so bright;
Now doth a delicate shadow fall,
Falls upon her like a breath,
From some lofty arch or wall,
As she passes underneath!

The following analogy will, I am apprehensive, appear dim and fantastic, but in reading Bartram's Travels I could not help transcribing the following lines as a sort of allegory, or connected simile and metaphor of Wordsworth's intellect and genius—"The soil is a deep, rich, dark mould, on a deep stratum of tenacious clay; and that on a foundation of rocks, which often break through both strata, lifting their backs above the surface. The trees which chiefly grow here are the gigantic black oak, magnolia grandiflora, fraxinus excelsior, platane, and a few stately tulip trees." What Mr. Wordsworth will produce, it is not for me to prophesy: but I could pronounce with the liveliest convictions what he is capable of producing. It is the First GENUINE PHILOSOPHIC POEM.

The preceding criticism will not, I am aware, avail to overcome the prejudices of those who have made it a business to attack and ridicule Mr. Wordsworth's compositions.

Truth and prudence might be imagined as concentric circles. The poet may perhaps have passed beyond the latter, but he has confined himself far within the bounds of the former, in designating these critics as too petulant to be passive to a genuine poet, and too feeble to grapple with him; "men of palsied imaginations, in whose minds all healthy action is languid;—who, therefore, feed as the many direct them, or with the many are greedy after vicious provocatives."¹

Let not Mr. Wordsworth be charged with having expressed himself too indignantly, till the wantonness and the systematic and malignant perseverance of the aggressions have been taken into fair consideration. I myself heard the commander-in-chief² of this manly warfare make a boast of his private admiration of Wordsworth's genius. I have heard him declare that whoever came into his room would probably find the Lyrical Ballads lying open on his table, and that (speaking exclusively of those written by Mr. Wordsworth himself) he could nearly repeat the whole of them by heart. But a Review, in order to be a saleable article, must be personal, sharp, and pointed—and, since then, the poet has made himself, and with himself all who were, or were supposed to be, his friends and admirers, the object of the critic's revenge—how? by having spoken of a work so conducted in the terms which it deserved! I once heard a clergyman in boots and buckskin avow that he would cheat his own father in a horse. A moral system of a similar nature seems to have been adopted by too many anonymous critics. As we used to say at school, in reviewing they make being rogues: and he who complains is to be laughed at for his ignorance of the game. With the pen out of their hand they are honorable men. They exert indeed power (which is to that of the injured party who should attempt to expose their glaring perversions and misstatements, as twenty to one) to write down, and (where the author's circumstances permit) to impoverish the man, whose learning and genius they themselves in private have repeatedly admitted. They knowingly strive to make it impossible for the man even to publish any future work without exposing himself to all the wretchedness of debt and embarrassment. But this is all in their vocation; and, bating what they do in their vocation, "who can say that black is the white of their eye?"

So much for the detractors from Wordsworth's merits. On the other hand, much as I might wish for their fuller sympathy, I dare not flatter myself that the freedom with which I have declared my opinions concerning both his theory and his defects, most of which are more or less connected with his theory, either as cause or effect, will be satisfactory or pleasing to all the poet's admirers and advocates. More indiscriminate than mine their admiration may be: deeper and more sincere it cannot be. But I have advanced no opinion either for praise or censure, other than as texts introductory to the reasons which compel me to form it. Above all, I was fully convinced that such a criticism was not only wanted, but that, if executed with adequate ability, it must conduce, in no mean degree, to Mr. Wordsworth's reputation. His fame belongs to another age, and can neither be accelerated nor retarded. How small the proportion of the defects are to the beauties, I have repeatedly declared, and that no one of them originates in deficiency of poetic genius. Had they been more and greater, I should still, as a friend to his literary character in the present age, consider an analytic display of them as pure gain; if only it removed, as surely to all reflecting minds even the foregoing analysis must have removed, the strange mistake, so slightly grounded, yet so widely and industriously propagated, of Mr. Wordsworth's turn for simplicity! I am not half as much irritated by hearing his enemies abuse him for vulgarity of style, subject, and conception, as I am disgusted with the gilded side of the same meaning, as displayed by some affected admirers, with whom he is, forsooth, a "sweet, simple poet!" and so natural, that little master Charles and his younger sister are so charmed with them, that they play at "Goody Blake," or at "Johnny and Betty Foy!"

Were the collection of poems, published with these biographical sketches, important enough (which I am not vain enough to believe) to deserve such a distinction, even as I have done, so would I be done unto.

CHARACTERISTICS OF SHAKS- PEARE'S DRAMAS 1818 1838

In lectures of which amusement forms a large part of the object, there are some peculiar difficulties. The architect places his foundation out of sight, and the musician tunes his instrument before he makes his appearance; but the lecturer has to try his chords in the presence of the assembly, an operation not likely, indeed, to produce much pleasure, but yet indispensably necessary to a right understanding of the subject to be developed.

Poetry in essence is as familiar to barbarous as to civilized nations. The Laplander and the savage Indian are cheered by

it as well as the inhabitants of London and Paris; its spirit takes up and incorporates surrounding materials, as a plant clothes itself with soil and climate, whilst it exhibits the working of a vital principle within independent of all accidental circumstances. And to judge with fairness of an author's works, we ought to distinguish what is inward and essential from what is outward and circumstantial. It is essential to poetry that it be simple, and appeal to the elements and primary laws of our nature; that it be sensuous, and by its imagery elicit truth at a flash; that it be impassioned, and be able to move our feelings and awaken our affections. In comparing different poets with each other, we should inquire which have brought into the fullest play our imagination and our reason, or have created the greatest excitement and produced the completest harmony. If we consider great exquisiteness of language and sweetness of metre alone, it is impossible to deny to Pope the character of a delightful writer; but whether he be a poet, must depend upon our definition of the word; and, doubtless, if every thing that pleases be poetry, Pope's satires and epistles must be poetry. This I must say, that poetry, as distinguished from other modes of composition, does not rest in metre, and that it is not poetry, if it make no appeal to our passions or our imagination. One character belongs to all true poets, that they write from a principle within, not originating in any thing without; and that the true poet's work in its form, its shapings, and its modifications, is distinguished from all other works that assume to belong to the class of poetry, as a natural from an artificial flower, or as the mimic garden of a child from an enamelled meadow. In the former the flowers are broken from their stems and stuck into the ground; they are beautiful to the eye and fragrant to the sense, but their colors soon fade, and their odor is transient as the smile of the planter, while the meadow may be visited again and again with renewed delight; its beauty is innate in the soil, and its bloom is of the freshness of nature.

The next ground of critical judgment, and point of comparison, will be as to how far a given poet has been influenced by accidental circumstances. As a living poet must surely write, not for the ages past, but for that in which he lives, and those which are to follow, it is, on the one hand, natural that he should not violate, and on the other, necessary that he should not depend on, the mere manners and modes of his day. See how little does Shakspeare leave us to regret that he was born in his particular age!

The great era in modern times was what is called the Restoration of Letters, the ages preceding it are called the dark ages; but it would be more wise, perhaps, to call them the ages in which we were in the dark. It is usually overlooked that the supposed dark period was not universal, but partial and successive, or alternate; that the dark age of England was not the dark age of Italy, but that one country was in its light and vigor, whilst another was in its gloom and bondage. But no sooner had the Reformation sounded through Europe like the blast of an archangel's trumpet, than from king to peasant there arose an enthusiasm for knowledge, the discovery of a manuscript became the subject of an embassy, Erasmus read by moonlight, because he could not afford a torch, and begged a penny, not for the love of charity, but for the love of learning. The three great points of attention were religion, morals, and taste; men of genius as well as men of learning, who in this age need to be so widely distinguished, then alike became copyists of the ancients, and thus, indeed, was the only way by which the taste of mankind could be improved, or their understandings informed. Whilst Dante imagined himself a humble follower of Virgil, and Ariosto of Homer, they were both unconscious of that greater power working within them, which in many points carried them beyond their supposed originals. All great discoveries bear the stamp of the age in which they are made; hence we perceive the effects of the purer religion of the moderns, visible for the most part in their lives; and in reading their works we should not content ourselves with the mere narratives of events long since passed, but should learn to apply their maxims and conduct to ourselves.

Having intimated that times and manners lend their form and pressure¹ to genius, let me once more draw a slight parallel between the ancient and modern stage, the stages of Greece and of England. The Greeks were polytheists; their religion was local; almost the only object of their knowledge, art, and taste, was their gods; and, accordingly, their productions were, if the expression may be allowed, statuesque, whilst those of the moderns are picturesque.

The Greeks reared a structure which in its parts, and as a whole, filled the mind with the calm and elevated impression of perfect beauty, and symmetrical proportion. The moderns also produced a whole, a more striking whole, but it was by blending materials and fusing the parts together. And as the Pantheon is to York Minster or Westminster Abbey, so is Sophocles compared with Shakspeare; in the one a completeness, a satisfaction, an excellence, on which the mind rests with complacency, in the other a multitude of interlaced materials, great and little, magnificent and mean, accompanied, indeed, with the sense of a falling short of perfection, and yet, at the same time, so promising of our social and individual progression, that we would not, if we could, exchange it for that repose of the mind which dwells on the forms of symmetry in the acquiescent admiration of grace. This general characteristic of the ancient and modern drama might be illustrated by a parallel of the ancient and modern music, the one consisting of melody arising from a succession only of pleasing sounds, the modern embracing harmony also, the result of combination and the effect of a whole.

I have said, and I say it again, that great as was the genius of Shakspeare, his judgment was at least equal to it. Of this any one will be convinced, who attentively considers those points in which the dramas of Greece and England differ, from the dissimilitude of circumstances by which each was modified and influenced. The Greek stage had its origin in the ceremonies of a sacrifice, such as of the goat to Bacchus, whom we most erroneously regard as merely the jolly god of wine, for among the ancients he was venerable, as the symbol of that power which acts without our consciousness in the vital energies of nature,—the vinum mundi,¹—as Apollo was that of the conscious agency of our intellectual being. The heroes of old under the influences of this Bacchic enthusiasm performed more than human actions, hence tales of the favorite champions soon passed into dialogue. On the Greek stage the chorus was always before the audience, the curtain was never dropped, as we should say, and change of place being therefore, in general, impossible, the absurd notion of condemning it merely as improbable in itself was never entertained by any one. If we can believe ourselves at Thebes in one act, we may believe ourselves at Athens in the next. If a story lasts twenty-four hours or twenty-four years, it is equally improbable. There seems to be no just boundary but what the feelings prescribe. But on the Greek stage where the same persons were perpetually before the audience, great judgment was necessary in venturing on any such change. The poets never, therefore, attempted to impose on the senses by bringing places to men, but they did bring men to places, as in the well known instance in the Eumenides,² where during an evident retirement of the chorus from the orchestra, the scene is changed to Athens, and Orestes is first introduced in the temple of Minerva, and the chorus of Furies come in afterwards in pursuit of him.

In the Greek drama there were no formal divisions into scenes and acts, there were no means, therefore, of allowing for the necessary lapse of time between one part of the dialogue and another, and unity of time in a strict sense was, of course, impossible. To overcome that difficulty of accounting for time, which is effected on the modern stage by dropping a curtain, the judgment and great genius of the ancients supplied music and measured motion, and with the lyric ode filled up the vacancy. In the story of the Agamemnon of Æschylus, the capture of Troy is supposed to be announced by a fire lighted on the Asiatic shore, and the transmission of the signal by successive beacons to Mycenæ. The signal is first seen at the 21st line, and the herald from Troy itself enters at the 480th, and Agamemnon himself at the 783rd line. But the practical absurdity of this was not felt by the audience, who, in imagination stretched minutes into hours, while they listened to the lofty narrative odes of the chorus which almost entirely filled up the interspace. Another fact deserves attention here, namely, that regularly on the Greek stage a drama, or acted story, consisted in reality of three dramas, called together a trilogy, and performed consecutively in the course of one day. Now you may conceive a tragedy of Shakspeare's as a trilogy connected in one single representation. Divide Lear into three parts, and each would be a play with the ancients, or take the three Æschylean dramas of Agamemnon,² and divide them into, or call them, as many acts, and they together would be one play. The first act would comprise the usurpation of Ægisthus, and the murder of Agamemnon; the second, the revenge of Orestes, and the murder of his mother, and the third, the penance and absolution of Orestes,—occupying a period of twenty-two years.

The stage in Shakspeare's time was a naked room with a blanket for a curtain; but he made it a field for monarchs. That law of unity, which has its foundations, not in the factitious necessity of custom, but in nature itself, the unity of feeling, is everywhere and at all times observed by Shakspeare in his plays. Read Romeo and Juliet: all is youth and spring; youth with its follies, its virtues, its precipitancies; spring with its odors, its flowers, and its transiency. It is one and the same feeling that commences, goes through, and ends the play. The old men, the Capulets and the Montagues, are not common old men; they have an eagerness, a heartiness, a vehemence, the effect of spring; with Romeo, his change of passion, his sudden marriage, and his rash death, are all the effects of youth, whilst in Juliet, love has all that is tender and melancholy in the nightingale, all that is voluptuous in the rose, with whatever is sweet in the freshness of spring, but it ends with a long deep sigh like the last breeze of the Italian evening. This unity of feeling and character pervades every drama of Shakspeare.

It seems to me that his plays are distinguished from those of all other dramatic poets by the following characteristics

1. Expectation in preference to surprise. It is like the true reading of the passage "God said, Let there be light, and there was light;" not there was light. As the feeling with which we startle at a shooting star compared with that of watching the sunrise at the pre-established moment, such and so low is surprise compared with expectation.

2. Signal adherence to the great law of nature, that all opposites tend to attract and temper each other. Passion in Shakspeare generally displays libertinism, but involves morality; and if there are exceptions to this, they are, independently of their intrinsic value, all of them indicative of individual character, and, like the farewell admonitions of a parent, have an end beyond the parental relation. Thus the Countess's beautiful precepts to Bertram, by elevating her character, raise that of Helena her favorite, and soften down the point in her which Shakspeare does not mean us not to see, but to see and to forgive, and at length to justify. And so it is in Polonius, who is the personified memory of wisdom no longer actually possessed. This admirable character is always misrepresented on the stage. Shakspeare never intended to exhibit him as a buffoon; for although it was natural that Hamlet (a young man of fire and genius, detesting formality, and disliking Polonius on political grounds, as imagining that he had assisted his uncle in his usurpation) should express himself satirically, yet this must not be taken as exactly the poet's conception of him. In Polonius a certain induration of character had arisen from long habits of business; but take his advice to Laertes, and Ophelia's reverence for his memory, and we shall see that he was meant to be represented as a statesman somewhat past his faculties,—his recollections of life all full of wisdom, and showing a knowledge of human nature, whilst what immediately takes place before him, and escapes from him, is indicative of weakness.

But as in Homer all the deities are in armor, even Venus, so in Shakspeare all the characters are strong. Hence real folly and dullness are made by him the vehicles of wisdom. There is no difficulty for one being a fool to imitate a fool, but to be, remain, and speak like a wise man and a great wit, and yet so as to give a vivid representation of a veritable fool,—hic labor, hoc opus est.¹ A drunken constable is not uncommon, nor hard to draw, but see and examine what goes to make up a Dogberry.

3. Keeping at all times in the high road of life. Shakspeare has no innocent adulteries, no interesting incests, no virtuous vice; he never renders that amiable which religion and reason alike teach us to detest, or clothe impurity in the garb of virtue, like Beaumont and Fletcher, the Kotzebues of the day.² Shakspeare's fathers are roused by ingratitude, his husbands stung by unfaithfulness; in him, in short, the affections are wounded in those points in which all may, nay, must, feel. Let the morality of Shakspeare be contrasted with that of the writers of his own, or the succeeding, age, or of those of the present day, who boast their superiority in this respect. No one can dispute that the result of such a comparison is altogether in favor of Shak-

¹ this is the labor, this is the work (Æneid, 6, 129)

² Kotzebue (1761-1819) was a prolific German writer of emotional and immoral plays, for many years popular in England spare; even the letters of women of high rank in his age were often coarser than his writings. If he occasionally disgusts a keen sense of delicacy, he never injures the mind; he neither excites nor flatters passion in order to degrade the subject of it; he does not use the faulty thing for a faulty purpose, nor carries on warfare against virtue, by causing wickedness to appear as no wickedness, through the medium of a morbid sympathy with the unfortunate. In Shakespeare vice never walks as in twilight, nothing is purposely out of its place, he inverts not the order of nature and propriety, does not make every magistrate a drunkard or glutton, nor every poor man meek, humane, and temperate; he has no benevolent butchers, nor any sentimental rat-catchers.

4. Independence of the dramatic interest on the plot The interest in the plot is always in fact on account of the characters, not vice versa, as in almost all other writers; the plot is a mere canvas and no more. Hence arises the true justification of the same stratagem being used in regard to Benedict and Beatrice, the vanity in each being alike. Take away from the Much Ado About Nothing all that which is not indispensable to the plot, either as having little to do with it, or, at best, like Dogberry and his comrades, forced into the service, when any other less ingeniously absurd watchmen and night-constables would have answered the mere necessities of the action; take away Benedict, Beatrice, Dogberry, and the reaction of the former on the character of Hero, and what will remain? In other writers the main agent of the plot is always the prominent character, in Shakspeare it is so, or is not so, as the character is in itself calculated, or not calculated, to form the plot. Don John is the main-spring of the plot of this play; but he is merely shown and then withdrawn.

5. Independence of the interest on the story as the ground-work of the plot. Hence Shakspeare never took the trouble of inventing stories. It was enough for him to select from those that had been already invented or recorded such as had one or other, or both, of two recommendations, namely, suitableness to his particular purpose, and their being parts of popular tradition,—names of which we had often heard, and of their fortunes, and as to which all we wanted was, to see the man himself. So it is just the man himself, the Lear, the Shylock, the Richard, that Shak-peare makes us for the first time acquainted with. Omit the first scene in Lear, and yet every thing will remain; so the first and second scenes in The Merchant of Venice. Indeed it is universally true

6. Interfusion of the lyrical (that which in its very essence is poetical) not only with the dramatic, as in the plays of Metastasio, where at the end of the scenes comes the *aria*¹ as the exit speech of the character, but also in and through the dramatic Songs in Shakespeare are introduced as songs only, just as songs are in real life, beautifully as some of them are characteristic of the person who has sung or called for them, as Desdemona's "Willow," and Ophelia's wild snatches, and the sweet carolings in As You Like It. But the whole of the Midsummer Night's Dream is one continued specimen of the dramatized lyrical. And observe how exquisitely the dramatic of Hotspur.—

Marry, and I'm glad on't with all my heart, I'd rather be a kitten and cry mew, &c.

25 melts away into the lyric of Mortimer:—

I understand thy looks that pretty Welsh Which thou pourest down from these swelling
heavens,

Henry IV, Part 1, Act III, sc 1

7. The characters of the dramatis personæ, like those in real life, are to be inferred by the reader, they are not told to him And it is well worth remarking that Shakspeare's characters, like those in real life, are very commonly misunderstood, and almost always understood by different persons in different ways The causes are the same in either case. If you take only what the friends of the character say, you may be deceived, and still more so, if that which his enemies say; nay, even the character himself sees through the medium of his character, and not exactly as he is Take all together, not omitting a shrewd hint from the clown, or the fool, and perhaps your impression will be right, and you may know whether you have in fact discovered the poet's own idea, by all the speeches receiving light from it, and attesting its reality by reflecting it

Lastly, in Shakspeare the heterogeneous is united, as it is in nature. You must not suppose a pressure or passion always acting on or in the character. Passion in Shakspeare is that by which the individual is distinguished from others, not that which makes a different kind of him Shakspeare followed the main march of the human affections. He entered into no analysis of the passions or faiths of men, but assured himself that such and such passions and 5 faiths were grounded in our common nature, and not in the mere accidents of ignorance or disease. This is an important consideration, and constitutes our Shakspeare the morning star, the guide and the pioneer, of 10 true philosophy.

SONNET

CONCERNING THE SLAVE TRADE
 1794 1795

Why dost thou beat thy breast, and rend thine hair,
 And to the deaf sea pour thy frantic cries?
 Before the gale, the laden vessel flies,
 The heavens all-favoring smile, the breeze is fall
 5 Hark to the clamors of the exulting crew!
 Hark, how their cannon mock the patient skies!
 Why dost thou shriek, and strain thy red-swollen eyes,
 As the white sail is lessening from thy
 view?
 Go, pine in want and anguish and despair 10 There is no mercy found in human-kind Go, widow, to thy grave, and rest thee
 there!
 But may the God of justice bid the wind Whelm that cursed bark beneath the mountain-wave,
 And bless with liberty and death the Slave!

THE BATTLE OF BLENHEIM 1798 1798

It was a summer evening,
 Old Kaspar's work was done,
 And he before his cottage door
 Was sitting in the sun, 5 And by him sported on the green His little grandchild Wilhelmine

 She saw her brother Peterkin Roll something large and round,
 Which he beside the rivulet 10 In playing there had found,
 He came to ask what he had found,
 That was so large, and smooth, and round

 Old Kaspar took it from the boy, Who stood expectant by;
 15 And then the old man shook his head.
 And, with a natural sigh,

"'Tis some poor fellow's skull," said he,
 "Who fell in the great victory."

"I find them in the garden, 20 For there's many here about,
 And often when I go to plough,
 The ploughshare turns them out!
 For many a thousand men," said he,
 "Were slain in that great victory."

25 "Now tell us what 'twas all about.
 Young Peterkin, he cries;
 And little Wilhelmine looks up With wonder-waiting eyes,
 "Now tell us all about the war, 30 And what they fought each other for!"

"It was the English," Kaspar cried,
 "Who put the French to rout,
 But what they fought each other for,
 I could not well make out.
 35 But everybody said," quoth he,
 "That 'twas a famous victory."

"My father lived at Blenheim then.
 Yon little stream hard by,
 They burnt his dwelling to the ground 40 And he was forced to fly,
 So with his wife and child he fled, Nor had he where to rest his head!"

"With fire and sword the country round Was wasted far and wide, 45 And many a childing mother then,
 And new-born baby died,
 But things like that, you know, must be At every famous victory."

"They say it was a shocking sight 50 After the field was won,
 For many thousand bodies here
 Lay rotting in the sun,
 But things like that, you know, must be After a famous victory."

55 "Great praise the Duke of Marlbro' won.
 And our good Prince Eugene!"
 "Why 'twas a very wicked thing!"
 Said little Wilhelmine
 "Nay, nay, my little girl," quoth he, 60 "It was a famous victory."

"And everybody praised the Duke Who this great fight did win."
 "But what good came of it at last?"
 Quoth little Peterkin 65 "Why that I cannot tell," said he,
 "But 'twas a famous victory!"

THE HOLLY TREE

1798

1799

O reader! has thou ever stood to see

The Holly Tree?

The eye that contemplates it well perceives
Its glossy leaves

5 Order'd by an intelligence so wise, As might confound the Atheist's sophistries

Below, a circling fence, its leaves are seen Wrinkled and keen;

No grazing cattle through their prickly
round

10 Can reach to wound,
But as they grow where nothing is to fear, Smooth and unarm'd the pointless leaves
appear

I love to view these things with curious
eyes,

And moralize

15 And in this wisdom of the Holly Tree Can emblems see

Wherewith perchance to make a pleasant rhyme,

One which may profit in the after time

Thus, though abroad perchance I might appear

20 Harsh and austere,
To those who on my leisure would intrude Reserved and rude,

Gentle at home amid my friends I'd be Like the high leaves upon the Holly Tree

25 And should my youth, as youth is apt I
know,

Some harshness show,
All vain asperities I day by day

Would wear away,
Till the smooth temper of my age should
be

30 Like the high leaves upon the Holly Tree

And as when all the summer trees are seen
So bright and green,

The Holly leaves a sober hue display Less bright than they,

35 But when the bare and wintry woods we
see,

What then so cheerful as the Holly Tree?

So serious should my youth appear among The thoughtless throng,

So would I seem amid the young and gay More grave than they,

40 That in my age as cheerful I might be
As the green winter of the Holly Tree

THE OLD MAN'S COMFORTS

AND HOW HE GAINED THEM

1799

"You are old, Father William," the young man cried,

"The few locks which are left you are
gray;

You are hale, Father William, a hearty old man,

Now tell me the reason, I pray "

5 "In the days of my youth," Father
William replied,

"I remembered that youth would fly fast,

And abused not my health, and my vigor at first,

That I never might need them at last "

"You are old, Father William," the
young man cried,

10 "And pleasures with youth pass away,
And yet you lament not the days that are
gone,

Now tell me the reason, I pray "

"In the days of my youth," Father
William replied,

"I remembered that youth could not
last,

15 I thought of the future, whatever I did,
That I never might grieve for the past "

"You are old, Father William, the
young man cried,

"And life must be hastening away.

You are cheerful, and love to converse upon death,

20 Now tell me the reason, I pray "

"I am cheerful, young man," Father
William replied,

"Let the cause thy attention engage,
In the days of my youth I remember'd my God!

And He hath not forgotten my age "

GOD'S JUDGMENT ON A WICKED BISHOP

1799

1799

The summer and autumn had been so wet,
That in winter the corn was growing yet,
'Twas a piteous sight to see all around The grain he rotting on the ground.

5 Every day the starving poor Crowded around Bishop Hatto's door,
For he had a plentiful last-year's store,

And all the neighborhood could tell His granaries were furnish'd well

- 10 At last Bishop Hatto appointed a day To quiet the poor without delay;
He bade them to his great barn repair,
And they should have food for the winter there.

- Rejoiced such tidings good to hear.
15 The poor folk flock'd from far and near,
The great barn was full as it could hold
Of women and children, and young and old.

- Then when he saw it could hold no more,
Bishop Hatto he made fast the door;
20 And while for mercy on Christ they call,
He set fire to the barn and burnt them all.

- I'faith 'tis an excellent bonfire!" quoth he,
"And the country is greatly obliged to me,
For ridding it in these times forlorn, 25 Of rats that only consume the corn."

So then to his palace returned he,
And he sat down to supper merrily,
And he slept that night like an innocent man,
But Bishop Hatto never slept again.

- 30 In the morning as he enter'd the hall Where his picture hung against the wall, A sweat like death all over him came,
For the rats had eaten it out of the frame.

As he look'd there came a man from his farm—

- 35 He had a countenance white with alarm,
"My Lord, I open'd your granaries this morn,
And the rats had eaten all your corn."

- Another came running presently,
And he was pale as pale could be, 40 "Fly' my Lord Bishop, fly," quoth he,
"Ten thousand rats are coming this way,—
The Lord forgive you for yesterday!"

"I'll go to my tower on the Rhine," replied he,

- "'Tis the safest place in Germany;
45 The walls are high and the shores are steep,
And the stream is strong and the water deep."

Bishop Hatto fearfully hasten'd away,
And he crost the Rhine without delay,

And reach'd his tower, and barr'd with care

- 50 All the windows, doors, and loop-holes there.

He laid him down and closed his eyes;
But soon a scream made him arise,
He started and saw two eyes of flame
On his pillow from whence the screaming came.

- 55 He listen'd and look'd;—it was only the cat;
But the Bishop he grew more fearful for that,
For she sat screaming, mad with fear
At the army of rats that were drawing near.

- For they have swum over the river so deep, 60 And they have climb'd the shores so steep,
And up the tower their way is bent,
To do the work for which they were sent.

- They are not to be told by the dozen or score,
By thousands they come, and by myriads and more, 65 Such numbers had never been heard of before, Such a judgment had never been witness'd of yore.

- Down on his knees the Bishop fell,
And faster and faster his beads did he tell,
As louder and louder drawing near 70 The gnawing of their teeth he could hear.

- And in at the windows and in at the door,
And through the walls helter-skelter they pour,
And down from the ceiling and up through the floor,
From the right and the left, from behind and before, 75 From withm and without, from above and below,
And all at once to the Bishop they go.

- They have whetted their teeth against the stones,
And now they pick the Bishop's bones;
They gnaw'd the flesh from every limb, 80 For they were sent to do judgment on him'

I THE FUNERAL

Midnight, and yet no eye Through all the Imperial City closed in
sleep!
Behold her streets a-blaze
With light that seems to kindle the red sky, 5 Her myriads swarming through the crowded ways!
Master and slave, old age and infancy,
All, all abroad to gaze;
House-top and balcony (lustered with women, who throw back their veils
10 With unimpeded and insatiate sight To view the funeral pomp which passes by.
As if the mournful rite Were but to them a scene of joyance and
delight
Vainly, ye blessed twinklers of the night, 15 Your feeble beams ye shed, Quench'd in the unnatural light which might out-stare
Even the broad eye of day;
And thou from thy celestial way Pourrest, O Moon, an ineffectual ray!
20 For lo! ten thousand torches flame and flare
Upon the midnight air, Blotting the lights of heaven
With one portentous glare Behold the fragrant smoke in many a fold 25 Ascending, floats along the fiery sky,
And hangeth visible on high,
A dark and waving canopy.
Hark! 'tis the funeral trumpet's breath!
'Tis the dirge of death!
30 At once ten thousand drums begin,
With one long thunder-peal the ear assail-
ing;
Ten thousand voices then join in,
And with one deep and general din Pour their wild wailing.
35 The song of praise is drown'd Amid the deafening sound;
You hear no more the trumpet's tone,
You hear no more the mourner's moan, Though the trumpet's breath, and the dirge of death, 40 Swell with commingled force the funeral yell.
But rising over all in one acclam
Is heard the echoed and re-echoed name,
From all that countless rout;
Arvalan! Arvalan!

45 Arvalan! Arvalan!
Ten times ten thousand voices in one shout
Call Arvalan! The overpowering sound, From house to house repeated rings
about,
From tower to tower rolls round.
50 The death-procession moves along;
Their bald heads shining to the torches'
ray,
The Bramins lead the way, (hanting the funeral song
And now at once they shout,
55 Arvalan! Arvalan!
With quick rebound of sound,
All in accordance cry,
Arvalan! Arvalan!
The universal multitude reply 60 In vain ye thunder on his ear the name.
Would ye awake the dead?
Borne upright in his palankeen,¹
There Arvalan is seen!
A glow is on his face, a lively red, 65 It is the crimson canopy Which o'er his cheek a reddening shade hath shed,
He moves, he nods his head,
But the motion comes from the bearers'
tread,
As the body, borne aloft in state, 70 Sways with the impulse of its own dead weight.
Close following his dead son, Kehama
came,
Nor joining in the ritual song,
Nor calling the dear name,
With head deprest and funeral vest, 75 And arms enfolded on his breast, Silent and lost in thought he moves along King of the World, his slaves, unenvying
now, Behold their wretched Lord, rejoiced they see
The mighty Rajah's miserv; 80 That Nature in his pride hath dealt the
blow,
And taught the Master of Mankind to
know
Even he himself is man, and not exempt
from woe
O sight of grief! the wives of Arvalan, Young Azla, young Neallun, are seen!
85 Their widow-robos of white,
With gold and jewels bright,
Each like an Eastern queen.
Woe! woe! around their palankeen,
¹ A conveyance borne on the shoulders of men

As on a bridal day, 90 With symphony, and dance, and song,
 Their kindred and their friends come on.
 The dance of sacrifice! the funeral song!
 And next the victim slaves in long array, Richly bedight to grace the fatal day, 95 Move onward to their death;
 The clarions' stirring breath
 Lifts their thin robes in every flowing fold,
 And swells the woven gold,
 That on the agitated air 100 Flutters and glitters to the torch's glare.

 A man and maid of aspect wan and wild, 145
 Then, side by side, by bowmen guarded,
 came;
 O wretched father! O unhappy child!
 Them were all eyes of all the throng exploring.
 105 Is this the daring man Who raised his fatal hand at Arvalan?
 Is this the wretch condemn'd to feel Kehama's dreadful wrath?
 Then were all hearts of all the throng deploring;
 110 For not in that innumerable throng Was one who loved the dead; for who could know What aggravated wrong
 Provoked the desperate blow!

 Far, far behind, beyond all reach of
 sight,
 115 In order'd files the torches flow along,
 One ever-lengthening line of gliding
 light.
 Far, far behind,
 Rolls on the undistinguishable clamor,
 Of horn, and trump, and tambour;
 120 Incessant as the roar Of streams which down the wintry mountain pour,
 And louder than the dread commotion
 Of breakers on a rocky shore,
 When the winds rage over the waves, 125 And Ocean to the Tempest raves.

 And now toward the bank they go,
 Where winding on their way below,
 Deep and strong the waters flow.
 Here doth the funeral pile appear 130 With myrrh and ambergris bestrew'd,
 And built of precious sandal wood They cease their music and their outcry
 here,
 Gently they rest the bier;
 They wet the face of Arvalan, 135 No sign of life the sprinkled drops excite;

They feel his breast,—no motion there;
 They feel his lips,—no breath;
 For not with feeble, nor with erring hand,
 The brave avenger dealt the blow of
 death.

140 Then with a doubling peal and deeper blast,
 The tambours and the trumpets sound on
 high,
 And with a last and loudest cry,
 They call on Arvalan.

Woe! woe! for Azla takes her seat
 Upon the funeral pile!
 Calmly she took her seat,
 Calmly the whole terrific pomp survey'd,
 As on her lap the while The lifeless head of Arvalan was laid.

150 Woe! woe! Nealliny,
 The young Nealliny!
 They strip her ornaments away, Bracelet and anklet, ring, and chain, and zone;¹

Around her neck they leave 155 The marriage knot alone,— That marriage band, which when Yon waning moon was young,
 Around her virgin neck
 With bridal joy was hung 160 Then with white flowers, the coronal of
 death,
 Her jetty locks they crown

O sight of misery!
 You cannot hear her cries; their sound
 In that wild dissonance is drown'd; 165 But in her face you see The supplication and the agony, See in her swelling throat the desperate-
 strength
 That with vain effort struggles yet for
 life;
 Her arms contracted now in fruitless strife,
 170 Now wildly at full length Towards the crown in vain for pity
 spread,
 They force her on, they bind her to the
 dead.

Then all around retire;
 Circling the pile, the ministering Bra-mins stand, 175 Each lifting in his hand a torch on fire.
 Alone the father of the dead advanced
 And lit the funeral pyre.

¹ girdle

At once on every side
 The circling torches drop,
 180 At once on every side
 The fragrant oil is pour'd,
 At once on every side
 The rapid flames rush up.
 Then hand in hand the victim band 185 Roll in the dance around the funeral pyre;
 Their garments' flying folds Float inward to the fire,
 In drunken whirl they wheel around,
 One drops, another plunges in,
 190 And still with overwhelming din
 The tambours and the trumpets sound;
 And clap of hand, and shouts, and cries,
 From all the multitude arise,
 While round and round, in giddy wheel, 195 Intoxicate they roll and reel, Till one by one whirl'd in they fall,
 And the devouring flames have swallow'd
 all.

Then all was still, the drums and clarions ceased,
 The multitude were hush'd in silent awe, 200 Only the roaring of the flames was heard

THE MARCH TO MOSCOW

1812 1814

The Emperor Nap¹ he would set off
 On a summer excursion to Moscow,
 The fields were green, and the sky was blue, Morbleu! Parbleu!²
 5 What a pleasant excursion to Moscow!
 Four hundred thousand men and more Must go with him to Moscow
 There were Marshals by the dozen,
 And Dukes by the score, 10 Princes a few, and Kings one or two, While the fields are so green, and the sky so blue,
 Morbleu! Parbleu!
 What a pleasant excursion to Moscow!
 There was Junot and Augereau, 15 Heigh-ho for Moscow!
 Dombrowsky and Poniatowsky.
 Marshal Ney, lack-a-day!
 General Rapp and the Emperor Nap.
 Nothing would do 20 While the fields were so green, and the sky so blue,
 Morbleu! Parbleu!
 Nothing would do
 For the whole of this crew,
 But they must be marching to Moscow.

25 The Emperor Nap he talk'd so big That he frighten'd Mr. Roscoe.
 John Bull, he cries, if you'll be wise,
 Ask the Emperor Nap if he will please
 To grant you peace upon your knees, 30 Because he is going to Moscow He'll make all the Poles come out of their holes,
 And beat the Russians and eat the Prussians,
 For the fields are green, and the sky is blue,
 Morbleu! Parbleu!
 35 And he'll certainly march to Moscow!

And Counsellor Brougham was all in a fume
 At the thought of the march to Moscow.
 The Russians, he said, they were undone,
 And the great Fee-Faw-Fun
 40 Would presently come With a hop, step, and jump unto London For as for his conquering Russia, However some persons might scoff it,
 Do it he could, and do it he would, 45 And from doing it nothing would come but good,
 And nothing could call him off it Mr. Jeffrey said so, who must certainly
 know,
 For he was the Edinburgh Prophet
 They all of them knew Mr Jeffrey's
Review,
 50 Which with Holy Writ ought to be reckon'd
 It was through thick and thin to its party true;
 Its back was buff, and its sides were blue,¹
 Morbleu! Parbleu!
 It served them for Law and for Gospel
 too

55 But the Russians stoutly they turned-to Upon the road to Moscow Nap had to fight his way all through.
 They could fight, though they could not parler-vous,²
 But the fields were green, and the sky was blue,
 60 Morbleu! Parbleu!
 And so he got to Moscow

He found the place too warm for him,
 For they set fire to Moscow
 To get there had cost him much ado, 65 And then no better course he knew.

¹ Napoleon, who invaded Russia with disastrous results to his army, in 1812

While the fields were green, and the sky ¹¹⁵ Put his trust in his fortune, and not in

 Morbleu! Parbleu!
 But to march back again from Moscow.

The Russians they stuck close to him
 70 All on the road from Moscow
 There was Tormazow and Jemalow
 And all the others that end in ow, Milarodovitch and Jaladovitch
 And Karatschkowitch, 75 And all the others that end in itch, Schamscheff, Sonchosaneff,
 And Schepaleff,
 And all the others that end in eff, Wasiltchikoff, Kostomaroff,
 80 And Tehoglooff,
 And all the others that end in off,
 Rajeffsy and Novereffsy,
 And Rieffsky,
 And all the others that end in effsky, 85 Oscharoffsky and Rostoffsky,
 And all the others that end in offsky,
 And Platoff he play'd them off,
 And Shouvaloff he shovell'd them off, 90 And Markoff he mark'd them off,
 And Krosnoff he cross'd them off,
 And Tuchkoff he touch'd them off,
 And Boroskoff he bored them off,
 And Kutousoff he cut them off,
 And Parenzoff he pared them off, 95 And Worronzoff he worried them off,
 And Doctoroff he doctor'd them off,
 And Rodionoff he flogg'd them off.
 And last of all an Admiral came,
 A terrible man with a terrible name, 100 A name which you all know by sight very
 well;
 But which no one can speak, and no one can spell
 They stuck close to Nap with all their might,
 They were on the left and on the right, Behind and before, and by day and by
 night,
 105 He would rather parlez-vous than fight;
 But he look'd white and he look'd blue.
 Morbleu! Parbleu!
 When parlez-vous no more would do,
 For they remember'd Moscow

110 And then came on the frost and snow
 All on the road from Moscow
 The wind and the weather he found in that hour Cared nothing for him nor for all his
 power;
 For him who, while Europe crouch'd under his rod,

Put his trust in his fortune, and not in his God,
 Worse and worse every day the elements grew,
 The fields so white and the sky so blue, Sacrebleu! Ventrebleu!¹
 What a horrible journey from Moscow!

120 What then thought the Emperor Nap Upon the road from Moscow?
 Why, I ween he thought it small delight
 To fight all day, and to freeze all night
 And he was besides in a very great fright.
 125 For a whole skin he liked to be in;
 And so, not knowing what else to do,
 When the fields were so white and the sky so blue,
 Morbleu! Parbleu!
 He stole away, I tell you true,
 130 Upon the road from Moscow
 'Tis myself, quoth he, I must mind most,
 So the Devil may take the hindmost

Too cold upon the road was he,
 Too hot had he been at Moscow, 135 But colder and hotter he may be,
 For the grave is colder than Muscovy
 And a place there is to be kept in view Where the fire is red and the brimstone
 blue,
 Morbleu! Parbleu!
 140 Which he must go to,
 If the Pope say true,
 If he does not in time look about him, Where his namesake almost
 He may have for his Host, 145 He has reckon'd too long without him,
 If that host get him in Purgatory, He won't leave him there alone with his glory,
 But there he must stay for a very long
 day
 For from thence there is no stealing
 away
 150 As there was on the road from Moscow

WRITTEN DURING THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH BUONAPARTE, IN JANUARY, 1814
 1814 1814

Who counsels peace at this momentous
 hour,
 When God hath given deliverance to the oppress'd,
 And to the injured power?²

² After being successful in a number of engagements against Napoleon in the winter of 1813-14, the allies made proposals for peace

Who counsels peace, when Vengeance like a flood 5 Rolls on, no longer now to be repress'd; 45
 When innocent blood
 From the four corners of the world cries out
 For justice upon one accursed head, When Freedom hath her holy banners
 spread 10 Over all nations, now in one just cause
 United; when with one sublime accord Europe throws off the yoke abhor'd, And Loyalty and Faith and Ancient Law
 Follow the avenging sword!
 15 Woe, woe to England! woe and endless shame,
 If this heroic land,
 False to her feelings and unspotted fame,
 Hold out the olive to the tyrant's hand!
 20 Woe to the world, if Buonaparte's throne Be suffer'd still to stand!
 For by what names shall right and wrong be known,
 What new and courtly phrases must we feign
 For falsehood, murder, and all monstrous crimes, 25 If that perfidious Corsican maintain Still his detested reign, And France, who yearns even now to break her chain, Beneath his iron rule be left to groan!
 No! by the innumerable dead Whose blood hath for his lust of power been shed, 30 Death only can for his foul deeds atone, That peace which Death and Judgment can bestow,
 That peace be Buonaparte's, that alone!
 For sooner shall the Ethiope change his skin,
 Or from the leopard shall her spots depart,¹ 35 Than this man change his old flagitious
 heart.
 Have ye not seen him in the balance
 weigh'd,
 And there found wanting?² On the stage of blood
 Foremost the resolute adventurer stood; 75
 And when, by many a battle won, 40 He placed upon his brow the crown, Curbing delirious France beneath his
 sway,
 Then, like Octavius in old time,
 Fair name might he have handed down, Effacing many a stain of former crime.
 Fool! should he cast away that bright renown!
 Fool! the redemption proffer'd should he
 lose!
 When Heaven such grace vouchsafed him that the way To good and evil lay Before him, which to choose 50 But evil was his good,¹ For all too long in blood had he been nurst,
 And ne'er was earth with verner tyrant curst
 Bold man and bad, Remorseless, godless, full of fraud and lies, 55 And black with murders and with perjuries,
 Himself in Hell's whole panoply he clad,
 No law but his own headstrong will he knew,
 No counsellor but his own wicked heart From evil thus portentous strength he drew,
 60 And trampled under foot all human ties,
 All holy laws, all natural charities O France! beneath this fierce barbarian's sway
 Disgraced thou art to all succeeding
 times,
 Rapine, and blood, and fire have mark'd thy way.
 65 All loathsome, all unutterable crimes A curse is on thee, France! from far and wide
 It hath gone up to Heaven All lands have cried
 For vengeance upon thy detested head!
 All nations curse thee, France! for wheresoe'er 70 In peace or war thy banner hath been spread,
 All forms of human woe have follow'd
 there
 The living and the dead
 Cry out alike against thee! They who bear, Crouching beneath its weight, thine iron yoke,
 75 Join in the bitterness of secret prayer
 The voice of that innumerable throng, Whose slaughter'd spirits day and night invoke
 The Everlasting Judge of right and wrong

How long, O Lord! Holy and Just, how long!

80 A merciless oppressor hast thou been, Thyself remorselessly oppress'd meantime;
Greedy of war, when all that thou couldst gain

Was but to dye thy soul with deeper crime,
And rivet faster round thyself the chain

85 O blind to honor, and to interest blind,
When thus in abject servitude resign'd To this barbarian upstart, thou couldst brave

God's justice, and the heart of human kind!

Madly thou thoughtest to enslave the
world,

90 Thyself the while a miserable slave Behold the flag of vengeance is unfurl'd!
The dreadful armies of the North
advance,

While England, Portugal, and Spain combined,

Give their triumphant banners to the wind,

95 And stand victorious in the fields of France

One man hath been for ten long wretched years

The cause of all this blood and all these
tears,

One man in this most awful point of time

Draws on thy danger, as he caused thy crime.

100 Wait not too long the event,
For now whole Europe comes against thee bent,

His wiles and their own strength the nations know:

Wise from past wrongs, on future peace
intent,

The people and the princes, with one
mind,

105 From all parts move against the general foe:

One act of justice, one atoning blow.
One execrable head laid low.

Even yet, O France! averts thy punishment.

Open thine eyes! too long hast thou been blind;

110 Take vengeance for thyself, and for mankind!

France! if thou lovest thine ancient
fame.

Revenge thy sufferings and thy shame!
By the bones which bleach on Jaffa's
beach;

115 By the blood which on Domingo's shore Hath clogg'd the carrion-birds with
gore;

By the flesh which gorged the wolves of Spain,

Or stiffen'd on the snowy plain Of frozen Moscow,

120 By the bodies which lie all open to the sky, Tracking from Elbe to Rhine the tyrant's flight;

By the widow's and the orphan's cry.
By the childless parent's misery:

By the lives which he hath shed,
By the ruin he hath spread;

125 By the prayers which rise for curses on his head,

Redeem, O France! thine ancient fame,
Revenge thy sufferings and thy shame,
Open thine eyes! too long hast thou been
blind;

Take vengeance for thyself, and for mankind!

130 By those horrors which the night Witness'd, when the torches' light
To the assembled murderers show'd Where the blood of Condé flow'd,
By thy murder'd Pichegru's fame.

135 By murder'd Wright, an English name.
By murder'd Palm's atrocious doom,
By murder'd Hofer's martyrdom;

Oh! by the virtuous blood thus vilely spilt.
The villain's own peculiar private guilt, 140 Open thine eyes! too long has thou been blind!

Take vengeance for thyself and for mankind!

MY DAYS AMONG THE DEAD ARE PAST

1818 1823

My days among the dead are past,
Around me I behold, Where'er these casual eyes are cast,
The mighty minds of old;
7 My never-failing friends are they,
With whom I converse day by day

With them I take delight in weal,
And seek relief in woe,
And while I understand and feel 10 How much to them I owe,
My cheeks have often been bedew'd With tears of thoughtful gratitude.

My thoughts are with the dead, with
them

- I live in long-past years,

VII. THE BEATIFICATION

- When the Spirit withdrew, the Monarch¹ around the assembly Looked, but none else came forth, and he heard the voice of the Angel,— “King of England! speak for thyself, here is none to arraign thee.” “Father,” he replied, “from whom no secrets are hidden, 5 What should I say? Thou knowest that mine was an arduous station, Full of cares, and with perils beset. How heavy the burden, Thou alone canst tell! Short-sighted and frail hast Thou made us; And Thy judgments who can abide? But, as surely Thou knowest
The desire of my heart hath been alway
the good of my people, 10 Pardon my errors, O Lord! and in mercy accept the intention As in Thee I have trusted, so let me not now be confounded.”

- Bending forward, he spake with earnest humility. “Well done, Good and faithful servant!” then said a Voice from the Brightness, “Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.”²
The ministering Spirits 15 Clapped their pennons therewith, and from that whole army of Angel-Songs of thanksgiving and joy resounded, and loud hallelujahs;
While, on the wings of Winds upraised, the pavilion of splendor, Where inscrutable light enveloped the Holy of Holies, Moved, and was borne away, through the empyrean ascending.

- 20 Beautiful then on its hill appeared the Celestial City,
Softened, like evening suns, to a mild and bearable lustre.
Beautiful was the ether above, and the sapphire beneath us, Beautiful was its tone, to the dazzled sight as refreshing
As the fields with their lovehest green at the coming of summer, 25 When the mind is at ease, and the eye and the heart are contented.

- Then methought we approached the gate. In front of the portal, From a rock where the standard of man's redemption was planted, Issued the Well of Life, where whosoever would enter—
So it was written—must drink, and put away all that is earthly 30 Earth among its gems, its creations of art and of nature,

visible lustre,
Yet from it alone whole Heaven was

Cross, as a fountain, Flowed the Light uncreated, light allsufficing, eternal, will be forever and ever,¹ Light of light, which, if daringly gazed on, would blind an Archangel, 40 Yet the eye of weak man may behold, and beholding is strengthened, Yea, while we wander below, oppressed with our bodily burden, And in the shadow of death, this Light is in mercy vouchsafed us;

So we seek it with humble heart, and the soul that receives it Hath with it healing and strength, peace, love, and life everlasting

Thus, once on a time,

5 And moreover he task'd me

To tell him in rhyme

Anon at the word,

There first came one daughter

And then came another,

10 To second and third

The request of their brother,

And to hear how the water

Comes down at Lodore,

With its rush and its roar,

They had seen it before

So I told them in rhyme,

For of rhymes I had store

And 'twas in my vocation

From THE LIFE OF NELSON
1808-13 1813

THE BATTLE OF TRAFALGAR

Unremitting exertions were made to equip the ships which he had chosen,¹ and especially to refit the Victory, which was once more to bear his flag. Before he left London he called at his upholsterer's, where the coffin which Captain Hallowell had given him was deposited, and desired that its history¹ might be engraven upon the lid, saying it was highly probable he might want it on his return. He seemed, indeed, to have been impressed with an expectation that he should fall in the battle. In a letter to his brother, written immediately after his return,² he had said: "We must not talk of Sir Robert Calder's battle³. I might not have done so much with my small force. If I had fallen in with them, you might probably have been a lord before I wished, for I know they meant to make a dead set at the Victory." Nelson had once regarded the prospect of death with gloomy satisfaction; it was when he anticipated the upbraids of his wife and the displeasure of his venerable father.⁴ The state of his feelings now was expressed in his private journal in these words: "Friday night (Sept. 13th), at half-past ten, I drove from dear, dear Merton, where I left all which I hold dear in this world, to go to serve my king and country. May the great God whom I adore enable me to fulfil the expectations of my country! And if it is His good pleasure that I should return, my thanks will never cease being offered up to the throne of His mercy. If it is His good providence to cut short my days upon earth, I bow with the greatest submission, relying that He will protect those so dear to me, whom I may leave behind! His will be done! Amen! Amen! Amen!"

Early on the following morning he reached Portsmouth; and, having despatched his business on shore, endeavored to elude the populace by taking a byway to the beach; but a crowd collected in his train, pressing forward to obtain a sight of his face;—many were in tears, and many knelt down before him, and blessed him as he passed. England has had many heroes, but never one who so entirely possessed the love of his fellow-countrymen as Nelson. All men knew that his heart was as humane as it was fearless; that there was not in his nature the slightest alloy of selfishness or cupidity, but that, with perfect and entire devotion, he served his country with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his strength;¹ and, therefore, they loved him as truly and as fervently as he loved England. They pressed upon the parapet to gaze after him when his barge pushed off, and he was returning their cheers by waving his hat. The sentinels, who endeavored to prevent them from trespassing upon this ground, were wedged among the crowd; and an officer, who, not very prudently upon such an occasion, ordered them to drive the people down with their bayonets, was compelled speedily to retreat; for the people would not be debarred from gazing, till the last moment, upon the hero, the darling hero of England.

About half-past nine in the morning of the 19th, the Mars, being the nearest to the fleet of the ships which formed the line of communication with the frigates in shore, repeated the signal that the enemy were coming out of port.² The wind was at this time very light, with partial breezes, mostly from the S S W. Nelson ordered the signal to be made for a chase in the south-east quarter. About two, the repeating ships announced that the enemy were at sea. All night the British fleet continued under all sail, steering to the south-east. At daybreak³ they were in the entrance of the Straits,⁴ but the enemy were not in sight. About seven, one of the frigates made signal that the enemy were bearing north. Upon this the Victory hove-to, and shortly afterwards Nelson made sail again to the northward. In the afternoon the wind blew fresh from the south-west, and the English began to fear that the foe might be forced to return to port.

A little before sunset, however, Blackwood, in the Euryalus, telegraphed that they appeared determined to go to the westward. "And that," said the Admiral in his diary, "they shall not do, if it is in the power of Nelson and Bronte to prevent them." Nelson had signified to Blackwood that he depended upon him to keep sight of the enemy. They were observed so well that all their motions were made known to him, and, as they wore twice, he inferred that they were aiming to keep the port of Cadiz open, and would retreat there as soon as they saw the British fleet; for this reason he was very careful not to approach near enough to be seen by them during the night. At daybreak the combined fleets were distinctly seen from the Victory's deck, formed in a close line of battle ahead, on the starboard tack, about twelve miles to leeward, and standing to the south. Our fleet consisted of twenty-seven sail of the line¹ and four frigates; theirs of thirty-three and seven large frigates. Their superiority was greater in size and weight of metal than in numbers. They had four thousand troops on board; and the best riflemen who could be procured, many of them Tyrolese, were dispersed through the ships. Little did the Tyrolese, and little did the Spaniards at that day, imagine what horrors the wicked tyrant whom they served was preparing for their country.²

Soon after daylight Nelson came upon deck. The 21st of October was a festival in his family, because on that day his uncle, Captain Suckling, in the Dreadnought, with two other line-of-battle ships, had beaten off a French squadron of four sail of the line and three frigates. Nelson, with that sort of superstition from which few persons are entirely exempt, had more than once expressed his persuasion that this was to be the day of his battle also, and he was well pleased at seeing his prediction about to be verified. The wind was now from the west,—light breezes, with a long heavy swell. Signal was made to bear down upon the enemy in two lines; and the fleet set all sail. Collingwood, in the Royal Sovereign, led the lee-line of thirteen ships; the Victory led the weather-line of fourteen. Having seen that all was as it should be, Nelson retired to his cabin, and wrote this prayer:—

"May the Great God, whom I worship, grant to my country, and for the benefit of Europe in general, a great and glorious victory; and may no misconduct in any one tarnish it; and may humanity after victory be the predominant feature in the British fleet. For myself individually, I commit my life to Him that made me, and may His blessing alight on my endeavors for serving my country faithfully! To Him I resign myself, and the just cause which is intrusted to me to defend. Amen, Amen. Amen."

Blackwood went on board the Victory about six. He found him in good spirits, but very calm; not in that exhilaration which he had felt upon entering into battle at Aboukir and Copenhagen, he knew that his own life would be particularly aimed at, and seems to have looked for death with almost as sure an expectation as for victory. His whole attention was fixed upon the enemy. They tacked to the northward, and formed their line on the larboard tack, thus bringing the shoals of Trafalgar and St Pedro under the lee of the British, and keeping the port of Cadiz open for themselves. This was judiciously done, and Nelson, aware of all the advantages which it gave them, made signal to prepare to anchor.

Villeneuve was a skilful seaman, worthy of serving a better master and a better cause. His plan of defence was as well conceived, and as original, as the plan of attack. He formed the fleet in a double line, every alternate ship being about a cable's length¹ to windward of her second ahead and astern. Nelson, certain of a triumphant issue to the day, asked Blackwood what he should consider as a victory. That officer answered that, considering the handsome way in which battle was offered by the enemy, their apparent determination for a fair trial of strength, and the situation of the land, he thought it would be a glorious result if fourteen were captured. He replied, "I shall not be satisfied with less than twenty." Soon afterwards he asked him if he did not think there was a signal wanting. Captain Blackwood made answer that he thought the whole fleet seemed very clearly to understand what they were about. These words were scarcely spoken before that signal was made which will be remembered as long as the language or even the memory of England shall endure—Nelson's last signal. "ENGLAND EXPECTS EVERY MAN TO DO HIS DUTY!" It was received throughout the fleet with a shout of answering acclamation, made sublime by the spirit which it breathed and the feeling which it expressed. "Now," said Lord Nelson, "I can do no more. We must trust to the great Disposer of all events and the justice of our cause. I thank God for this great opportunity of doing my duty."

He wore that day, as usual, his Admiral's frock-coat, bearing on the left breast four stars of the different orders with which he was invested. Ornaments which rendered him so conspicuous a mark for the enemy were beheld with ominous apprehensions by his officers. It was known that there were riflemen on board the French ships, and it could not be doubted but that his life would be particularly aimed at. They communicated their fears to each other, and the surgeon, Mr. Beatty, spoke to the chaplain, Dr. Scott, and to Mr. Scott, the public secretary, desiring that some person would entreat him to change his dress or cover the stars, but they knew that such a request would highly displease him. "In honor I gained them," he had said when such a thing had been hinted to him formerly, "and in honor I will die with them." Mr. Beatty, however, would not have been deterred by any fear of exciting his displeasure from speaking to him himself upon a subject in which the weal of England, as well as the life of Nelson, was concerned; but he was ordered from the deck before he could find an opportunity. This was a point upon which Nelson's officers knew that it was hopeless to remonstrate or reason with him; but both Blackwood and his own captain, Hardy, represented to him how advantageous to the fleet it would be for him to keep out of action as long as possible, and he consented at last to let the Levathan and the Téméraire, which were sailing abreast of the Victory, be ordered to pass ahead. Yet even here the last infirmity of this noble mind¹ was indulged; for these ships could not pass ahead if the Victory continued to carry all her sail; and so far was Nelson from shortening sail, that it was evident he took pleasure in pressing on, and rendering it impossible for them to obey his own orders. A long swell was setting into the Bay of Cadiz: our ships, crowding all sail, moved majestically before it, with light winds from the south-west. The sun shone on the sails of the enemy; and their well-formed line, with their numerous three-deckers, made an appearance which any other assailants would have thought formidable; but the British sailors only admired the beauty and the splendor of the spectacle; and, in full confidence of winning what they saw, remarked to each other, what a fine sight yonder ships would make at Spithead!

The French admiral, from the Bucan-tawre, beheld the new manner in which his enemy was advancing, Nelson and Collingwood each leading his line; and, pointing them out to his officers, he is said to have exclaimed that such conduct could not fail to be successful. Yet Villeneuve had made his own dispositions with the utmost skill, and the fleets under his command waited for the attack with perfect coolness. Ten minutes before twelve they opened their fire. Eight or nine of the ships immediately ahead of the Victory, and across her bows, fired single guns at her, to ascertain whether she was yet within their range. As soon as Nelson perceived that their shot passed over him, he desired Blackwood and Captain Prowse, of the Sirius, to repair to their respective frigates, and on their way to tell all the captains of the line-of-battle ships that he depended on their exertions, and that, if by the prescribed mode of attack they found it impracticable to get into action immediately, they might adopt whatever they thought best, provided it led them quickly and closely alongside an enemy. As they were standing on the front of the poop, Blackwood took him by the hand, saying he hoped soon to return and find him in possession of twenty prizes. He replied, "God bless you, Blackwood; I shall never see you again."

Nelson's column was steered about two points more to the north than Collingwood's, in order to cut off the enemy's escape into Cadiz. The lee line, therefore, was first engaged. "See," cried Nelson, pointing to the Royal Sovereign, as she steered right for the centre of the enemy's line, cut through it astern of the Santa Anna, three-decker, and engaged her at the muzzle of her guns on the starboard side. "see how that noble fellow Collingwood carries his ship into action!" Collingwood, delighted at being first in the heat of the fire, and knowing the feelings of his Commander and old friend, turned to his captain and exclaimed, "Rotherham, what would Nelson give to be here!" Both these brave officers perhaps at this moment thought of Nelson with gratitude for a circumstance which had occurred on the preceding day. Admiral Collingwood, with some of the captains, having gone on board the Victory to receive instructions, Nelson inquired of him where his captain was, and was told in reply that they were not upon good terms with each other. "Terms!" said Nelson, "good terms with each other!" Immediately he sent a boat for Captain Rotherham, led him, as soon as he arrived, to Collingwood, and saying, "Look, yonder are the enemy!" bade them shake hands like Englishmen.

The enemy continued to fire a gun at a time at the Victory till they saw that a shot had passed through her main-topgallant sail; then they opened their broadsides, aiming chiefly at her rigging, in the hope of disabling her before she could close with them. Nelson, as usual, had hoisted several flags, lest one should be shot away. The enemy showed no colors till late in the action, when they began to feel the necessity of having them to strike. For this reason the Santissima Trinidad—Nelson's old acquaintance, as he used to call her—was distinguishable only by her four decks, and to the bow of this opponent he ordered the Victory to be steered. Meantime an incessant raking fire was kept up upon the Victory. The admiral's secretary was one of the first who fell: he was killed by a cannon-shot, while conversing with Hardy. Captain Adair, of the marines, with the help of a sailor, endeavored to remove the body from Nelson's sight, who had a great regard for Mr. Scott; but he anxiously asked, "Is that poor Scott that's gone?" and being informed that it was indeed so, exclaimed, "Poor fellow!" Presently a double-headed shot struck a party of marines, who were drawn up on the poop, and killed eight of them: upon which Nelson immediately desired Captain Adair to disperse his men round the ship, that they might not suffer so much from being together. A few minutes afterwards a shot struck the forebrace bits on the quarter-deck, and passed between Nelson and Hardy, a splinter from the bit tearing off Hardy's buckle and bruising his foot. Both stopped, and looked anxiously at each other, each supposing the other to be wounded. Nelson then smiled, and said, "This is too warm work, Hardy, to last long."

The Victory had not yet returned a single gun: fifty of her men had been by this time killed or wounded, and her main-topmast, with all her studding sails and their booms, shot away. Nelson declared that, in all his battles, he had seen nothing which surpassed the cool courage of his crew on this occasion. At four minutes after twelve she opened her fire from both sides of her deck. It was not possible to break the enemy's line without running on board one of their ships: Hardy informed him of this, and asked which he would prefer. Nelson replied: "Take your choice, Hardy, it does not signify much." The master was then ordered to put the helm to port, and the Victory ran on board the Redoubtable, just as her tiller ropes were shot away. The French ship received her with a broadside, then instantly let down her lower-deck ports for fear of being boarded through them, and never afterwards fired a great gun during the action. Her tops, like those of all the enemy's ships, were filled with riflemen. Nelson never placed musketry in his tops; he had a strong dislike to the practice, not merely because it endangers setting fire to the sails, but also because it is a murderous sort of warfare, by which individuals may suffer, and a commander now and then be picked off, but which never can decide the fate of a general engagement.

Captain Harvey, in the Téméraire, fell on board the Redoubtable on the other side, another enemy was in like manner on board the Téméraire; so that these four ships formed as compact a tier as if they had been moored together, their heads all lying the same way. The lieutenants of the Victory, seeing this, depressed their guns of the middle and lower decks, and fired with a diminished charge, lest the shot should pass through and injure the Téméraire, and because there was danger that the Redoubtable might take fire from the lower-deck guns, the muzzles of which touched her side when they were run out, the fireman of each gun stood ready with a bucket of water, which, as soon as the gun was discharged, he dashed into the hole made by the shot. An incessant fire was kept up from the Victory from both sides; her larboard guns playing upon the Bucinaure and the huge Santissima Trinidad.

It had been part of Nelson's prayer that the British fleet might be distinguished by humanity in the victory which he expected. Setting an example himself, he twice gave orders to cease firing upon the Redoubtable, supposing that she had struck, because her great guns were silent; for, as she carried no flag, there was no means of instantly ascertaining the fact. From this ship, which he had thus twice spared, he received his death. A ball fired from her mizzen-top, which, in the then situation of the two vessels, was not more than fifteen yards from that part of the deck where he was standing, struck the epaulette on his left shoulder,—about a quarter after one, just in the heat of the action. He fell upon his face, on the spot which was covered with his poor secretary's blood. Hardy, who was a few steps from him, turning round, saw three men raising him up. "They have done for me at last, Hardy," said he. "I hope not!" cried Hardy. "Yes," he replied; "my back bone is shot through." Yet even now, not for a moment losing his presence of mind, he observed, as they were carrying him down the ladder, that the tiller ropes, which had been shot away, were not yet replaced, and ordered that new ones should be rove immediately—then, that he might not be seen by the crew, he took out his handkerchief, and covered his face and his stars.—Had he but concealed these badges of honor from the enemy, England, perhaps, would not have had cause to receive with sorrow the news of the battle of Trafalgar.

The cockpit was crowded with wounded and dying men, over whose bodies he was with some difficulty conveyed, and laid upon a pallet in the midshipmen's berth. It was soon perceived, upon examination, that the wound was mortal. This, however, was concealed from all, except Captain Hardy, the chaplain, and the medical attendants. He himself being certain, from the sensation in his back, and the gush of blood which he felt momentarily within his breast, that no human care could avail him, insisted that the surgeon should leave him, and attend to those to whom he might be useful; "for," said he, "you can do nothing for me." All that could be done was to fan him with paper, and frequently to give him lemonade to alleviate his intense thirst. He was in great pain, and expressed much anxiety for the event of the action, which now began to declare itself. As often as a ship struck, the crew of the Victory hurried, and at every lunia a visible expression of joy gleamed in the eyes and marked the countenance of the dying hero. But he became impatient to see Captain Hardy; and as that officer, though often sent for, could not leave the deck, Nelson feared that some fatal cause prevented him, and repeatedly cried: "Will no one bring Hardy to me? He must be killed! He is surely dead!" An hour and ten minutes elapsed from the time when Nelson received his wound before Hardy could come to him. They shook hands in silence; Hardy in vain struggling to suppress the feelings of that most painful and yet sublimest moment. "Well, Hardy," said Nelson, "how goes the day with us?"—"Very well," replied Hardy, "ten ships have struck, but five of the van have tacked, and show an intention to bear down upon the Victory. I have called two or three of our fresh ships round, and have no doubt of giving them a drubbing."—"I hope," said Nelson, "none of our ships have struck?" Hardy answered, "There was no fear of that." Then, and not till then, Nelson spoke of himself. "I am a dead man, Hardy," said he, "I am going fast; it will be all over with me soon. Come nearer to me. Let my dear Lady Hamilton have my hair and all other things belonging to me." Hardy observed that he hoped Mr. Beatty could yet hold out some prospect of life. "Oh no!" he replied, "it is impossible, my back is shot through. Beatty will tell you so." Captain Hardy then once more shook hands with him, and with a heart almost bursting hastened upon deck.

By this time all feeling below the breast was gone; and Nelson, having made the surgeon ascertain this, said to him: "You know I am gone. I know it. I feel something rising in my breast"—putting his hand on his left side—"which tells me so." And upon Beatty's inquiring whether his pain was very great, he replied, "So great that he wished he was dead. Yet," said he in a lower voice, "one would like to live a little longer too!" And after a few minutes, in the same under-tone, he added: "What would become of poor Lady Hamilton if she knew my situation?" Next to his country she occupied his thoughts. Captain Hardy, some fifty minutes after he had left the cockpit, returned, and again taking the hand of his dying friend and Commander, congratulated him on having gained a complete victory. How many of the enemy were taken he did not know, as it was impossible to perceive them distinctly, but fourteen or fifteen at least. "That's well!" cried Nelson, "but I bargained for twenty." And then in a stronger voice he said: "Anchor, Hardy, anchor." Hardy upon this hinted that Admiral Collingwood would take upon himself the direction of affairs. "Not while I live, Hardy," said the dying Nelson, ineffectually endeavoring to raise himself from the bed. "Do you anchor." His previous order for preparing to anchor had shown how clearly he foresaw the necessity of this. Presently, calling Hardy back, he said to him, in a low voice, "Don't throw me overboard"; and he desired that he might be buried by his parents, unless it should please the king to order otherwise. Then, reverting to private feelings: "Take care of my dear Lady Hamilton, Hardy; take care of poor Lady Hamilton.—Kiss me, Hardy," said he. Hardy knelt down, and kissed his cheek; and Nelson said, "Now I am satisfied. Thank God, I have done my duty." Hardy stood over him in silence for a moment or two, then knelt again, and kissed his forehead. "Who is that?" said Nelson; and being informed, he replied, "God bless you, Hardy." And Hardy then left him—forever.

Nelson now desired to be turned upon his right side, and said: "I wish I had not left the deck; for I shall soon be gone." Death was, indeed, rapidly approaching. He said to the chaplain: "Doctor, I have not been a great sinner"; and, after a short pause, "Remember that I leave Lady Hamilton, and my daughter, Horatia, as a legacy to my country." His articulation now became difficult; but he was distinctly heard to say, "Thank God, I have done my duty!" These words he had repeatedly pronounced, and they were the last words he uttered. He expired at thirty minutes after four,—three hours and a quarter after he had received his wound.

Once, amidst his sufferings, Nelson had expressed a wish that he were dead; but immediately the spirit subdued the pains of death, and he wished to live a little longer; doubtless that he might hear the completion of the victory which he had seen so gloriously begun. That consolation—that joy—that triumph, was afforded him. He lived to know that the victory was decisive; and the last guns which were fired at the flying enemy were heard a minute or two before he expired.

It is almost superfluous to add that all the honors which a grateful country could bestow were heaped upon the memory of Nelson. His brother was made an earl, with a grant of £6,000 per year; £10,000 were voted to each of his sisters; and £100,000 for the purchase of an estate. A public funeral was decreed, and a public monument. Statues and monuments also were voted by most of our principal cities. The leaden coffin, in which he was brought home, was cut in pieces, which were distributed as relics of Saint Nelson,—so the gunner of the Victory called them,—and when, at his interment, his flag was about to be lowered into the grave, the sailors who assisted at the ceremony, with one accord rent it in pieces, that each might preserve a fragment while he lived.

The death of Nelson was felt in England as something more than a public calamity: men started at the intelligence, and turned pale, as if they had heard of the loss of a dear friend. An object of our admiration and affection, of our pride and of our hopes, was suddenly taken from us; and it seemed as if we had never, till then, known how deeply we loved and revered him. What the country had lost in its great naval hero—the greatest of our own, and of all former times—was scarcely taken into the account of grief. So perfectly, indeed, had he performed his part, that the maritime war, after the battle of Trafalgar, was considered at an end; the fleets of the enemy were not merely defeated, but destroyed; new navies must be built, and a new race of seamen reared for them, before the possibility of their invading our shores could again be contemplated. It was not, therefore, from any selfish reflection upon the magnitude of our loss that we mourned for him the general sorrow was of a higher character. The people of England grieved that funeral ceremonies, public monuments, and posthumous rewards, were all which they could now bestow upon him, whom the king, the legislature, and the nation, would alike have delighted to honor, whom every tongue would have blessed; whose presence in every village through which he might have passed would have wakened the church bells, have given school-boys a holiday, have drawn children from their sports to gaze upon him, and “old men from the chimney corner,”¹ to look upon Nelson ere they died. The victory of Trafalgar was celebrated, indeed, with the usual forms of rejoicing, but they were without joy, for such already was the glory of the British navy, through Nelson’s surpassing genius, that it scarcely seemed to receive any addition from the most signal victory that ever was achieved upon the seas, and the destruction of this mighty fleet, by which all the maritime schemes of France were totally frustrated, hardly appeared to add to our security or strength; for while Nelson was living, to watch the combined squadrons of the enemy, we felt ourselves as secure as now, when they were no longer in existence.

There was reason to suppose, from the appearances upon opening the body, that in the course of nature he might have attained, like his father, to a good old age.

Yet he cannot be said to have fallen prematurely whose work was done, nor ought he to be lamented who died so full of honors and at the height of human fame. The most triumphant death is that of the martyr; the most awful that of the martyred patriot, the most splendid that of the hero in the hour of victory, and if the chariot and the horses of fire had been vouchsafed for Nelson’s translation,¹ he could scarcely have departed in a brighter blaze of glory. He has left us, not indeed his mantle of inspiration,² but a name and an example which are at this hour inspiring thousands of the youth of England—a name which is our pride, and an example which will continue to be our shield and our strength. Thus it is that the spirits of the great and the wise continue to live and to act after them, verifying in this sense the language of the old mythologist

THE PLEASURES OF HOPE

1796-99

1799

From PART I

At summer eve, when Heaven’s ethereal
bow
Spans with bright arch the glittering hills
below,
Why to yon mountain turns the musing
eye,
Whose sunbright summit mingles with the
sky?
Why do those cliffs of shadowy tint
appear
More sweet than all the landscape smiling
near?
’Tis distance lends enchantment to the
view,
And robes the mountain in its azure hue.
Thus, with delight, we linger to survey
The promised joys of life’s unmeasured
way,
Thus, from afar, each dim-discover’d
scene
More pleasing seems than all the past hath been,
And every form, that Fancy can repair
From dark oblivion, glows divinely there.

¹ As they had been for Elijah (2 Kings, 2:11-13).

² Which Elijah left for Elisha (2 Kings, 2:8, 13, 35).

³ Shining spirits there are, that dwell upon earth among mortals Prompting illustrious deeds, and fulfilling the counsels of Zeus
—Hesiod, The Works and Days 122

- 15 What potent spirit guides the raptured eye
 To pierce the shades of dim futurity?
 Can Wisdom lend, with all her heavenly power,
 The pledge of Joy's anticipated hour?
 Ah, no! she darkly sees the fate of man—20 Her dim horizon bounded to a span;
 Or, if she hold an image to the view,
 'Tis Nature pictured too severely true.
 With thee, sweet Hope! resides the heavenly light,
 That pours remotest rapture on the sight 25 Thine is the charm of life's bewilder'd way,
 That calls each slumbering passion into play.
 Waked by thy touch, I see the sister band.
 On tiptoe watching, start at thy command,
 And fly where'er thy mandate bids them steer, 30 To Pleasure's path or Glory's bright career Primeval Hope, the Aonian Muses say,
 When Man and Nature mourn'd their first decay,
 When every form of death, and every woe,
 Shot from malignant stars to earth below, 35 When Murder bared her arm, and rampant War Yoked the red dragons of her iron car,
 When Peace and Mercy, banish'd from the plain, Sprung on the viewless winds to Heaven again;
 All, all forsook the friendless, guilty mind.
 40 But Hope, the charmer, linger'd still behind¹

 Where barbarous hordes on Scythian mountains roam, 340 Truth, Mercy, Freedom, yet shall find a home; Where'er degraded Nature bleeds and pines,
 From Guinea's coast to Sibir's dreary mines, Truth shall pervade th' unfathom'd darkness there,
 And light the dreadful features of Despair.— 345 Hark! the stern captive spurns his heavy load,
 And asks the image back that Heaven bestow'd!
 Fiercer in his eye the fire of valor burns,
 And, as the slave departs, the man returns.
 Oh! sacred Truth! thy triumph ceased a while, 350 And Hope, thy sister, ceased with thee to smile, When leagued Oppression¹ pour'd to Northern wars Her whiskered pandours and her fierce hussars,² Waved her dread standard to the breeze of morn, Peal'd her loud drum, and twang'd her trumpet horn; 355 Tumultuous horror brooded o'er her van, Presaging wrath to Poland—and to man!
 Warsaw's last champion³ from her height survey'd, Wide o'er the fields, a waste of ruin laid,— "Oh! Heaven!" he cried, "my bleeding country save!"— 360 Is there no hand on high to shield the brave?
 Yet, though destruction sweep those lovely plains, Rise, fellow-men! our country yet remains!
 By that dread name, we wave the sword on high!
 And swear for her to live!—with her to die!"
 365 He said, and on the rampart-heights array'd His trusty warriors, few, but undismay'd.
 Firm-paced and slow, a horrid front they form,
 Still as the breeze, but dreadful as the storm;
 Low murmuring sounds along their banners fly, 370 Revenge, or death,—the watchword and reply;
 Then peal'd the notes, omnipotent to charm,
 And the loud tocsin toll'd their last alarm!
 In vain, alas! in vain, ye gallant few!
 From rank to rank your volley'd thunder flew.— 375 Oh, bloodiest picture in the book of Time,

¹ In 1792 and 1794 when Russia, Prussia, and Austria united in wars for the partition of Poland.

² The pandours were members of a regiment in the Austrian army, noted for its courage and cruelty. The hussars were light cavalrymen.

³ Thaddeus Kosciuszko, he was defeated and taken prisoner, Oct 10, 1794

Sarmatia fell, unwept, without a crime, Found not a generous friend, a pitying foe,
 Strength in her arms, nor mercy in her woe!
 Dropp'd from her nerveless grasp the shatter'd spear.
 380 Closed her bright eye, and curb'd her high career,—
 Hope, for a season, bade the world farewell,
 And Freedom shudd'rd as Kosciuszko fell!
 The sun went down, nor ceased the carnage there,
 Tumultuous Murder shook the midnight
 air—385 On Prague's proud arch the fires of ruin
 glow,
 His blood-dyed waters murmuring far below,
 The storm prevails, the rampart yields a
 way,
 Bursts the wild cry of horror and dismay!
 Hark, as the smouldering piles with thunder fall, 390 A thousand shrieks for hopeless mercy call!
 Earth shook—red meteors flash'd along
 the sky,
 And conscious Nature shudder'd at the cry!
 Oh! righteous Heaven; ere Freedom found a grave,
 Why slept the sword, omnipotent to save?
 395 Where was thine arm, O Vengeance!
 where thy rod,
 That smote the foes of Zion and of God,¹ That crush'd proud Ammon, when his iron ear
 Was yoked in wiath, and thunder'd from afar?²
 Where was the storm that shudder'd till the host 400 Of blood-stain'd Pharaoh left their trembling coast,
 Then bade the deep in wild commotion flow,
 And heaved an ocean on their match below?³
 Departed spirits of the mighty dead!
 Ye that at Marathon and Leuctra bled!
 405 Friends of the world! restore your swords to man,
 Fight in his sacred cause, and lead the van!
 Yet for Sarmatia's tears of blood atone,
 And make her arm puissant as your own!
 Oh! once again to Freedom's cause return 410 The patriot Tell—the Bruce of Bannockburn!
 Yes! thy proud lords, unpitied land, shall see

That man hath yet a soul—and dare be
 free!
 A little while, along thy saddening plains
 The starless night of Desolation reigns, 415 Truth shall restore the light by Nature
 given,
 And, like Prometheus, bring the fire of Heaven!
 Pione to the dust Oppression shall be hurl'd,
 Her name, her nature, wither'd from the
 world!

YE MARINERS OF ENGLAND

A NAVAL ODE 1799-1800 1801

Ye mariners of England,
 That guard our native seas,
 Whose flag has brav'd, a thousand years—
 The battle and the breeze!
 5 Your glorious standard launch again
 To match another foe,¹
 And sweep through the deep,
 While the stormy winds do blow,
 While the battle rages loud and long,
 10 And the stormy winds do blow.

The spirits of your fathers Shall start from every wave!
 For the deck it was their field of fame,
 And Ocean was their grave 15 Where Blake and mighty Nelson fell, Your manly hearts shall glow,
 As ye sweep through the deep,
 While the stormy winds do blow,
 While the battle rages loud and long,
 20 And the stormy winds do blow.

Britannia needs no bulwarks,
 No towers along the steep,
 Her march is o'er the mountain-waves,
 Her home is on the deep.
 25 With thunders from her native oak,
 She quells the floods below,
 As they roar on the shore,
 When the stormy winds do blow;
 When the battle rages loud and long,
 30 And the stormy winds do blow.

The meteor flag of England
 Shall yet terrific burn, Till danger's troubled night depart,
 And the star of peace return 35 Then, then, ye ocean-warriors!
 Our song and feast shall flow

 (1797) and of the Nile (1798)

- To the fame of your name,
 When the storm has ceased to blow;
 When the fiery fight is heard no more, 40 And the storm has ceased to blow.

HOHENLINDEN

1802 1802

- On Linden, when the sun was low,
 All bloodless lay th' untrodden snow,
 And dark as winter was the flow
 Of Iser, rolling rapidly.
- 5 But Linden saw another sight,
 When the drum beat at dead of night,
 Commanding fires of death to light
 The darkness of her scenery
- 10 By torch and trumpet fast array'd, Each horseman drew his battle-blade.
 And furious every charger neigh'd,
 To join the dreadful revelry.
- Then shook the hills with thunder riven, Then rush'd the steed to battle driven, 15 And louder than the bolts of heaven,
 Far flash'd the red artillery

- But redder yet that light shall glow
 On Linden's hills of stained snow,
 And bloodier yet the torrent flow
 20 Of Iser, rolling rapidly

'Tis morn; but scarce yon level sun
 Can pierce the war-clouds, rolling dun, Where furious Frank and fiery Hun, Shout in their sulphurous canopy

- 25 The combat deepens On, ye brave,
 Who rush to glory, or the grave!
 Wave, Munich! all thy banners wave.
 And charge with all thy chivalry!

- Few, few, shall part where many meet!
 30 The snow shall be their winding-sheet.
 And every turf beneath their feet Shall be a soldier's sepulchre

LOCHIEL'S WARNING

1802 1802

WIZARD

Lochiel, Lochiel! beware of the day When the lowlands shall meet thee in battle array!
 For a field of the dead rushes red on my
 sight,
 And the clans of Culloden are scatter'd in fight.

- 5 They rally, they bleed, for their kingdom and crown;
 Woe, woe to the riders that trample them
 down!
 Proud Cumberland prances, insulting the
 slain,
 And their hoof-beaten bosoms are trod to the plain.
 But hark! through the fast-flashing lightning of war, 10 What steed to the desert flies frantic and far?
 'Tis thine, oh Glenullin! whose bride shall await,
 Like a love-lighted watch-fire, all night at the gate
 A steed comes at morning no rider is
 there,
 But its bridle is red with the sign of despair
 15 Weep, Albin! to death and captivity led!
 Oh weep, but thy tears cannot number the dead
 For a merciless sword on Culloden shall wave, Culloden! that reeks with the blood of the brave.

LOCHIEL

- No, preach to the coward, thou death-telling see!
 20 Or, if goy Culloden so dreadful appear, Draw, dotard, around thy old wavering
 sight
 This mantle, to cover the phantoms of fright

- Ha! laugh'st thou, Lochiel, my vision to scorn?
 Proud bird of the mountain, thy plume shall be torn!
 25 Say, rush'd the bold eagle exultingly
 forth,
 From his home, in the dark, rolling clouds of the north?
 Lo! the death-shot of foemen outspeeding, he rode Companionless, bearing destruction
 abroad,
 But down let him stoop from his havoc on high!
 30 Ah! home let him speed, for the spoiler
 is nigh.
 Why flames the far summit? Why shoot to the blast
 Those embers, like stars from the firmament cast?
 'Tis the fire-shower of ruin, all dread fully driven

From his eyrie, that beacons the darkness of heaven.

- 35 Oh, crested Lochiel! the peerless in might,
Whose banners arise on the battlements' height, Heaven's fire is around thee, to blast and to burn;
Return to thy dwelling! all lonely return!
For the blackness of ashes shall mark where it stood, 40 And a wild mother scream o'er her famishing brood

LOCHIEL

- False Wizard, avaunt! I have marshall'd my clan, Their swords are a thousand, their bosoms are one!
They are true to the last of their blood and their breath,
And like reapers descend to the harvest of death 15 Then welcome be Cumberland's steed to the shock!
Let him dash his proud foam like a wave on the rock!
But woe to his kindred, and woe to his cause,
When Albin her claymore¹ indignantly draws,
When her bonneted chieftains to victory crowd, 50 ('Anionald the dauntless, and Moray the proud, All plaided and plumed in their tartan² array——

WIZARD

- Lochiel, Lochiel! beware of the day;
For, dark and despairing, my sight I may seal,
But man cannot cover what God would reveal; 55 'Tis the sunset of life gives me mystical lore,
And coming events cast their shadows before.
I tell thee, Culloden's dread echoes shall ring With the bloodhounds that bark for thy fugitive king.
Lo! anointed by Heaven with the vials of wrath, 60 Behold, where he flies on his desolate path!
Now in darkness and billows, he sweeps from my sight:

¹ A large two-edged sword

² Woolen cloth checkered with narrow bands of various colors, the characteristic dress of the Highland clans

Rise, rise! ye wild tempests, and cover his flight!

- 'Tis finish'd. Their thunders are hush'd on the moors:
Culloden is lost, and my country deplores 85 But where is the iron-bound prisoner? Where?
For the red eye of battle is shut in despair Say, mounts he the ocean-wave, banish'd, forlorn, Like a limb from his country cast bleeding and torn?
Ah no! for a darker departure is near, 70 The war-drum is muffled, and black is the bier;
His death-bell is tolling—oh! mercy, dispel Yon sight, that it freezes my spirit to tell!
Life flutters convulsed in his quivering limbs,
And his blood-streaming nostril in agony swims.
75 Accursed be the fagots, that blaze at his feet, Where his heart shall be thrown, ere it ceases to beat,
With the smoke of its ashes to poison the gale——

LOCHIEL

- Down, soothless insults! I trust not the tale.
For never shall Albin a destiny meet, 80 So black with dishonor, so foul with retreat.
Tho' my perishing ranks should be strew'd in their gore,
Like ocean-weeds heap'd on the surf-beaten shore, Lochiel, untainted by flight or by chains,
While the kindling of life in his bosom remains, 85 Shall victor exult, or in death be laid low,
With his back to the field, and his feet to the foe!
And leaving in battle no blot on his name, Look proudly to Heaven from the death-bed of fame

LORD ULLIN'S DAUGHTER

1804-05 1809

A chieftain, to the Highlands bound, Cries, "Boatman, do not tarry!"
And I'll give thee a silver pound.
To row us o'er the ferry."

- 7 "Now who be ye, would cross Lochgyle, This dark and stormy water?"

"O, I'm the chief of Ulva's isle,
And this, Lord Ullin's daughter.

"And fast before her father's men 10 Three days we've fled together, For should he find us in the glen,
My blood would stain the heather

"His horsemen hard behind us ride;
Should they our steps discover, 15 Then who will cheer my bonny bride
When they have slain her lover?"

Out spoke the hardy Highland wight,
"I'll go, my chief; I'm ready.
It is not for your silver bright, 20 But for your winsome lady.

"And by my word! the bonny bird
In danger shall not tarry;
So though the waves are raging white, I'll row you o'er the ferry"

25 By this the storm grew loud apace,
The water writh¹ was shrieking.
And in the scowl of heaven each face Grew dark as they were speaking

But still as wilder blew the wind, 10 And as the night grew drearer, Adown the glen rode armed men—
Their trampling sounded nearer

"O haste thee, haste!" the lady cries,
"Though tempests round us gather, 35 I'll meet the raging of the skies,
But not an angry father."

The boat has left a stormy land,
A stormy sea before her,—
When, oh! too strong for human hand, 40 The tempest gathered o'er her

And still they row'd amidst the roar
Of waters fast prevailing.
Lord Ullin reach'd that fatal shore—
His wrath was changed to wailing 45 For so¹è disinay'd, through storm and

shade,
His child he did discover.
One lovely hand she stretch'd for aid,
And one was round her lover

"Come back! come back!" he cried in grief,
50 "Across this stormy water;
And I'll forgive your Highland chief,
My daughter! oh, my daughter!"

¹ spirit supposed to preside over the waters

'Twas vain;—the loud waves lash'd the
shore,

Return or aid preventing 55 The waters wild went o'er his child,
And he was left lamenting

BATTLE OF THE BALTIC 1804-05 1809

Of Nelson and the North,
Sing the glorious day's renown,
When to battle fierce came forth
All the might of Denmark's crown, 5 And her arms along the deep proudly shone,
By each gun and lighted brand.
In a bold determined hand,
And the Prince of all the land Led them on.

10 Like leviathans afloat,
Lay then bulwarks on the brine,
While the sign of battle flew
On the lofty British line.
It was ten of April morn by the chime 15 As they drifted on their path,
There was silence deep as death.
And the boldest held his breath,
For a tune

But the might of England flush'd 20 To anticipate the scene,
And her van the flecter rush'd O'er the deadly space between "Hearts of oak!" our captain cried, when each gun
From its adamant lip 25 Spread a death-shade round the ships,
Like the hurricane eclipse
Of the sun

Again! again! again!
And the havoc did not slack.
30 Till a feeble cheer the Dane
To our cheering sent us back,
Their shots along the deep slowly boom—
Then ceased—and all is wail,
As they strike the shatter'd sail.
15 Or in conflagration pale Light the gloom

Out spoke the victor then,
As he hail'd them o'er the wave;
"Ye are brothers! ye are men!" 40 And we conquer but to save,
So peace instead of death let us bring.
But yield, proud foe, thy fleet,
With the crews, at England's feet,
And make submission meet 45 To our King "

Then Denmark bless'd our chief,
That he gave her wounds repose,
And the sounds of joy and grief
From her people wildly rose, 50 As Death withdrew his shades from the
day

While the sun look'd smiling bright O'er a wide and woful sight,
Where the fires of funeral light Died away

55 Now joy, old England, raise!
For the tidings of thy might,
By the festal cities' blaze,
Whilst the wine-cup shines in light,
And yet amidst that joy and uproar, 60 Let us think of them that sleep,
Full many a fathom deep,
By thy wild and stormy steep, Elsmore!

Brave hearts! to Britain's pride 65 Once so faithful and so true,
On the deck of fame that died,
With the gallant good Riou, Soft sigh the winds of Heaven o'er their grave!

While the billow mournful rolls, 70 And the mermaid's song condoles, Singing glory to the souls
Of the brave!

THE LAST MAN
1823

All worldly shapes shall melt in gloom,
The Sun himself must die, Before this mortal shall assume Its immortality!

7 I saw a vision in my sleep,
That gave my spirit strength to sweep Adown the gulf of Time!
I saw the last of human mould
That shall Creation's death behold, 10 As Adam saw her prime!

The Sun's eye had a sickly glare,
The Earth with age was wan,
The skeletons of nations were Around that lonely man!

15 Some had expied in fight,—the brands Still rusted in their bony hands, In plague and famine some!
Earth's cities had no sound nor tread,
And ships were drifting with the dead 20 To shores where all was dumb!

Yet, prophet-like, that lone one stood,
With dauntless words and high,
That shook the sere leaves from the wood

As if a storm pass'd by,
-7 Saying, "We are twins in death, proud
Sun!

Thy face is cold, thy race is run,
'Tis Mercy bids thee go,
For thou ten thousand thousand years Hast seen the tide of human tears, 30 That shall no longer flow.

"What though beneath thee man put forth His pomp, his pride, his skill,
And arts that made fire, flood, and earth
The vassals of his will?

35 Yet mourn I not thy parted sway, Thou dim disowned king of day,
For all those trophied arts
And triumphs that beneath thee sprang, Heal'd not a passion or a pang 40 Entail'd on human hearts.

Go, let oblivion's curtain fall
Upon the stage of men,
Nor with thy rising beams recall Life's tragedy again
45 Its piteous pageants bring not back, Nor waken flesh, upon the rack
Of pain anew to writhe;
Stretch'd in disease's shapes abhorr'd,
Or mown in battle by the sword, 50 Like grass beneath the scythe.

Ev'n I am weary in yon skies
To watch thy fading fire, Tost of all sunless agonies,
Behold not me expire
55 My lips that speak thy dirge of death—
Their rounded gasp and gurgling breath
To see thou shalt not boast
The eclipse of Nature spreads my pall,
The majesty of Darkness shall 60 Receive my parting ghost!

This spirit shall return to Him Who gave its heavenly spark, Yet think not, Sun, it shall be dim When thou thyself art dark!
65 No! it shall live again, and shine
In bliss unknown to beams of thine.
By him recall'd to breath,
Who captive led captivity,
Who robb'd the grave of Victory.— 70 And took the sting from Death!

Go, Sun, while Mercy holds me up On Nature's awful waste To drink this last and bitter cup Of grief that man shall taste—75 Go, tell the night that hides thy face, Thou saw'st the last of Adam's race, 1 See 1 Corinthians 15:55

On Earth's sepulchral clod,
The darkening universe defy
To quench his immortality, 80 Or shake his trust in God!

THE DEATH-BOAT OF HELIGOLAND
1828

Can restlessness reach the cold sepulchred
head?
Ay, the quick have their sleep-walkers, so have the dead
There are brains, though they moulder, that dream in the tomb,
And that maddening forehear the last trumpet of doom, 5 Till their corpses start sheeted to revel on
earth,
Making horror more deep by the semblance of mirth.
By the glare of new-lighted volcanoes they dance,
Or at mid-sea appall the chill'd mariner's
glance.
Such, I wot, was the band of cadaverous
smile
10 Seen ploughing the night-surge of Heli-go's isle

The foam of the Baltic had sparkled like
fire,
And the red moon look'd down with an aspect of ire,
But her beams on a sudden grew sick-like
and gray,
And the mews¹ that had slept clang'd and shriek'd far away, 15 And the buoys and the beacons extin-guish'd their light,
As the boat of the stony-eyed dead came in sight,
High bounding from billow to billow.
each form
Had its shroud like a plaid flying loose to the storm;
With an oar in each pulseless and icy-cold
hand, 20 Fast they plough'd by the lee-shore of Heligoland,
Such breakers as boat of the living ne'er
cross'd;
Now surf-sunk for minutes again they uptoss'd;
And with livid lips shouted reply o'er the flood
To the challenging watchman, that curdled his blood: 25 "We're dead—we are bound from our graves in the west,

¹ gulls

First to Hecla, and then to——" Unmeet was the rest
For man's ear. The old abbey bell thunder'd its clang,
And their eyes gleam'd with phosphorus light as it rang.
Ere they vanish'd, they stopp'd, and gazed silently grim, 30 Till the eye could define them, garb, feature, and limb

Now who were those roamers? of gallows or wheel¹
Bore they marks, on the mangling anatomist's steel?
No, by magistrates' chains 'mid their grave-clothes you saw They were felons too proud to have per-ish'd by law:
35 But a ribbon that hung where a rope should have been,
'Twas the badge of their faction, its hue was not green, Show'd them men who had trampled and tortured and driven To rebellion the fairest Isle breathed on by Heaven,— Men whose heirs would yet finish the tyrannous task, 40 If the Truth and the Time had not dragg'd off their mask
They parted—but not till the sight might discern
A scutcheon distinct at their pinnacle's stern,
Where letters emblazon'd in blood-color'd
flame,
Named their faction—I blot not my page with its name

THOMAS MOORE (1779-1852)

THE LAKE OF THE DISMAL SWAMP

WRITTEN AT NORFOLK IN VIRGINIA
1804 1806

"They made her a grave, too cold and
damp
For a soul so warm and true;
And she's gone to the Lake of the Dismal Swamp,
Where, all night long, by a fire-fly lamp.
5 She paddles her white canoe
"And her fire-fly lamp I soon shall see,
And her paddle I soon shall hear;
Long and loving our life shall be,
And I'll hide the maid in a cypress tree.
10 When the footstep of death is near."

Away to the Dismal Swamp he speeds—
His path was rugged and sore, Through tangled juniper, beds of reeds, Through many a fen, where the serpent
feeds,

15 And man never trod before.

And when on the earth he sunk to sleep,
If slumber his eyelids knew,
He lay where the deadly vine doth weep
Its venomous tear and nightly steep

20 The flesh with blistering dew!

And near him the she-wolf stirr'd the brake,¹

And the copper-snake breath'd in his
ear,

Till he starting cried, from his dream
awake,

“Oh! when shall I see the dusky Lake,

25 And the white canoe of my dear?”

He saw the Lake, and a meteor bright

Quick over its surface play'd—

“Welcome,” he said, “my dear one's
light!”

And the dim shore echoed, for many a
night,

30 The name of the death-cold maid.

Till he hollow'd a boat of the birchen bark,
Which carried him off from shore.

Far, far he follow'd the meteor spark,
The wind was high and the clouds were
dark,

35 And the boat return'd no more.

But oft, from the Indian hunter's camp,
This lover and maid so true

Are seen at the hour of midnight damp

To cross the Lake by a fire-fly lamp,

40 And paddle their white canoe!

A CANADIAN BOAT SONG

WRITTEN ON THE RIVER ST LAWRENCE
1804 1806

Faintly as tolls the evening chime, Our voices keep tune and our oars keep
time

Soon as the woods on shore look dim, We'll sing at St Ann's our parting hymn

5 Row, brothers, row, the stream runs fast, The rapids are near and the daylight's
past.

Why should we yet our sail unfurl?
There is not a breath the blue wave to curl;

But, when the wind blows off the shore,

¹ thicket

10 Oh! sweetly we'll rest our weary oar.
Blow, breezes, blow, the stream runs fast,
The rapids are near and the daylight's
past.

Utawas' tide! this trembling moon
Shall see us float over thy surges soon

15 Saint of this green isle! hear our prayers, Oh, grant us cool heavens and favoring airs.

Blow, breezes, blow, the stream runs fast,
The rapids are near and the daylight's
past.

From IRISH MELODIES

1807-28 1808-34

OH, BREATHE NOT HIS NAME!

Oh, breathe not his name! let it sleep in
the shade,

Where cold and unhonored his relics are
laid;

Sad, silent, and dark be the tears that we
shed,

As the night-dew that falls on the grass o'er his head.

5 But the night-dew that falls, though in silence it weeps,

Shall brighten with verdure the grave where he sleeps,

And the tear that we shed, though in secret it rolls,

Shall long keep his memory green in our souls.

WHEN HE WHO ADORES THEE

When he who adores thee has left but the name

Of his fault and his sorrows behind, Oh! say wilt thou weep, when they darken the fame

Of a life that for thee was resign'd?

5 Yes, weep, and however my foes may condemn,

Thy tears shall efface their decree, For Heaven can witness, though guilty to
them,

I have been but too faithful to thee

With thee were the dreams of my earliest
love,

10 Every thought of my reason was thine;
In my last humble prayer to the Spirit
above,

Thy name shall be mingled with mine.

Oh! blest are the lovers and friends who shall live

The days of thy glory to see;

15 But the next dearest blessing that Heaven can give

Is the pride of thus dying for thee

THE HARP THAT ONCE THROUGH TARA'S HALLS

The harp that once through Tara's halls
The soul of music shed,
Now hangs as mute on Tara's walls
As if that soul were fled.
5 So sleeps the pride of former days,
So glory's thrill is o'er,
And hearts that once beat high for praise
Now feel that pulse no more!
No more to chiefs and ladies bright 10 The harp of Tara swells,
The chord alone that breaks at night
Its tale of ruin tells.
Thus Freedom now so seldom wakes,
The only throb she gives 15 Is when some heart indignant breaks,
To show that still she lives

OH! BLAME NOT THE BARD

Oh! blame not the bard, if he fly to the
bowers,
Where Pleasure lies, carelessly smiling at Fame;
He was born for much more, and in happier hours
His soul might have burn'd with a holier flame
5 The string, that now languishes loose o'er
the lyre,
Might have bent a proud bow to the warrior's dart,
And the lip, which now breathes but the song of desire,
Might have pour'd the full tide of a patriot's heart.
But alas for his country!—her pride is gone by,
10 And that spirit is broken, which never would bend,
O'er the ruin her children in secret must sigh,
For 'tis treason to love her, and death to defend Unpriz'd are her sons, till they've learn'd to betray,
Undistinguish'd they live, if they shame not their sires;
15 And the torch, that would light them thro' dignity's way, Must be caught from the pile, where their country expires.
Then blame not the bard, if in pleasure's soft dream,
He should try to forget what he never can heal:

Oh! give but a hope—let a vista but gleam

20 Through the gloom of his country, and mark how he'll feel!
That instant, his heart at her shrine would lay down
Every passion it nurs'd, every bliss it ador'd;
While the myrtle, now idly entwin'd with his crown,
Like the wreath of Harmodius, should cover his sword

25 But tho' glory be gone, and tho' hope fade away,
Thy name, lov'd Ern, shall live in his songs,
Not ev'n in the hour, when his heart is most gay,
Will he lose the resemblance of thee and thy wrongs.
The stranger shall hear thy lament on his plains,
30 The sigh of thy harp shall be sent o'er the deep,
Till thy masters themselves, as they rivet thy chains,
Shall pause at the song of their captive, and weep.

LESBIA HATH A BEAMING EYE

Lesbia hath a beaming eye,
But no one knows for whom it beameth,
Right and left its arrows fly,
But what they aim at no one dreameth 5 Sweeter 'tis to gaze upon My Nora's lid that seldom rises;
Few its looks, but every one,
Like unexpected light, surprises!
Oh, my Nora Creina,¹ dear, 10 My gentle, bashful Nora Creina, Beauty lies
In many eyes,
But Love in yours, my Nora Creina.
Lesbia wears a robe of gold, 15 But all so close the nymph hath lac'd it,
Not a charm of beauty's mould Presumes to stay where nature plac'd it.
Oh! my Nora's gown for me,
That floats as wild as mountain breezes, 20 Leaving every beauty free To sink or swell as Heaven pleases.
Yes, my Nora Creina, dear,
My simple, graceful Nora Creina, Nature's dress
25 Is loveliness—
The dress you wear, my Nora Creina.
¹ darling

Lesbia, hath a wit refin'd,
But, when its points are gleaming round
us,

Who can tell if they're design'd 10 To dazzle merely, or to wound us?
Pillow'd on my Nora's heart,
In safer slumber Love reposes—Bed of peace! whose roughest part Is but the crumpling of the roses 31 Oh! my Nora Creina, dear,
My mild, my artless Nora Creina!
Wit, though bright,
Hath no such light,
As warms your eyes, my Nora Creina

THE YOUNG MAY MOON

The young May moon is beaming, love,
The glow-worm's lamp is gleaming, love,
How sweet to rove
Through Morna's grove,
7 When the drowsy world is dreaming, love!
Then awake!—the heavens look bright,
my dear,
'Tis never too late for delight, my dear.
And the best of all ways
To lengthen our days, 10 Is to steal a few hours from the night, my
dear!

Now all the world is sleeping, love,
But the sage, his star-watch keeping, love,
And I, whose star,
More glorious far,
15 Is the eye from that casement peeping.
love
Then awake!—till rise of sun, my dear,
The sage's glass we'll shun, my dear.
Or, in watching the flight Of bodies of light, 20 He might happen to take thee for one,
my dear

THE MINSTREL BOY

The Minstrel Boy to the war is gone,
In the ranks of death you'll find him.
His father's sword he has girded on,
And his wild harp slung behind him—5 "Land of song!" said the warrior-bard,
"Though all the world betray thee,
One sword, at least, thy rights shall guard,
One faithful harp shall praise thee!"

The Minstrel fell!—but the foeman's chain 10 Could not bring his proud soul under;
The harp he lov'd ne'er spoke again,
For he tore its chords asunder;

And said, "No chains shall sully thee, Thou soul of love and bravery!
15 Thy songs were made for the pure and
free,
They shall never sound in slavery!"

FAREWELL!—BUT WHENEVER YOU WELCOME
THE HOUR

Farewell!—but whenever you welcome the
hour
That awakens the night-song of mirth in your bowel,
Then think of the friend who once welcom'd it too,
And forgot his own griefs to be happy with you 5 His griefs may return, not a hope may remain
Of the few that have brighten'd his pathway of pain,
But he ne'er will forget the short vision that threw
Its enchantment around him, while lin-g'ring with you
And still on that evening, when pleasure fills up 10 To the highest top sparkle each heart and each cup,
Where'er my path lies, be it gloomy or
bright,
My soul, happy friends, shall be with you that night,
Shall join in your revels, your sports, and your wiles,
And return to me, beaming all o'er with your smiles—
15 Too blest, if it tells me that, 'mid the gay
cheer,
Some kind voice had murmur'd, "I wish he were here!"

Let Fate do her worst, there are relics of
joy,
Bright dreams of the past, which she cannot destroy;
Which come in the night-time of sorrow and care, 20 And bring back the features that joy used to wear.
Long, long be my heart with such memories fill'd!
Like the vase, in which roses have once been distilled—
You may break, you may shatter the vase, if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still.

THE TIME I'VE LOST IN WOOING

The time I've lost in wooing,
 In watching and pursuing
 The light that lies
 In woman's eyes,
 5 Has been my heart's undoing.
 Though Wisdom oft has sought me,
 I scorn'd the lore she brought me,
 My only books
 Were woman's looks, 10 And folly's all they've taught me

Her smile when Beauty granted,
 I hung with gaze enchanted,
 Like him, the Sprite,
 Whom maids by night 15 Oft meet in glen that's haunted.
 Like him, too, Beauty won me,
 But while her eyes were on me,
 If once their ray
 Was turn'd away,
 20 Oh, winds could not outtune me

And are those follies going?
 And is my proud heart growing Too cold or too wise
 For brilliant eyes 25 Again to set it glowing?
 No, vain, alas! th' endeavor
 From bonds so sweet to sever, Poor Wisdom's chance Against a glance 30 Is now as weak as ever

DEAR HARP OF MY COUNTRY

Dear Harp of my Country' in darkness
 I found thee,
 The cold chain of silence had hung o'er thee long,
 When proudly, my own Island Harp, I unbound thee,
 And gave all thy chords to light, free dom, and song!
 5 The warm lay of love and the light note of gladness
 Have waken'd thy fondest, thy liveliest thrill;
 But, so oft hast thou echo'd the deep sigh of sadness,
 That ev'n in thy mirth it will steal from thee still

Dear Harp of my Country' farewell to thy numbers, 10 This sweet wreath of song is the last we shall twine!
 Go, sleep with the sunshine of Fame on thy slumbers,

Till touch'd by some hand less unworthy than mine;
 If the pulse of the patriot, soldier, or lover,
 Have throb'd at our lay, 'tis thy glory
 alone,
 15 I was but as the wind, passing heedlessly over,
 And all the wild sweetness I wak'd was thy own

From NATIONAL AIRS
1815OH, COME TO ME WHEN DAYLIGHT SETS
Venetian Air

Oh, come to me when daylight sets;
 Sweet! then come to me,
 When smoothly go our gondolets
 O'er the moonlight sea
 5 When Mirth's awake, and Love begins, Beneath that glancing ray,
 With sounds of lutes and mandolins,
 To steal young hearts away.
 Then, come to me when daylight sets,
 10 Sweet! then come to me,
 When smoothly go our gondolets
 O'er the moonlight sea

Oh, then's the hour for those who love,
 Sweet! like thee and me, 15 When all's so calm below, above,
 In heav'n and o'er the sea
 When maidens sing sweet ballad-
 And Echo sings again
 So sweet, that all with ears and souls 20 Should love and listen then So, come to me when daylight sets,
 Sweet! then come to me,
 When smoothly go our gondolets
 O'er the moonlight sea

OFT, IN THE STILLY NIGHT
Scotch Air

Oft, in the stilly night,
 Ere Slumber's chain has bound me,
 Fond Memory brings the light
 Of other days around me,
 5 The smiles, the tears,
 Of boyhood's years,
 The words of love then spoken.
 The eyes that shone,
 Now dimmed and gone, 10 The cheerful hearts now broken!
 Thus, in the stilly night,
 Ere Slumber's chain has bound me,
 1 Popular songs sung by Venetian gondollers

Sad Memory brings the light
Of other days around me.

- 15 When I remember all The friends, so linked together, I've seen around me fall,
Like leaves in wintry weather,
I feel like one 20 Who treads alone
Some banquet-hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed!
25 Thus, in the still night,
Ere Slumber's chain has bound me,
Sad Memory brings the light
Of other days around me

LAILA ROOKH
1814-17 1817

FROM THE LIGHT OF THE HARAM

- Who has not heard of the Vale of Cashmere,
With its roses the brightest that earth ever gave,
Its temples, and grottos, and fountains as
clear
As the love-lighted eyes that hang over their wave?
5 Oh! to see it at sunset, when warm o'er the lake
Its splendor at parting a summer eve
throws,
Like a bride, full of blushes, when ling'ring to take A last look of her mirror at night ere she goes!
When the shrines through the foliage are gleaming half shown, 10 And each hallows the hour by some rites of its own
Here the music of pray'r from a minaret¹ swells,
Here the Magian² his urn, full of perfume, is swinging,
And here, at the altar, a zone³ of sweet bells
Round the waist of some fair Indian dancer is ringing.
15 Or to see it by moonlight, when mellowly shines
The light o'er its palaces, gardens, and shrines,
When the water-falls gleam, like a quick fall of stars,
¹ slender tower of a mosque or temple, surrounded by one or more projecting balconies ² priest
³ girdle

- And the nightingale's hymn from the Isle of Chenars Is broken by laughs and light echoes of
feet 20 From the cool, shining walks where the young people meet.
Or at morn, when the magic of daylight awakes
A new wonder each minute, as slowly it breaks,— Hills, cupolas, fountains, call'd forth every one
Out of darkness, as if but just born of the Sun
25 When the Spirit of Fragrance is up with the day,
From his Haram of night-flowers stealing
away,
And the wind, full of wantonness, wooes like a lover
The young aspen-trees, till they tremble all over.
When the East is as warm as the light of first hopes,
30 And Day, with his banner of radiance unfurled,
Shines in through the mountainous portal that opens,
Sublime, from that valley of bliss to the
world!

- But never yet, by night or day,
In dew of spring or summer's ray, 35 Did the sweet valley shine so gay
As now it shines—all love and light, Visions by day and feasts by night!
A happier smile illumines each brow,
With quicker spread each heart uncloses,
40 And all its ecstasy, for now
The valley holds its Feast of Roses;
The joyous time, when pleasures pour Profusely round and, in their shower, Hearts open, like the season's rose,— 45 The flow'ret of a hundred leaves, Expanding while the dew-fall flows.
And every leaf its balm receives

- 'Twas when the hour of evening came Upon the lake, serene and cool, 50 When Day had hid his sultry flame Behind the palms of Baramoule,
When maids began to lift their heads,
Refresh'd from their embroider'd beds,
Where they had slept the sun away, 55 And wak'd to moonlight and to play
All were abroad—the busiest hive
On Bela's hills is less alive,
When saffron beds are full in flow'r,

Than look'd the valley in that hour.
 60 A thousand restless torches play'd Through every grove and island shade;
 A thousand sparkling lamps were set On every dome and minaret, 110 And fields and pathways, far and near,
 Were lighted by a blaze so clear, 65 That you could see, in wand'ring round,
 The smallest rose-leaf on the ground
 Yet did the maids and matrons leave Their veils at home, that brilliant eve, 70 And there were glancing eyes about,
 And cheeks, that would not dare shine out In open day, but thought they might Look lovely then, because 'twas night.
 75 And all were free, and wandering,
 And all exclaim'd to all they met,
 That never did the summer bring
 So gay a Feast of Roses yet,
 The moon had never shed a light
 So clear as that which bless'd them
 there,
 80 The roses ne'er shone half so bright, Nor they themselves look'd half so
 fair

And what a wilderness of flow'rs!
 It seem'd as though from all the bow'rs
 And fairest fields of all the year, 85 The mingled spoil were scatter'd here
 The lake, too, like a garden breathes,
 With the rich buds that o'er it lie,—
 As if a shower of fairy wreaths Had fall'n upon it from the sky!
 90 And then the sound of joy—the beat (Of tabors and of dancing feet;
 The minaret-crier's chant of glee Sung from his lighted gallery,
 And answer'd by a ziralet¹ 95 From neighboring Haram, wild and
 sweet;
 The merry laughter, echoing²
 From gardens, where the silken swing Wafts some delighted girl above 100 The top leaves of the orange-grove,
 Or, from those infant groups at play
 Among the tents that line the way, Flung, unaw'd by slave or mother.
 Handfuls of roses at each other Then the sounds from the lake:—the low whispering in boats, 105 As they shoot through the moonlight;
 the dipping of oars,
 And the wild, airy warbling that ev'rywhere floats,
 Through the groves, round the islands,
 as if all the shores,

¹ Joyous chorus

Lake those of Kathay, utter'd music, and gave
 An answer in song to the kiss of each
 wave.
 110 But the gentlest of all are those sounds, full of feeling,
 That soft from the lute of some lover are stealing,
 Some lover, who knows all the heart-touching power
 Of a lute and a sigh in this magic!
 hour
 Oh! best of delights as it ev'rywhere is To be near the lov'd One,—what a rapture is his
 Who in moonlight and music thus sweetly may glide O'er the Lake of Cashmere, with that One by his side!
 If woman can make the worst wilderness dear,
 Think, think what a heav'n she must make of Cashmere!

From FABLES FOR THE HOLY ALLIANCE
 1823

I THE DISSOLUTION OF THE HOLY ALLIANCE

A DREAM

I've had a dream that bodes no good Unto the Holy Brotherhood
 I may be wrong, but I confess—
 As far as it is right or lawful 5 For one, no conjurer, to guess—
 It seems to me extremely awful.
 Methought upon the Neva's flood A beautiful ice palace stood,
 A dome of frost-work, on the plan 10 Of that once built by Empress Anne,¹ Which shone by moonlight—as the tale is—Like an Aurora Borealis.
 In this said palace, furnish'd all And lighted as the best on land are, 15 I dreamt there was a splendid ball, Given by the Emperor Alexander,²
 To entertain with all due zeal, Those holy gentlemen, who've shown a Regard so kind for Europe's weal, 20 At Troppau, Laybach, and Verona.
 The thought was happy—and design'd
 To hint how thus the human mind

² Alexander I, Emperor of Russia, 1801-25.

May, like the stream imprison'd there,
Be check'd and chill'd, till it can bear 25 The heaviest kings, that ode or sonnet E'er yet be-prais'd, to dance upon it.

And all were pleas'd, and cold, and stately,
Shivering in grand illumination—Admir'd the superstructure greatly, 30 Nor gave one thought to the foundation.
Much too the Czar himself exulted,
To all plebeian fears a stranger,
For, Madame Krudener, when consulted, Had pledg'd her word there was no danger 35 So, on he caper'd, fearless quite,
Thinking himself extremely clever.
And waltz'd away with all his might,
As if the frost would last forever

Just fancy how a bard like me, 40 Who reverence monarchs, must have trembled,
To see that goodly company,
At such a ticklish sport assembled

Nor were the fears, that thus astounded
My loyal soul, at all unfounded—45 For, lo! ere long, those walls so massy Were seiz'd with an ill-omen'd dripping,
And o'er the floors, now growing glassy,
Their Holinesses took to slipping
The Czar, half through a polonaise¹ 50 Could scarce get on for downright stumbling;
And Prussia, though to slippery ways Well used, was cursedly near tumbling

Yet still 'twas, who could stamp the floor
most,
Russia and Austria 'mong the foremost—55 And now, to an Italian air, This precious brace would, hand in hand, go;
Now—while old Louis,² from his chair, Intreated them his toes to spare—Call'd loudly out for a fandango.³

60 And a fandango, 'faith, they had.
At which they all set to, like mad' Never were kings (though small the expense is

Of wit among their Excellencies)
So out of all their princely senses 65 But, ah, that dance—that Spanish dance—

² Louis XVIII, King of France (1814-24).

³ A lively Spanish dance.

Scarce was the luckless strain begun,
When, glaring red, as 'twere a glance Shot from an angry southern sun,
A light through all the chambers flam'd, 70 Astonishing old Father Frost,
Who, bursting into tears, exclaim'd,
"A thaw, by Jove—we're lost, we're
lost,
Run, France—a second Waterloo
Is come to drown you—sauve qui peut!"

75 Why, why will monarchs caper so In palaces without foundations?—
Instantly all was in a flow, Crowns, fiddles, sceptres, decorations—
Those royal arms, that look'd so nice, 80 Cut out in the resplendent ice—Those eagles, handsomely provided With double heads for double dealings—
How fast the globes and sceptres glided Out of their claws on all the ceilings!
85 Proud Prussia's double bird of prey Tame as a spatchcock,² slunk away; While—just like France herself, when
she Proclaims how great her naval skill is—Poor Louis' drowning fleurs-de-lys 90 Imagin'd themselves water-lilies.

And not alone rooms, ceilings, shelves,
But—still more fatal execution—
The Great Legimates themselves
Seem'd in a state of dissolution 95 The indignant Czar—when just about To issue a sublime ukase,³
"Whereas all light must be kept out"— Dissolv'd to nothing in its blaze.
Next Prussia took his turn to melt, 100 And, while his lips illustrious felt
The influence of this southern air, Some word, like "constitution"—long 'congeal'd in frosty silence there—
'came slowly thawing from his tongue.
105 While Louis, lapsing by degrees,
And sighing out a faint adieu
To truffles,⁴ salmis,⁵ toasted cheese And smoking fondus,⁶ quickly grew, Himself, into a fondu too;— 110 Or like that goodly king they make Of sugar for a Twelfth-night cake,⁷
When, in some urchin's mouth, alas,
It melts into a shapeless mass!

² A fowl killed and immediately broiled

⁵ Roasted game stewed with sauce, wine, bread, etc

⁶ Dishes made of cheese, eggs, butter, etc, melted together.

⁷ A cake made for the festival held on the twelfth night after Christmas. It usually contained a bean or a coin

In short, I scarce could count a minute, 115 Ere the bright dome, and all within it, Kings, fiddlers, emperors, all were gone—
 And nothing now was seen or heard But the bright river, rushing on,
 Happy as an enfranchis'd bird, 120 And prouder of that natural ray.
 Shining along its chainless way—
 More proudly happy thus to glide
 In simple grandeur to the sea,
 Than when, in sparkling fetters tied, 125 'Twas deck'd with all that kingly pride Could bring to light its slavery!

Such is my dream—and, I confess,
 I tremble at its awfulness
 That Spanish dance—that southern beam—130 But I say nothing—there's my dream—
 And Madame Krudener, the she-prophet, May make just what she pleases of it.

CHARLES WOLFE (1791-1823)

THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE AT CORUNNA 1817

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note.
 As his corse to the rampart we hurried,
 Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot O'er the grave where our hero we buried.

5 We buried him darkly at dead of night,
 The sods with our bayonets turning;
 By the struggling moonbeam's misty light,
 And the lantern dimly burning.

No useless coffin enclosed his breast, 10 Not in sheet nor in shroud we wound him,
 But he lay like a warrior taking his rest
 With his martial cloak around him.

Few and short were the prayers we said.
 And we spoke not a word of sorrow.
 15 But we steadfastly gazed on the face that was dead,
 And we bitterly thought of the morrow
 We thought as we hollowed his narrow bed,
 And smoothed down his lonely pillow, That the foe and the stranger would tread
 o'er his head.

20 And we far away on the bellow!
 Lightly they'll talk of the spirit that's
 gone,
 And o'er his cold ashes upbraid him,— But little he'll reck, if they let him sleep on In the grave where a Briton has laid him

25 But half of our weary task was done When the clock struck the hour for retiring;
 And we heard the distant and random gun
 That the foe was sullenly firing.

Slowly and sadly we laid him down, 30 From the field of his fame fresh and gory;
 We carved not a line, and we raised not a stone—
 But we left him alone with his glory

1900

My spirit's on the mountains, where the birds
 In wild and sportive freedom wing the
 air,
 Amidst the heath flowers and the browsing herds,
 Where nature's altar is, my spirit's
 there
 5 It is my joy to tread the pathless hills, Though but in fancy—for my mind is
 free
 And walks by sedge ways and truckling
 rills,
 While I'm forbid the use of liberty

This is delusion—but it is so sweet 10 That I could live deluded Let me be Persuaded that my springing soul may
 meet
 The eagle on the hills—and I am free Who'd not be flattered by a fate like this?
 To fancy is to feel our happiness

OH SAY NOT THAT MY HEART IS COLD 1825

Oh say not that my heart is cold
 To aught that once could warm it—That Nature's form so dear of old
 No more has power to charm it;
 5 Or that th' ungenerous world can chill
 One glow of fond emotion
 For those who made it dearer still.
 And shared my wild devotion.

Still oft those solemn scenes I view 10 In rapt and dreamy sadness;
 Oft look on those who loved them too
 With fancy's idle gladness;
 Again I longed to view the light In Nature's features glowing;
 15 Again to tread the mountain's height,
 And taste the soul's o'erflowing.

Stern Duty rose, and frowning flung His leaden chain around me,
 With iron look and sullen tongue 20 He muttered as he bound me—“The mountain breeze, the boundless
 heaven,
 Unfit for toil the creature,
 These for the free alone are given,— But what have slaves with Nature?”

SIR WALTER SCOTT (1771-1832)

WILLIAM AND HELEN
 1795 1796

From heavy dreams fair Helen rose,
 And eyed the dawning red:
 “Alas, my love, thou tarriest long!
 O art thou false or dead?”
 5 With gallant Fred’rick’s princely power
 He sought the bold crusade;¹
 But not a word from Judah’s war Told Helen how he sped.
 With Paynim and with Saracen 10 At length a truce was made,
 And every knight return’d to dry
 The tears his love had shed
 Our gallant host was homeward bound With many a song of joy, 15 Green waved the laurel in each plume
 The badge of victory
 And old and young, and sire and son,
 To meet them crowd the way,
 With shouts, and mirth, and melody.
 20 The debt of love to pay Full many a maid her true-love met,
 And sobb’d in his embrace,
 And flutt’ring joy in tears and smiles Array’d full many a face 25 Nor joy nor smile for Helen sad, She sought the host in vain;
 For none could tell her William’s fate,
 If faithless or if slain
 The martial band is past and gone.
 30 She rends her raven hair,
 And in distraction’s bitter mood
 She weeps with wild despair “O rise, my child,” her mother said, “Nor sorrow thus in vain; 35 A perjured lover’s fleeting heart
 No tears recall again.”

¹ He went on the Third Crusade, in 1189-92, with Frederick Barbarossa “O mother, what is gone, is gone, What’s lost forever lorn:

 Death, death alone can comfort me, 40 O had I ne’er been born!”
 “O break, my heart—O break at once!
 Drink my life-blood, Despair!
 No joy remains on earth for me,
 For me in heaven no share.”
 45 “O enter not in judgment, Lord!”
 The pious mother prays; “Impute not guilt to thy frail child!
 She knows not what she says.
 “O say thy pater noster, child!” 50 O turn to God and grace!
 His will, that turn’d thy bliss to bale, Can change thy bale to bliss.” “O mother, mother, what is bliss?
 O mother, what is bale?
 My William’s love was heaven on earth, 55 Without it earth is hell “Why should I pray to ruthless Heaven, Since my loved William’s slain?
 I only pray’d for William’s sake, 60 And all my prayers were vain.” “O take the sacrament, my child,
 And check these tears that flow;
 By resignation’s humble prayer,
 O hallow’d be thy woe!”
 65 “No sacrament can quench this fire,
 Or slake this scorching pain.
 No sacrament can bid the dead
 Arise and live again.
 “O break, my heart—O break at once!”
 70 Be thou my god, Despair!
 Heaven’s heaviest blow has fallen on me,
 And vain each fruitless prayer.”
 “O enter not in judgment, Lord,
 With thy frail child of clay!
 75 She knows not what her tongue has spoke, Impute it not, I pray!”
 “Forbear, my child, this desperate woe,
 And turn to God and grace,
 Well can devotion’s heavenly glow 80 Convert thy bale to bliss.”
 “O mother, mother, what is bliss?
 O mother, what is bale?
 Without my William what were heaven,
 Or with him what were hell?”

- 85 Wild she arraigns the eternal doom, Upbraids each sacred power,
Till, spent, she sought her silent room,
All in the lonely tower.
- She beat her breast, she wrung her hands, 90 Till sun and day were o'er,
And through the glimmering lattice shone
The twinkling of the star.
- Then, crash! the heavy drawbridge fell That o'er the moat was hung;
95 And, clatter! clatter! on its boards
The hoof of courser rung
- The clank of echoing steel was heard,
As off the rider bounded,
And slowly on the winding stair 100 A heavy footstep sounded
- And hark! and hark! a knock—tap! tap!
A rustling stifled noise;
Door-latch and tinkling staples ring,
At length a whispering voice.
- 105 "Awake, awake, arise, my love!
How, Helen, dost thou fare?
Wak'st thou, or sleep'st? laugh'st thou, or weep'st?
Hast thought on me, my fair?"
- "My love! my love!—so late by night!
110 I waked, I wept for thee Much have I borne since dawn of morn Where, William, couldst thou be?"
- "We saddle late—from Hungary
I rode since darkness fell, 115 And to its bourne we both return Before the matin-bell"
- "O rest this night within my arms,
And warm thee in their fold!
Chill howls through hawthorn bush the
wind—
120 My love is deadly cold."
- "Let the wind howl through hawthorn bush!
This night we must away,
The steed is wight,¹ the spur is bright,
I cannot stay till day.
- 125 "Busk, busk, and boune!² thou mount'st
behind
Upon my black barb³ steed:
- ¹ bell summoning to early morning worship ² powerful
³ dress and prepare for the journey
⁴ Barbary horse (noted for speed and endurance)
- O'er stock¹ and stile, a hundred miles, We haste to bridal bed."
- "Tonight—tonight a hundred miles?
130 O dearest William, stay!
The bell strikes twelve—dark, dismal
hour!
O wait, my love, till day!"
- "Look here, look here—the moon shines
clear—
Full fast I ween² we ride; 135 Mount and away! for ere the day We reach our bridal bed
- "The black barb snorts, the bridle rings.
Haste, busk, and boune, and seat thee!
The feast is made, the chamber spread, 140 The bridal guests await thee"
- Strong love prevail'd She busks, she hounes,
She mounts the barb behind,
And round her darling William's waist Her hly arms she twined
- 145 And, hurry! hurry! off they rode.
As fast as fast might be, Spurn'd from the courser's thundering heels
The flashing pebbles flee
- And on the right, and on the left, 150 Ere they could snatch a view, Fast, fast each mountain, mead, and plain,
And cot, and castle flew
- "Sit fast—dost tear? The moon shines
clear,
Fleet goes my barb—keep hold!
155 Fear'st thou?"—"O no!" she faintly said.
"But why so stern and cold?"
- "What yonder rings? what yonder sings?
Why shrieks the owlet gray?"
"Tis death-bells' clang, 'tis funeral song, 160 The body to the clay
- "With song and clang, at morrow's dawn, Ye may inter the dead
Tonight I ride, with my young bride,
To deck our bridal bed
- 165 "Come with thy choir, thou coffin'd guest,
To swell our nuptial song!
Come, priest, to bless our marriage feast!
Come all, come all along!"
- ¹ stump

- 'ceased clang and song; down sunk the
 bier, 170 The shrouded corpse arose.
 And, hurry! hurry! all the train
 The thundering steed pursues.

 And, forward! forward! on they go;
 High snorts the straining steed, 175 Thick pants the rider's laboring breath,
 As headlong on they speed

 "O William, why this savage haste?
 And where thy bridal bed?"
 "Tis distant far, low, damp, and chill, 180 And narrow, trustless maid."

 "No room for me!"—"Enough for both, Speed, speed, my barb, thy course!"
 O'er thundering bridge, through boiling surge
 He drove the furious horse.

 185 Tramp! tramp! along the land they rode,
 Splash! splash! along the sea,
 The scourge is wight, the spur is bright,
 The flashing pebbles flee

 Flew past on right and left how fast 190 Each forest, grove, and bower!
 On right and left flew past how fast
 Each city, town, and tower!

 "Dost fear? dost fear? The moon shines
 clear,
 Dost fear to ride with me?
 195 Hurrah! hurrah! the dead can ride!"—
 "O William, let them be!"

 "See there, see there! What yonder swings,
 And creaks 'mid whistling rain?"—
 "Gibbet and steel, th' accursed wheel; 200 A murderer in his chain.

 "Hollo! thou felon, follow here
 To bridal bed we ride,
 And thou shalt prance a fether dance Before me and my bride"

 205 And, hurry! hurry! clash! clash! clash!
 The wasted form descends;
 And fleet as wind through hazel bush
 The wild career² attends.

 Tramp! tramp! along the land they rode 210 Splash! splash! along the sea;
 The scourge is red, the spur drops blood,
 The flashing pebbles flee.

 1 wheel of torture 2 gallop; ride
- How fled what moonshine faintly show'd!
 How fled what darkness hid!
 215 How fled the earth beneath their feet,
 The heaven above their head!

 "Dost fear? dost fear? The moon shines
 clear,
 And well the dead can ride,
 Does faithful Helen fear for them?"— 220 "O leave in peace the dead!"

 "Barb! barb! methinks I hear the cock,
 The sand will soon be run.
 Barb! barb! I smell the morning air.
 The race is wellnigh done."

 225 Tramp! tramp! along the land they rode,
 Splash! splash! along the sea,
 The scourge is red, the spur drops blood,
 The flashing pebbles flee

 "Hurrah! hurrah! well ride the dead.
 230 The bride, the bride is come,
 And soon we reach the bridal bed,
 For, Helen, here's my home"

 Reluctant on its rusty hinge Revolved an iron door, 235 And by the pale moon's setting beam
 Were seen a church and tower.

 With many a shriek and cry, whiz round
 The birds of midnight, scared,
 And rustling like autumnal leaves 240 Unhallow'd ghosts were heard

 O'er many a tomb and tombstone pale He spur'd the fiery horse, Till sudden at an open grave
 He check'd the wondrous course

 245 The falling gauntlet quits the rein, Down drops the casque of steel,
 The cuirass leaves his shrinking side,
 The spur his gory heel

 The eyes desert the naked skull, 250 The mould'ring flesh the bone, Till Helen's hily arms entwine
 A ghastly skeleton

 The furious barb snorts fire and foam,
 And, with a fearful bound, 255 Dissolves at once in empty air,
 And leaves her on the ground

 Half seen by fits, by fits half heard, Pale spectres flit along,
 Wheel round the maid in dismal dance, 260 And howl the funeral song, "E'en when the heart's with anguish cleft,

Revere the doom of Heaven!
Her soul is from her body reft;
Her spirit be forgiven!"

THE VIOLET
1797 1810

The violet in her greenwood bower, Where burchen boughs with hazels mingle,
May boast itself the fairest flower
In glen, or copse, or forest dingle.¹

5 Though fair her gems of azure hue, Beneath the dewdrop's weight reclining.
I've seen an eye of lovelier blue, More sweet through wat'ry lustre shining.

10 The summer sun that dew shall dry, Ere yet the day be past its morrow,
Nor longer in my false love's eye Remain'd the tear of parting sorrow.

WITH FLOWERS FROM THE ROMAN WALL.² 1797

Take these flowers which, purple waving,
On the ruin'd rampart grew,
Where, the sons of freedom braving, Rome's imperial standards flew.

5 Warriors from the breach of danger Pluck no longer laurels there;
They but yield the passing stranger Wild-flower wreaths for Beauty's hair.

LORD RONALD'S CORONACH³
1799 1801

How matchless was thy broad claymore,¹ How deadly thine unerring bow!

Well can the Saxon widows tell, 10 How on the Teith's resounding shore
The boldest Lowland warriors fell,
As down from Lenny's pass you bore.

But o'er his hills, in festal day,
How blazed Lord Ronald's beltane tree,² 15 While youths and maids the light strath-

So nimbly danced with Highland glee!

(Heer'd by the strength of Ronald's

E'en age forgot his tresses hoar,
But now the loud lament we swell, 20 O, ne'er to see Lord Ronald more!

From distant isles a chieftain came,
The joys of Ronald's halls to find,
And chase with him the dark-brown game
That bounds o'er Albin's hills of wind

25 'Twas Moy, whom in Columba's isle⁵
The seer's prophetic spirit found,
As, with a minstrel's fire the while,
He waked his harp's harmonious sound

Full many a spell to him was known, 30 Which wandering spirits shrink to hear,
And many a lay of potent tone,
Was never meant for mortal ear

For there, 'tis said, in mystic mood, High converse with the dead they hold, 35 And oft espy the fated shroud,
That shall the future corpse enfold

O, so it fell that on a day,
To rouse the red deer from their den,
The Chiefs have ta'en their distant way, 40 And scour'd the deep Glenfinlas glen

No vassals wait their sports to aid,
To watch their safety, deck their board,
Their simple dress the Highland plaid,
Their trusty guard the Highland sword

Their whistling shafts successful flew,

And still, when dewy evening fell,
The quarry¹ to their hut they drew.

In gray Glenfinlas' deepest nook 50 The solitary cabin stood,
Fast by Moneira's sullen brook, Which murmurs through that lonely
wood.

Soft fell the night, the sky was calm,
When three successive days had flown, 55 And summer mist in dewy balm Steep'd heathy bank and mossy stone

The moon, half-hid in silvery flakes, Afar her dubious radiance shed,
Quivering on Katrine's distant lakes, 60 And resting on Benledi's head.

Now in their hut, in social guise,
Their silvan fare the Chiefs enjoy;
And pleasure laughs in Ronald's eyes,
As many a pledge he quaffs to Moy

65 "What lack we here to crown our bliss, While thus the pulse of joy beats high?
What, but fair woman's yielding kiss,
Her panting breath and melting eye"

"To chase the deer of yonder shades.
70 Thus morning left their father's pile²
The fairest of our mountain maids,
The daughters of the proud Glengyle

"Long have I sought sweet Mary's heart, And dropp'd the tear, and heaved the 75 But vain the lover's wily art, Beneath a sister's watchful eye.

"But thou may'st teach that guardian fair, While far with Mary I have flown, (Of other hearts to cease her care, 80 And find it hard to guard her own

"Touch but thy harp—thou soon shalt see The lovely Flora of Glengyle, Unmindful of her charge and me,
Hang on thy notes 'twixt tear and smile

85 "Or, if she choose a melting tale,
All underneath the greenwood bough,
Will good Saint Oran's rule³ prevail, Stern huntsman of the rigid brow!"

"Since Enriek's fight, since Morna's
death,

90 No more on me shall rapture rise, Responsive to the panting breath, (O! yielding kiss, or melting eyes

"E'en then, when o'er the heath of woe, Where sunk my hopes of love and fame, 95 I bade my harp's wild wailings flow,
On me the Seer's sad spirit came

"The last dread curse of angry heaven,
With ghastly sights and sounds of woe,
To dash each glimpse of joy, was given, 100 The gift—the future ill to know.

"The bark thou saw'st yon summer morn
So gaily part from Oban's bay,
My eye beheld her dash'd and torn,
Far on the rocky Colonsay.

105 "Thy Fergus too, thy sister's son,— Thou saw'st with pride the gallant's

As marching 'gainst the Lord of Downe
He left the skirts of huge Benmoie.

"Thou only saw'st their tartans¹ wave, 110 As down Benvoirlich's side they wound, Heard'st but the pibroch² answering brave
To many a target³ clanking round

"I heard the groans, I mark'd the tears,
I saw the wound his bosom bore, 115 When on the serried Saxon spears
He pour'd his clans' restless roar

"And thou who bidst me think of bliss,
And bidst my heart awake to glee,
And court like thee the wanton kiss—120 That heart, O Ronald, bleeds for thee!"

"I see the death-damps chill thy brow,
I hear thy Warning Spirit cry;
The corpse-lights dance! they're gone!
and now—
No more is given to gifted eye!"

125 "Alone enjoy thy dreary dreams,

Because tomorrow's storm may lour?"

Untouch'd, the harp began to ring,

And shook responsive every string,
As, light, a footstep press'd the floor
"First, three times tell each Ave-bend.¹
And thrice a Paternoster² say,

CADYOW CASTLE
1801 1803

When princely Hamilton's abode Ennobled Cadyow's Gothic towers,
The song went round, the goblet flow'd,
And revel sped the laughing hours

5 Then, thrilling to the harp's gay sound,
So sweetly rung each vaulted wall,
And echoed light the dancer's bound,
As mirth and music cheer'd the hall.

But Cadyow's towers, in ruins laid, 10 And vaults by ivy mantled o'er, Thrill to the music of the shade,
Or echo Evan's hoarser roar.

Yet still of Cadyow's faded fame
You bid me tell a minstrel tale, 15 And tune my harp of Border frame
On the wild banks of Evandale.

For thou, from scenes of courtly pride,
From pleasure's lighter scenes, canst
turn,
To draw oblivion's pall aside, 20 And mark the long-forgotten urn

Then, noble maid!¹ at thy command, Again the crumbled halls shall rise.
Lo! as on Evan's banks we stand,
The past returns—the present flies

25 Where with the rock's wood-cover'd side Were blended late the runs green, Rise turrets in fantastic pride,
And feudal banners flaunt between.

Where the rude torrent's brawling course 30 Was shag'd with thorn and tangling sloe,²
The ashler³ buttress braves its force,
And ramparts frown in 'battled row

'Tis night the shade of keep and spire Obscurely dance on Evan's stream, 35 And on the wave the warder's fire Is chequering the moonlight beam.

Fades slow their light—the east is gray;
The weary warder leaves his tower;

ton, to whom the poem was ad-

² blackthorn
³ hewn stone

40 Steeds snort, uncoupled stag-hounds bay,
And merry hunters quit the bower.

The drawbridge falls—they hurry out—Clatters each plank and swinging chain,
As, dashing o'er, the jovial rout Urge the shy steed, and slack the rein.

45 First of his troop the Chief rode on;
His shouting merry-men throng behind;
The steed of princely Hamilton
Was fleet¹er than the mountain wind.

From the thick copse the roebucks bound, 50 The startled red-deer scuds the plain,
For the hoarse bugle's warrior-sound
Has roused their mountain haunts again.

Through the huge oaks of Evandale, Whose limbs a thousand years have worn,

55 What sullen roar comes down the gale
And drowns the hunter's pealing horn?

Mightiest of all the beasts of chase
That roam in woody Caledon, Crashing the forest in his race,

60 The Mountain Bull comes thundering on Fierce on the hunter's quiver'd band

He rolls his eyes of swarthy glow, Spurns with black hoof and horn the
sand,
And tosses high his mane of snow

65 Aim'd well the Chieftain's lance has flown—

Struggling in blood the savage lies.

His roar is sunk in hollow groan—

Sound, merry huntsmen! sound the pryse.¹

'Tis noon against the knotted oak

70 The hunters rest the idle spear, Curls through the trees the slender smoke, Where yeomen dight² the woodland
cheer

Proudly the Chieftain mark'd his clan.
On greenwood lap all careless thrown,

75 Yet miss'd his eye the boldest man That bore the name of Hamilton

"Why fills not Bothwellhaugh his place, Still wont our weal and woe to share?

Why comes he not our sport to grace?

80 Why shares he not our hunter's fare?"

¹ The note blown at the death of the game

Stern Claud replied with darkening face—Gray Paisley's haughty lord was he—
"At merry feast or buxom chase
No more the warrior wilt thou see.

95 "Few suns have set since Woodhouselee Saw Bothwellhaugh's bright goblet foam,
When to his hearths in social glee
The war-worn soldier turn'd him home

"There, wan from her maternal throes, 90 His Margaret, beautiful and mild, Sate in her bower, a pallid rose,
And peaceful nursed her new-born
child.

"O change accurs'd! past are those days, False Murray's ruthless spoilers came.
95 And, for the hearth's domestic blaze, Ascends destruction's volumed flame

"What sheeted phantom wanders wild, Where mountain Eske through woodland flows,
Her arms enfold a shadowy child—100 Oh! is it she, the pallid rose?

"The wilder'd traveller sees her glide,
And hears her feeble voice with awe,
'Revenge,' she cries, 'on Murray's pride'
And woe for injured Bothwellhaugh!"

105 He ceased; and cries of rage and grief Burst mingling from the kindred band,
And half arose the kindling Chief,
And half unsheathed his Arran brand

But who, o'er bush, o'er stream and rock, 110 Rides headlong, with resistless speed, Whose bloody poniard's frantic stroke Drives to the leap his jaded steed,

Whose cheek is pale, whose eyeballs glare.
As one some vision'd sight that saw, 115 Whose hands are bloody, loose his hair—
'Tis he! 'tis he! 'tis Bothwellhaugh

From gory selle,¹ and reeling steed, Sprung the fierce horseman with a
bound,
And, reeking from the recent deed, 120 He dash'd his carbine on the ground

Sternly he spoke: "'Tis sweet to hear In good greenwood the bugle blown.
But sweeter to Revenge's ear,
To drink a tyrant's dying groan.

- 125 "Your slaughter'd quarry¹ proudly trode,
At dawning morn, o'er dale and down, But prouder base-born Murray rode Through old Linlithgow's crowded town.
- 130 "From the wild Border's humbled side,
In haughty triumph marchèd he,
While Knox relax'd his bigot pride And smilèd the traitorous pomp to see.

Or Pomp, with all her courtly glare

150 Proud Murray's plumage floated high;
Scarcely could his trampling charger move,
So close the minions crowded nigh.
- "From the raised vizor's shade, his eye Dark-rolling glanced the ranks along, 155 And his steel truncheon,⁵ waved on high, Seem'd marshalling the iron throng
- "But yet his sadden'd brow confess'd A passing shade of doubt and awe, Some fiend was whispering in his breast, 160 'Beware of injured Bothwellhaugh!'
- "The death-shot parts! the charger springs, Wild rises tumult's startling roar!
And Murray's plumed helmet rings—Rings on the ground, to rise no more
- 165 "What joy the rapturèd youth can feel
To hear her love the loved one tell!
Or he who broaches⁶ on his steel
The wolf by whom his infant fell!
- "But dearer to my injured eye 170 To see in dust proud Murray roll,
And mine was ten times trebled joy,
To hear him groan his felon soul.
- "My Margaret's spectre glided near,
With pride her bleeding victim saw 175 And shriek'd in his death-deafen'd ear
'Remember injured Bothwellhaugh!'
- "Then speed thee, noble Chatlerault!
Spread to the wind thy banner'd tree!
Each warrior bend his Clydesdale bow!-- 180 Murray is fall'n, and Scotland free!"
- Vaults every warrior to his steed; Loud bugles join then wild acclaim
"Murray is fall'n, and Scotland freed" Couch,⁷ Arian! couch thy spear of flame!"
- 185 But, see! the minstrel vision fails—
The glimmering spears are seen no more,
The shouts of war die on the gales,
Or sink in Evan's lonely roar.
- For the loud bugle, pealing high, 190 The blackbird whistles down the vale,
And sunk in rived ruins lie
The banner'd towers of Evandale.
- For chiefs, intent on bloody deed,
And Vengeance shouting o'er the slain, 195 Lo! high-born Beauty rules the steed, Or graceful guides the silken rein.
- And long may Peace and Pleasure own
The maids who list the minstrel's tale, Nor e'er a ruder guest be known

They band his legs beneath the steed, 10 They tied his hands behind his back,
They guarded him, fivesome¹ on each side,
And they brought him ower the Liddel-

They led him thro the Liddel-rack,
And also thro the Carlisle sands.
15 They brought him to Carlisle castell,
To be at my Lord Scroope's commands

THE LAY OF THE LAST MINSTREL 1802-04 1806

FROM CANTO VI

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
 Who never to himself hath said,

This is my own, my native land!

Whose heart hath ne'er within him burn'd, 5 As home his footsteps he hath turn'd,

From wandering on a foreign strand!

If such there breathe, go, mark him well,
 For him no minstrel raptures swell;

High though his titles, proud his name,

10 Boundless his wealth as wish can claim,— Despite those titles, power, and pelf,

The wretch, concentred all in self,

Living, shall forfeit fair renown,

And, doubly dying, shall go down

15 To the vile dust, from whence he sprung, Unwept, unhonor'd, and unsung.

O Caledonia! stern and wild,

Meet nurse for a poetic child!

Land of brown heath and shaggy wood,

20 Land of the mountain and the flood,

¹ broth

Land of my sires! what mortal hand
Can e'er untie the filial band,
That knits me to thy rugged strand!
Still as I view each well-known scene, 25 Think what is now, and what hath been,
Seems as to me, of all bereft, Sole friends thy woods and streams were left,
And thus I love them better still,
Even in extremity of ill.
30 By Yarrow's stream still let me stray, Though none should guide my feeble way.
Still feel the breeze down Ettrick break.
Although it chill my wither'd cheek;
Still lay my head by Teviot Stone, 35 Though there, forgotten and alone,
The bard may draw his parting groan

Not scorn'd like me, to Branksome Hall
The minstrel came at festive call, Trooping they came, from near and far.
40 The jovial priests of mirth and war, Alike for feast and fight prepar'd,
Battle and banquet both they shar'd.
Of late, before each martial clan,
They blew their death-note in the van.
45 But now, for every merry mate, Rose the portcullis' iron grate;
They sound the pipe, they strike the string.
They dance, they revel, and they sing.
Till the rude turrets shake and ring.

And much of wild and wonderful
In these rude isles might fancy cull;
For thither came, in times afar, 125 Stern Loehlin's sons of roving war,
The Norsemen, train'd to spoil and blood.
Skill'd to prepare the raven's food,
Kings of the main their leaders brave.
Their barks the dragons of the wave 130 And there, in many a stormy vale,
The Scald¹ had told his wondrous tale.
And many a runic² column high
Had witness'd grim idolatry.
And thus had Harold in his youth 335 Learn'd many a Saga's rhyme uncouth—
Of that Sea-Snake,³ tremendous curl'd, Whose monstrous circle girds the world,
Of those dread Maids,⁴ whose hideous yell Maddens the battle's bloody swell;
140 Of Chiefs, who, guided through the gloom
By the pale death-lights of the tomb.

Ransack'd the graves of warriors old,¹ Their falchions wrench'd from corpses'
hold,
Wak'd the deaf tomb with war's alarms, 345 And bade the dead arise to arms!
With war and wonder all on flame,
To Roslin's bowers young Harold came,
Where, by sweet glen and greenwood tree,
He learn'd a milder minstrelsy;
350 Yet something of the Northern spell Mix'd with the softer numbers well.

HAROLD

O listen, listen, ladies gay!
No haughty feat of arms I tell,
Soft is the note, and sad the lay, 355 That mourns the lovely Rosabelle

—"Moor, moor the barge, ye gallant crew!
And, gentle ladye, deign to stay!
Rest thee in Castle Ravensheuch, Nor tempt the stormy firth to-day"

360 "The blackening wave is edg'd with white To inch² and rock the sea-mew³ fly,
The fishers have heard the water-sprite, Whose screams forebode that wreck is nigh

"Last night the gifted seer did view 365 A wet shroud swathed round ladye gay, Then stay thee, fair, in Ravensheuch Why cross the gloomy firth to-day?"

" 'Tis not because Lord Lindesay's heir Tonight at Roslin leads the ball, 370 But that my ladye-mother there Sits lonely in her castle-hall

" 'Tis not because the ring they ride,⁴
And Lindesay at the ring rides well,
But that my sire the wine will chide, 375 If 'tis not fill'd by Rosabelle "

O'er Roslin all that dreary night A wondrous blaze was seen to gleam;
'Twas broader than the watch-fire's light,
And redder than the bright moonbeam

380 It glar'd on Roslin's castled rock, It ruddied all the copse-wood glen,
'Twas seen from Dryden's groves of oak,
And seen from cavern'd Hawthornden

Seem'd all on fire that chapel proud, 385 Where Roslin's chiefs uncoffin'd lie, Each Baron, for a sable shroud, Sheath'd in his iron panoply

¹ Northern warriors were buried with their weapons and treasures. These were said to be guarded by the spirits of the dead warriors

 And glimmer'd all the dead men's mail.

Blaz'd battlement and pinnet¹ high,
 Blaz'd every rose-carved buttress fair—
 So still they blaze when fate is nigh 395 The lordly line of high St. Clair.

There are twenty of Roslin's barons bold Lie buried within that proud chapelle, Each one the holy vault doth hold—
 But the sea holds lovely Rosabelle!

400 And each St. Clair was buried there,
 With candle, with book, and with knell;
 But the sea-caves rung, and the wild winds
 sung,
 The dirge of lovely Rosabelle.

THE MAID OF NEIDPATH 1806

O, lovers' eyes are sharp to see,
 And lovers' ears in hearing,
 And love, in life's extremity,
 Can lend an hour of cheering.
 5 Disease had been in Mary's bower,
 And slow decay from mourning,
 Though now she sits on Neidpath's tower,
 To watch her love's returning.

All sunk and dim her eyes so bright, 10 Her form decay'd by pining, Till through her wasted hand, at night,
 You saw the taper shining:
 By fits, a sultry hectic hue Across her cheek was flying; 15 By fits, so ashy pale she grew,
 Her maidens thought her dying.

Yet keenest powers to see and hear Seem'd in her frame residing;
 Before the watch-dog prick'd his ear 20 She heard her lover's riding, Ere scarce a distant form was ken'd,² She knew, and waded to greet him,
 And o'er the battlement did bend,
 As on the wing to meet him

25 He came—he pass'd—an heedless gaze,
 As o'er some stranger glancing;
 Her welcome, spoke in faltering phrase,
 Lost in the courser's prancing.
 The castle arch, whose hollow tone 30 Returns each whisper spoken, Could scarcely catch the feeble moan
 Which told her heart was broken.

HUNTING SONG 1808

Waken, lords and ladies gay,
 On the mountain dawns the day,
 All the jolly chase is here,
 With hawk, and horse, and hunting-spear!
 5 Hounds are in their couples¹ yelling, Hawks are whistling, horns are knelling, Merrily, merrily, mingle they,
 "Waken, lords and ladies gay."

Waken, lords and ladies gay,
 10 The mist has left the mountain gray, Sprinklets in the dawn are steaming, Diamonds on the brake² are gleaming:
 And foresters have busy been,
 To track the buck in thicket green; 15 Now we come to chant our lay,
 "Waken, lords and ladies gay."

Waken, lords and ladies gay,
 To the greenwood haste away;
 We can show you where he lies, 20 Fleet of foot, and tall of size;
 We can show the marks he made,
 When 'gainst the oak his antlers fray'd,
 You shall see him brought to bay,
 "Waken, lords and ladies gay."

25 Louder, louder chant the lay,
 Waken, lords and ladies gay!
 Tell them youth, and mirth, and glee, Run a course as well as we;
 Time, stern huntsman! who can baulk, 30 Stanch as hound, and fleet as hawk:
 Think of this, and rise with day,
 Gentle lords and ladies gay

15 There thy rest shalt thou take, Parted forever,
Never again to wake,
Never, O never!

Chorus

Eleu loro, etc. Never, O never!

20 Where shall the traitor rest,
He the deceiver,
Who could win maiden's breast,
Ruin and leave her?
In the lost battle,
Borne down by the flying,
25 Where mingles war's rattle
With groans of the dying.

Chorus

Eleu loro, etc. There shall he be lying.

Her wing shall the eagle flap O'er the false-hearted 30 His wain blood the wolf shall lap, Ere life be parted
Shame and dishonor set
By his grave ever,
Blessing shall hallow it,— 35 Never, O never!

LOCHINVAR

O, young Lochinvar is come out of the west!
Through all the wide Border his steed was
the best,
And save his good broadsword he weapons had none,
He rode all unarmed, and he rode all
alone
5 So faithful in love, and so dauntless in
war,
There never was knight like the young
Lochinvar
He stayed not for brake,¹ and he stopped not for stone;
He swam the Eke river where ford there was none,
But ere he alighted at Netherby gate, 10 The bride had consented, the gallant came late.
For a laggard in love, and a dastard in
war,
Was to wed the fair Ellen of brave Loch-invar.

So boldly he entered the Netherby Hall, Among bride'smen, and kinsmen, and brothers, and all.
15 Then spoke the bride's father, his hand on his sword, (For the poor craven bridegroom said never a word):
"O come ye in peace here, or come ye in
war,
Or to dance at our bridal, young Lord
Lochinvar?"

"I long wooed your daughter; my suit you denied,
20 Love swells like the Solway, but ebbs like its tide;
And now am I come, with this lost love of
mine
To lead but one measure, drink one cup of wine
There are maidens in Scotland more lovely by far,
That would gladly be bride to the young Lochinvar."

25 The bride kissed the goblet; the knight took it up,
He quaffed off the wine, and he threw down the cup
She looked down to blush, and she looked up to sigh,
With a smile on her lips, and a tear in her eye.
He took her soft hand, ere her mother could bar—
30 "Now tread we a measure!" said young Lochinvar.

So stately his form, and so lovely her face,
That never a hall such a gallant¹ did
grace,
While her mother did fret, and her father did fume.
And the bridegroom stood dangling his bonnet and plume, 35 And the bride-maidens whispered,
"Twere better by far
To have matched our fair cousin with young Lochinvar."

One touch to her hand, and one word in her ear,
When they reached the hall-door, and the charger stood near;
So light to the croupe² the fair lady he swung,
40 So light to the saddle before her he sprung!

¹ A spirited dance

"She is won! we are gone, over bank, bush, and scaur!¹ They'll have fleet steeds that follow!"
quothe young Lochinvar.

There was mounting 'mong Graemes of the Netherby clan;
Forsters, Fenwicks, and Musgraves, they rode and they ran, 45 There was racing and chasing, on Cannobie Lee,
But the lost bride of Netherby ne'er did they see.
So daring in love and so dauntless in war,
Have ye e'er heard of gallant like young Lochinvar?

CANTO I. THE CHASE

Harp of the North² that mouldering long hast hung
On the witch-elm³ that shades Saint Fillan's spring,
And down the fitful breeze thy numbers⁴ flung,
Till envious ivy did around thee cling, 5 Muffling with verdant ringlet every string,—
O minstrel Harp, still must thine accents sleep?
'Mid rustling leaves and fountains murmuring,
Still must thy sweeter sounds their silence keep,
Nor bid a warrior smile, nor teach a maid
to weep?

10 Not thus, in ancient days of Caledon, Was thy voice mute amid the festal
crowd,
When lay of hopeless love, or glory won,
Aroused the fearful, or subdued the
proud.
At each according pause was heard aloud 15 Thine ardent symphony sublime and
high!
Fair dames and crested chiefs attention
bow'd;
For still the burden of thy minstrelsy Was Knighthood's dauntless deed, and Beauty's matchless eye.

verses

O wake once more! how rude soe'er the
hand 20 That ventures o'er thy magic maze to stray;
O wake once more! though scarce my skill command
Some feeble echoing of thine earlier lay: Though harsh and faint, and soon to die
away,
And all unworthy of thy nobler strain, 25 Yet if one heart throb higher at its sway, The wizard note has not been touch'd
in vain.
Then silent be no more! Enchantress, wake again!

The stag at eve had drunk his fill,
Where danced the moon on Monan's rill, 30 And deep his midnight lair had made In lone Glenartney's hazel shade;
But, when the sun his beacon red Had kindled on Benvoirlich's head,
The deep-mouth'd bloodhound's heavy bay 35 Resounded up the rocky way,
And faint, from farther distance borne,
Were heard the clanging hoof and horn.

As chief, who hears his warder call,
"To arms! the foemen storm the wall," 40 The antler'd monarch of the waste Sprung from his heathery couch in haste, But, ere his fleet career he took,
The dew-drops from his flanks he shook;
Like crested leader proud and high, 45 Toss'd his beam'd frontlet to the sky,
A moment gazed adown the dale,
A moment snuff'd the tainted gale,
A moment listen'd to the cry,
That thicken'd as the chase drew nigh, 50 Then, as the headmost foes appear'd,
With one brave bound the copse he clear'd,
And, stretching forward free and far,
Sought the wild heaths of Uam-Var

Yell'd on the view the opening pack; 55 Rock, glen, and cavern, paid them back.
To many a mingled sound at once
The awaken'd mountain gave response
A hundred dogs bay'd deep and strong.
Clatter'd a hundred steeds along, 60 Their peal the merry horns rung out.
A hundred voices join'd the shout;
With hark and whoop and wild halloo,
No rest Benvoirlich's echoes knew.
Far from the tumult fled the roe, 65 Close in her covert cower'd the doe;
The falcon, from her cairn¹ on high,

¹ crag; peak (literally, a heap of stones)

Cast on the rout a wondering eye, Till far beyond her piercing ken
The hurricane had swept the glen.
70 Faint and more faint, its failing din Return'd from cavern, cliff, and linn,¹ And silence settled, wide and still,
On the lone wood and mighty hill.

Less loud the sounds of silvan war 75 Disturb'd the heights of Uam-Vai, And roused the cavern, where, 'tis told,
A giant made his den of old,
For ere that steep ascent was won,
High in his pathway hung the sun, 80 And many a gallant, stay'd perforce,
Was fain to breathe his faltering horse,
And of the trackers of the deer, Scarce half the lessening pack was near;
So shrewdly² on the mountain side 85 Had the bold burst their mettle tried.

The noble stag was pausing now
Upon the mountain's southern brow,
Where broad extended, far beneath,
The varied realms of fair Menteith 90 With anxious eye he wander'd o'er Mountain and meadow, moss and moor,
And ponder'd refuge from his toil
By far Lochard or Aberfoyle.
But nearer was the copsewood gray, 95 That waved and wept on Loch-Achnay,
And mingled with the pine-trees blue
On the bold cliffs of Benvenue Fresh vigor with the hope return'd,
With flying foot the heath he spurn'd.
100 Held westward with unwearied race,
And left behind the panting chase

'Twere long to tell what steeds gave o'er,
As swept the hunt through Cambusmore
What reins were tighten'd in despair, 105 When rose Benledi's ridge in air;
Who flagg'd upon Bochart's heath,
Who shunn'd to stem the flooded Teuth,— For twice that day, from shore to shore,
The gallant stag swam stoutly o'er 110 Few were the stragglers, following far,
That reach'd the lake of Vennachar;
And when the Brigg of Turk was won,
The headmost horseman rode alone.

Alone, but with unbated zeal, 115 That horseman plied the scourge and steel:
For jaded now, and spent with toil, Emboss'd with foam, and dark with soil, While every gasp with sobs he drew,
The laboring stag strain'd full in view.

120 Two dogs of black Saint Hubert's breed,³ Unmatch'd for courage, breath, and speed, Fast on his flying traces came,
And all but won that desperate game, For, scarce a spear's length from his haunch,

125 Vindictive toil'd the bloodhounds stanch;
Nor nearer might the dogs attain,
Nor farther might the quarry⁴ strain.
Thus up the margin of the lake,
Between the precipice and brake,⁵ 130 O'er stock and rock their race they take.

The hunter mark'd that mountain high,
The lone lake's western boundary,
And deem'd the stag must turn to bay,
Where that huge rampart barr'd the way;
135 Already glorying in the prize, Measured his antlers with his eyes;
For the death-wound and death-halloo, Muster'd his breath, his whinyard⁶
drew,—

But thundering as he came prepared, 140 With ready arm and weapon bared,
The wily quarry shunn'd the shock,
And turn'd him from the opposing rock;
Then, dashing down a darksome glen,
Soon lost to hound and hunter's ken, 145 In the deep Trosachs' wildest nook His solitary refuge took.
There, while close couch'd, the thicket shed Cold dews and wild-flowers on his head,
He heard the baffled dogs in vain 150 Rave through the hollow pass amain, Chiding the rocks that yell'd again.

Close on the hounds the hunter came,
To cheer them on the vanish'd game,
But, stumbling in the rugged dell, 155 The gallant horse exhausted fell.
The impatient rider strove in vain
To rouse him with the spur and rein,
For the good steed, his labors o'er,
Stretch'd his stiff limbs, to rise no more;
160 Then, touch'd with pity and remorse, He sorrow'd o'er the expiring horse
"I little thought, when first thy rein
I slack'd upon the banks of Seine, That Highland eagle e'er should feed 165 On thy fleet limbs, my matchless steed!
Woe worth⁷ the chase, woe worth the day,
That costs thy life, my gallant gray!"

Then through the dell his horn resounds,
From vain pursuit to call the hounds, 170 Back limp'd, with slow and crippled pace,

Close to their master's side they press'd,
With drooping tail and humbled crest;
But still the dingle's¹ hollow throat 175 Prolong'd the swelling bugle-note.
The owlets started from their dream,
The eagles answer'd with their scream,
Round and around the sounds were cast,
Till echo seem'd an answering blast;
180 And on the hunter hied his way,
To join some comrades of the day;
Yet often paused, so strange the road,
So wondrous were the scenes it show'd.
- The western waves of ebbing day 185 Roll'd o'er the glen their level way, Each purple peak, each flinty spire,
Was bathed in floods of living fire
But not a setting beam could glow Within the dark ravines below, 190 Where twined the path in shadow hid,
Round many a rocky pyramid,
Shooting abruptly from the dell
Its thunder-splinter'd pinnacle;
Round many an insulated mass, 195 The native bulwarks of the pass, Huge as the tower which builders vain Presumptuous piled on Shinar's plain:²
The rocky summits, split and rent,

200 Or seem'd fantastically set With cupola or minaret,³ Wild crests as pagod⁴ ever deck'd, Or mosque of Eastern architect.
Nor were these earth-born castles bare, 205 Nor lack'd they many a banner fair,
For, from their shiver'd brows display'd, Far o'er the unfathomable glade,
All twinkling with the dewdrop sheen,
The briar-rose fell in streamers green, 210 And creeping shrubs, of thousand dyes, Waved in the west-wind's summer sighs
- Boon⁵ nature scatter'd, free and wild,

And, higher yet, the pine-tree hung His shatter'd trunk, and frequent flung,
Where seem'd the cliffs to meet on high,
His boughs athwart the narrow'd sky

Where glist'ning streamers' waved and danced,

The summer heaven's delicious blue,
So wondrous wild, the whole might seem

Affording scarce such breadth of beam
As served the wild duck's brood to swim.
240 Lost for a space, through thickets veer-
ing,
But broader when again appearing,
Tall rocks and tufted knolls their face Could on the dark-blue mirror trace,
And farther as the hunter stray'd 245 Still broader sweep its channels made The shaggy mounds no longer stood, Emerging from entangled wood,
But, wave-encircled, seem'd to float,
Like castle girdled with its moat, 250 Yet broader floods extending still Divide them from their parent hill, Till each, retiring, claims to be An islet in an inland sea
- And now, to issue from the glen, 255 No pathway meets the wanderer's ken Unless he climb, with footing nice,
A far projecting precipice
The broom's⁶ tough roots his ladder made.
The hazel saplings lent their aid, 260 And thus at any point he won,
Where, gleaming with the setting sun,
One burnish'd sheet of living gold,
Loch Katrine lay beneath him roll'd;
In all her length far winding lay, 265 With promontory, creek, and bay,
And islands that, empurpled bright,
Floated amid the livelier light,
And mountains, that like giants stand,
To sentinel enchanted land.

280 The stranger, raptured and amazed
And, "What a scene were here," he cried,
"For princely pomp, or churchman's
pride!

On this bold brow, a lordly tower,
In that soft vale, a lady's bower;
On yonder meadow, far away,

285 The turrets of a cloister gray, How blithely might the bugle-horn Chide, on the lake, the lingering morn'
How sweet, at eve, the lover's lute Chime, when the groves were still and mute!

290 And, when the midnight moon should lave
Her forehead in the silver wave,
How solemn on the ear would come
The holy matins' distant hum,

295 While the deep peal's commanding tone Should wake, in yonder islet lone,
A sancted hermit from his cell,
To drop a bead with every knell—

And bugle, lute, and bell, and all, Should each bewilder'd stranger call 300 To friendly feast, and lighted hall

"Blithe were it then to wander here!
But now,—beshrew yon numble deer,— Like that same hermit's, thin and spare,
The corpse must give my evening fare,

305 Some mossy bank my couch must be,
Some rustling oak my canopy
Yet pass we that, the war and chase Give little choice of resting-place,— A summer night, in greenwood spent,

310 Were but tomorrow's merriment—
But hosts may in these wilds abound, Such as are better miss'd than found,
To meet with Highland plunderers here Were worse than loss of steed or deer—

315 I am alone,—my bugle-strain
May call some straggler of the train, Or, fall the worst that may betide, Ere now this falchion² has been tried "

But scarce again his horn he wound,

320 When lo! forth starting at the sound,
From underneath an aged oak,
That slanted from the islet rock,
A damsel guider of its way,
A little skiff shot to the bay,

325 That round the promontory steep

Led its deep line in graceful sweep, Eddying, in almost viewless wave,
The weeping willow-twig to lave,
And kiss, with whispering sound and slow, 330 The beach of pebbles bright as snow
The boat had touch'd this silver strand,
Just as the hunter left his stand,
And stood conceal'd amid the brake,
To view this Lady of the Lake.

315 The maiden paused, as if again
She thought to catch the distant strain
With head up-raised, and look intent,
And eye and ear attentive bent,
And locks flung back, and lips apart, 340 Like monument of Grecian art,
In listening mood,—she seem'd to stand,
The guardian Naiad of the strand.

And ne'er did Grecian chisel trace A Nymph, a Naiad, or a Grace

345 Of finer form, or lovelier face!
What though the sun, with ardent frown,
Had slightly tinged her cheek with brown;
The sportive toil, which, short and light,
Had dyed her glowing hue so bright, 350 Served too in hastier swell to show Short glimpses of a breast of snow:
What though no rule of courtly grace
To measured mood had train'd her pace;
A foot more light, a step more true, 355 Ne'er from the heath-flower dash'd the dew,

E'en the slight harebell raised its head,
Elastic from her airy tread:
What though upon her speech there hung
The accents of the mountain tongue, 360 Those silver sounds, so soft, so dear,
The listener held his breath to hear!

A chieftain's daughter seemed the maid,
Her satin snood,¹ her silken plaid,
Her golden brooch, such birth betray'd.

365 And seldom was a snood amid Such wild luxuriant ringlets hid, Whose glossy black to shame might bring The plumage of the raven's wing;
And seldom o'er a breast so fair,

370 Mantled a plaid with modest care,
And never brooch the folds combin'd
Above a heart more true and kind.
Her kindness and her worth to spy,
You need but gaze on Ellen's eye,

375 Not Katrine, in her mirror blue, Gives back the shaggy banks more true,
Than every free-born glance confess'd
The guileless movements of her breast, Whether joy danced in her dark eye,

385 One only passion unreveal'd,
With maiden pride the maid conceal'd,
Yet not less purely felt the flame,— O need I tell that passion's name?

Impatient of the silent horn, 390 Now on the gale her voice was borne — "Father!" she cried, the rocks around Loved to prolong the gentle sound Awhile she paused, no answer came;
"Malcolm, was thine the blast?" the name 395 Less resolutely utter'd fell;
The echoes could not catch the swell
"A stranger I," the huntsman said, Advancing from the hazel shade.
The maid, alarm'd, with hasty oar,

100 Push'd her light shallop¹ from the shore,
And when a space was gain'd between,
Closer she drew her bosom's screen.
(So forth the startled swan would swing, So turn to prune his ruffled wing.) 405 Then safe, though flutter'd and amazed,
She paused, and on the stranger gazed.
Not his the form, nor his the eye,
That youthful maidens wont to fly

On his bold visage nuzzle age 410 Had slightly press'd its signet sage, Yet had not quench'd the open truth
And fiery vehemence of youth;
Forward and frolic glee was there,
The will to do, the soul to dare, 415 The sparkling glance, soon blown to fire,
Of hasty love, or headlong ire
His limbs were cast in manly mould,
For hardy sports or contest bold;
And though in peaceful garb array'd, 420 And weaponless, except his blade,
His stately mien as well implied
A high-born heart, a martial pride,
As if a haon's crest he wore,
And sheathed in armor trode the shore.
425 Slighting the petty need he show'd,
He told of his benighted road;
His ready speech flow'd fair and free,
In phrase of gentlest courtesy;
Yet seem'd that tone, and gesture bland, 430 Less used to sue than to command.

Awhile the maid the stranger eyed,
And, reassured, at length replied, That Highland halls were open still

"Now, by the rood,⁴ my lovely maid, Your courtesy has err'd," he said, 445 "No right have I to claim, misplaced,
The welcome of expected guest.
A wanderer, here by fortune tost,
My way, my friends, my courser lost,
I ne'er before, believe me, fair, 450 Have ever drawn your mountain air, Till on this lake's romantic strand
I found a fay in fairy land!"

"I well believe," the maid replied,
As her light skiff approach'd the side, 455 "I well believe that ne'er before Your foot has trod Loch Katrine's shore,
But yet, as far as yesternight,
Old Allan-Bane foretold your plight,— A gray-han'd sue, whose eye intent 460 Was on the vision'd future bent.
He saw your steed, a dappled gray,
Lie dead beneath the birchen way,
Painted exact your form and mien,
Your hunting suit of Lincoln green, 465 That tassell'd horn so gaily gilt,
That falchion's crooked blade and hilt,
That cap with heron plumage trim,
And yon two hounds so dark and grim He bade that all should ready be 470 To grace a guest of fair degree,¹ But light I held his prophecy,
And deem'd it was my father's horn Whose echoes o'er the lake were borne "

The stranger smiled "Since to your home 475 A destined errant-knight I come, Announced by prophet sooth and old,
Doom'd, doubtless, for achievement bold,
I'll lightly front each high emprise
For one kind glance of those bright eyes 480 Permit me, first, the task to guide Your fairy frigate o'er the tide "
The maid, with smile suppress'd and sly,
The toil unwonted saw him try;
For seldom sure, if e'er before,

 495 'Twas all so close with copsewood bound, Nor track nor pathway might declare That human foot frequented there, Until the mountain-warden show'd
 A clambering unsuspected road, 500 That winded through the tangled screen
 And open'd on a narrow green,
 Where weeping birch and willow round
 With their long fibres swept the ground.
 Here, for retreat in dangerous hour, 505 Some chief had framed a rustic bower.

It was a lodge of ample size,
 But strange of structure and device;
 Of such materials, as around The workman's hand had readiest found, 510 Lopp'd off their boughs, their hoar trunks
 bared,

And by the hatchet rudely squared
 To give the walls their destined height
 The sturdy oak and ash unite, While moss and clay and leaves combin'd 515 To fence each crevice from the wind
 The lighter pine-trees, over-head,
 Their slender length for rafters spread,
 And wither'd heath and rushes div Supplied a russet canopy.

520 Due westward, fronting to the green,
 A rural portico was seen,
 Aloft on native pillars borne,
 Of mountain fir, with bark unshorn,
 Where Ellen's hand had taught to twine

525 The ivy and Idæan vine,¹
 The clematis, the favor'd flower
 Which boasts the name of virgin-bower,
 And every hardy plant could bear Loch Katrine's keen and searching air 530 An instant in this porch she staid,
 And gaily to the stranger said,
 "On heaven and on thy lady call,
 And enter the enchanted hall!"

"My hope, my heaven, my trust must be, 535 My gentle guide, in following thee"
 He cross'd the threshold—and a clang
 Of angry steel that instant rang.
 To his bold brow his spirit rush'd,
 But soon for vain alarm he blush'd 540 When on the floor he saw display'd.
 Cause of the din, a naked blade

Dropp'd from the sheath, that careless
 flung,

Upon a stag's huge antlers swung;
 For all around, the walls to grace, 545 Hung trophies of the fight or chase.
 A target¹ there, a bugle here,
 A battle-axe, a hunting-spear,
 And broadswords, bows, and arrows store,²
 With the tuck'd trophies of the boar 550 Here grins the wolf as when he died,
 And there the wild-cat's brindled hide
 The frontlet of the elk adorns,
 Or mantles o'er the bison's horns;
 555 Pennons and flags defaced and stain'd That blacken'd streaks of blood retain'd
 And deer-skins, dappled, dun, and white,
 With otter's fur and seal's unite,
 In rude and uncouth tapestry all,
 To garnish forth the silvan hall.

560 The wondering stranger round him gaz'd,
 And next the fallen weapon raised Few were the arms whose smewy strength Sufficed to stretch it forth at length,
 And as the brand he poised and sway'd,

565 "I never knew but one," he said,
 "Whose stalwart arms might brook to wield

A blade like this in battle-field."
 She sigh'd, then smiled and took the word
 "You see the guardian champion's sword.

570 As light it trembles in his hand,
 As in my grasp a hazel wand;
 My sue's tall form might grace the part Of Ferragus or Ascalart,
 But in the absent giant's hold 575 Are women now, and menials old"

The mistress of the mansion came,
 Mature of age, a graceful dame,
 Whose easy step and stately port
 Had well become a prince's court, 580 To whom, though more than kindred knew,³ Young Ellen gave a mother's due Meet welcome to her guest she made,
 And every courteous rite was paid
 That hospitality could claim.

585 Though all unmask'd his birth and name Such then the reverence to a guest,
 That fellest foe might join the feast,
 And from his deadliest foeman's door Unquestion'd turn, the banquet o'er

Which his brave sires, from age to age,
By their good swords have held with toil;
595 His sire had fallen in such turmoil,
And he, God wot, was forced to stand Oft for his right with blade in hand
This morning, with Lord Moray's train,
He chased a stalwart stag in vain, 600 Outstripp'd his comrades, miss'd the deer, Lost his good steed, and wander'd here "

Fain would the Knight in turn require
The name and state of Ellen's sire.
Well show'd the elder lady's mien, 605 That courts and cities she had seen, Ellen, though more her looks display'd
The simple grace of silvan maid,
In speech and gesture, form and face, Show'd she was come of gentle race 610 'Twere strange, in ruder rank to find Such looks, such manners, and such mien Each hint the Knight of Snowdown gave, Dame Margaret beaid with silence grave,
Or Ellen, innocently gay, 615 Turn'd all inquiry light away—
"Weird women! we! by dale and down!
We dwell, afar from tower and town
We stem the flood, we ride the blast,
On wandering knights our spells we cast.
620 While viewless minstrels touch the string,
'Tis thus our charmed rhymes we sing."
She sung, and still a harp unseen Fill'd up the symphony between

SONG

Soldier rest! thy warfare o'er,
625 Sleep the sleep that knows not breaking,
Dream of battled fields no more,
Days of danger, nights of waking
In our isle's enchanted hall,
Hands unseen thy couch are strewing, 630 Fairy strains of music fall, Every sense in slumber dewing
Soldier, rest! thy warfare o'er,
Dream of fighting fields no more;
Sleep the sleep that knows not breaking,
635 Morn of toil, nor night of waking

No rude sound shall reach thine ear, Armor's clang, or war-steed champing, Trump² nor pibroch³ summon here
Mustering clan, or squadron tramping 640 Yet the lark's shrill fife may come At the daybreak from the fallow,⁵
And the bittern sound his drum, Booming from the sedgy shallow Buder sounds shall none be near

Here's no war-steed's neigh and champing, Shouting clans or squadron's stamping.

She paused—then, blushing, led the lay
To grace the stranger of the day.
650 Her mellow notes awhile prolong The cadence of the flowing song,
Till to her lips in measured frame
The minstrel verse spontaneous came:—

SONG CONTINUED

Huntsman, rest! thy chase is done, 655 While our alumbrous spells assail ye, Dream not, with the rising sun,
Bugles here shall sound reveille,¹ Sleep! the deer is in his den, Sleep! thy hounds are by thee lying, 660 Sleep! nor dream in yonder glen How thy gallant steed lay dying
Huntsman, rest! thy chase is done,
Think not of the rising sun,
For, at dawning to assail ye, 665 Here no bugles sound reveille.

The hall was cleared—the stranger's bed
Was there of mountain heathers spread.
Where oft a hundred guests had lain,
And dream'd their forest sports again 670 But vainly did the heath-flower shed Its moorland fragrance round his head,
Not Ellen's spell had lull'd to rest
The fever of his troubled breast
In broken dreams the image rose 675 Of varied perils, pains, and woes
His steed now flounders in the brake, Now smks his barge upon the lake,
Now leader of a broken host,
His standard falls, his honor's lost.
680 Then,—from my couch may heavenly
night
Chase that worst phantom of the night!—
Again return'd the scenes of youth,
On confident undoubting truth,
Again his soul he interchanged 685 With friends whose hearts were long estranged
They come, in dim procession led,
The cold, the faithless, and the dead,
As warm each hand, each brow as gay,
As if they parted yesterday 690 And doubt distracts him at the view—O were his senses false or true?
Dream'd he of death, or broken vow,
Or is it all a vision now?

At length, with Ellen in a grove 695 He seem'd to walk, and speak of love;

¹ morning signal summoning soldiers to the duties of the day

She listen'd with a blush and sigh,
 His suit was warm, his hopes were high.
 He sought her yielded hand to clasp,
 And a cold gauntlet met his grasp:
 700 The phantom's sex had changed and
 gone,
 Upon its head a helmet shone;
 Slowly enlarged to giant size,
 With darken'd cheek and threatening
 eyes,
 The grisly visage, stern and hoar, 705 To Ellen still a likeness bore
 He woke, and, panting with affright, Recall'd the vision of the night.
 The hearth's decaying brands were red,
 And deep and dusky lustre shed, 710 Half showing, half concealing, all The uncouth trophies of the hall.
 'Mid those the stranger fix'd his eye,
 Where that huge falchion hung on high,
 And thoughts on thoughts, a countless
 throng,
 715 Rush'd, chasing countless thoughts along Until, the giddy whirl to cure,
 He rose, and sought the moonshine pure.

 The wild-rose, eglantine, and broom,
 Wasted around their rich perfume, 720 The birch-trees wept in fragrant balm,
 The aspens slept beneath the calm,
 The silver light, with quivering glance,
 Play'd on the water's still expanse.
 Wild were the heart whose passion's
 sway
 725 Could rage beneath the sober ray!
 He felt its calm, that warrior guest,
 While to us he communed with his breast.
 "Why is it, at each turn I trace Some memory of that exiled race?" 730 "Can I not mountain-maiden spy, But she must bear the Douglas eye?
 Can I not view a Highland brand,
 But it must match the Douglas hand?
 Can I not frame a fever'd dream, 735 But still the Douglas is the theme?
 I'll dream no more; by manly mind
 Not even in sleep is will resign'd My midnight orisons¹ said o'er, I'll turn to rest, and dream no more."
 740 His midnight orisons he told,
 A prayer with every bead of gold, Consign'd to heaven his cares and woes,
 And sunk in undisturb'd repose;
 Until the heath-cock shrilly crew, 745 And morning dawn'd on Benvenue

BOAT SONG

Hail to the chief who in triumph advances!
 Honor'd and bless'd be the evergreen pine!
 Long may the tree, in his banner that glances,
 Flourish, the shelter and grace of our line!
 5 Heaven send it happy dew,
 Earth lend it sap anew,
 Gayly to bourgeon,¹ and broadly to grow, While every Highland glen Sends our shout back agen,
 10 Roderigh Vich Alpine dhu,² ho, ieroe!

 Ours is no sapling, chance-sown by the fountain,
 Blooming at Beltane,³ in winter to fade, When the whirlwind has stripp'd every leaf on the mountain,
 The more shall Clan-Alpine exult in her
 shade.
 15 Moor'd in the rifted rock, Proof to the tempest's shock,
 Firmer he roots him the ruder it blow, Menteith and Breadalbane, then,
 Echo his praise again,
 20 Roderigh Vich Alpine dhu, ho! ieroe!

 Proudly our pibroch has thrill'd in Glen Fruin,
 And Bannochair's groans to our slogan replied,
 Glen Luss and Ross-dhu, they are smoking in ruin,
 And the best of Loch Lomond lie dead on her side 25 Widow and Saxon maid Long shall lament our raid, Think of Clan-Alpine with fear and with
 woe;
 Lennox and Leven-glen Shake when they hear again,
 30 Roderigh Vich Alpine dhu, ho! ieroe!

 Row, vassals, row, for the pride of the Highlands!
 Stretch to your oars, for the evergreen
 pine!
 O! that the rose-bud that graces you islands
 Were wreathed in a garland around him to twine!

CORONACH¹

- He is gone on the mountain,
He is lost to the forest,
Like a summer-dried fountain,
When our need was the sorest 5 The font, reappearing,
From the rain-drops shall borrow,
But to us comes no cheering,
To Duncan no morrow!

- The hand of the reaper 10 Takes the ears that are hoary, But the voice of the weeper Wails manhood in glory.
The autumn winds rushing Waft the leaves that are searest, 15 But our flower was in flushing, When blighting was nearest.

- Fleet foot on the corrie,² Sage counsel in cumber,³
Red hand in the foray, 20 How sound is thy slumber!
Like the dew on the mountain,
Like the foam on the river,
Like the bubble on the fountain,
Thou art gone, and forever!

CANTO VI THE GUARD-ROOM

- The sun, awakening, through the smoky air
Of the dark city casts a sullen glance, Rousing each catiff to his task of care,
Of sinful men the sad inheritance.
5 Summoning the revellers from the lagging
dance,
Scaring the prowling robber to his den, Gilding on battled tower the warder's
lance,
And warning student pale to leave his pen,
And yield his drowsy eyes to the kind nurse of men
10 What various scenes, and, O! what scenes of woe,
Are witness'd by that red and struggling beam!

¹ lament² hollow in a hill, the resort of game³ trouble

- The fever'd patient, from his pallet low, Through crowded hospital beholds its
stream,
The ruin'd maiden trembles at its gleam, 15 The debtor wakes to thought of gyve and jail,
The love-lorn wretch starts from tormenting dream,
The wakeful mother, by the glimmering
pale,
Trims her sick infant's couch, and soothes his feeble wail.

- At dawn the towers of Stirling rang 20 With soldier-step and weapon-clang, While drums, with rolling note, foretell Relief to weary sentinel.
Through narrow loop and casement bair'd,
The sunbeams sought the Court of Guard, 25 And, struggling with the smoky air, Deaden'd the torches' yellow glare.
In comfortless alliance shone
The lights through arch of blacken'd stone,
And show'd wild shapes in garb of war, 30 Faces deform'd with beard and scar,
All haggard from the midnight watch,
And fever'd with the stern debauch,
For the oak table's massive board, Flooded with wine, with fragments stored, 35 And beakers drain'd, and cups o'er-
thrown,
Show'd in what sport the night had flown
Some, weary, snored on floor and bench,
Some labor'd still their thirst to quench;
Some, chill'd with watching, spread their hands
40 O'er the huge chimney's dying brands, While round them, or beside them flung,
At every step their harness rung

- These drew not for their fields the sword, Like tenants of a feudal lord, 45 Nor own'd the patriarchal claim Of chieftain in their leader's name, Adventurers they, from far who roved,
To live by battle which they loved.
There the Italian's clouded face, 50 The swarthy Spaniard's there you trace.
The mountain-loving Switzer there More freely breathed in mountain-air,
The Fleming there despised the soil,
That paid so ill the laborer's toil; 55 Their rolls show'd French and German
name;
And merry England's exiles came,
To share, with ill conceal'd disdain,
Of Scotland's pay the scanty gain
All brave in arms, well train'd to wield

- 60 The heavy halberd,¹ brand, and shield;
In camps licentious, wild, and bold;
In pillage fierce and uncontroll'd;
And now, by holytide² and feast,
From rules of discipline released.
- 65 They held debate of bloody fray, Fought 'twixt Loch Katrine and Achray Fierce was their speech, and, 'mid their
words,
Their hands oft grappled to their swords;
Nor sunk their tone to spare the ear
- 70 Of wounded comrades groaning near,
Whose mangled limbs, and bodies gored, Bore token of the mountain sword, Though, neighboring to the Court of Guard,
Their prayers and feverish wails were
heard;
- 75 Sad burden to the ruffian joke,
And savage oath by fury spoke!
At length up-started John of Brent,
A yeoman from the banks of Trent;
A stranger to respect or fear,
- 80 In peace a chaser of the deer,
In host³ a hardy mutineer,
But still the boldest of the crew,
When deed of danger was to do.
He grieved, that day, their games cut short,
- 85 And marr'd the dicer's brawling sport,
And shouted loud, "Renew the bowl!
And, while a merry catch I troll,⁴ Let each the buxom chorus bear, Like brethren of the brand and spear:—

The ripe ruddy dew of a woman's dear lip, Says, that Beelzebub lurks in her kerchief

And Apollyon shoots darts from her merry

The warder's challenge, heard without,
Staid in mid-roar the merry shout.

110 A soldier to the portal went,— "Here is old Bertram, sirs, of Ghent;
And, beat for jubilee the drum!
A maid and minstrel with him come."
Bertram, a Fleming, gray and scarr'd, 115 Was entering now the Court of Guard,
A harper with him, and in plaid
All muffled close, a mountain maid,
Who backward shrunk to 'scape the view Of the loose scene and boisterous crew.

120 "What news?" they roar'd. "I only
know,
From noon till eve we fought with foe,
As wild and as untameable
As the rude mountains where they dwell;
On both sides store of blood is lost, 125 Nor much success can either boast."
"But whence thy captives, friend? such spoil
As theirs must needs reward thy toil.
Old dost thou wax, and wars grow sharp;
Thou now hast glee-maiden³ and harp!
130 Get thee an ape, and trudge the land,
The leader of a juggler band."

"No, comrade; no such fortune mine.
After the fight these sought our line,
That aged harper and the girl, 135 And, having audience of the Earl, Mar bade I should purvey them steed,
And bring them hitherward with speed.
Forbear your mirth and rude alarm,
For none shall do them shame or harm." 140 "Hear ye his boast?" cried John of Brent,
Ever to strife and jangling bent;
"Shall he strike doe beside our lodge,
And yet the jealous niggard grudge
To pay the forester his fee?
145 I'll have my share, howe'er it be, Despite of Moray, Mar, or thee."
Bertram his forward step withstood;
And, burning in his vengeful mood,
Old Allan, though unfit for strife,

150 Laid hand upon his dagger-knife, But Ellen boldly stepp'd between,
And dropp'd at once the tartan screen.
So, from his morning cloud, appears
The sun of May, through summer tears.
155 The savage soldiery, amazed,
As on descended angel gazed;
Even hardy Brent, abash'd and tamed, Stood half admiring, half ashamed.

Boldly she spoke, "Soldiers, attend!
160 My father was the soldier's friend, Cheer'd him in camps, in marches led,
And with him in the battle bled
Not from the valiant, or the strong, Should exile's daughter suffer wrong" 165 Answer'd De Brent, most forward still In every feat or good or ill—
"I shame me of the part I play'd And thou an outlaw's child, poor maid!
An outlaw I by forest laws, 170 And merry Needwood knows the cause.
Poor Rose—if Rose be living now"— He wiped his iron eye and brow—
"Must bear such age, I think, as thou.
Hear ye, my mates,—I go to call 175 The captain of our watch to hall
There lies my halberd on the floor:
And he that steps my halberd o'er,
To do the maid injurious part,
My shaft shall quiver in his heart!
180 Beware loose speech, or jesting rough: Ye all know John de Brent. Enough."

Their captain came, a gallant young,
(Of Tulibardine's house he sprung,) Nor wore he yet the spurs of knight; 185 Gay was his mien, his humor light,
And, though by courtesy controll'd, Forward his speech, his bearing bold,
The high-born maiden ill could brook
The scanning of his curious look 190 And dauntless eye;—and yet, in sooth, Young Lewis was a generous youth:
But Ellen's lovely face and mien, Ill suited to the garb and scene,
Might lightly bear construction strange, 195 And give loose fancy scope to range.
"Welcome to Stirling towers, fair maid!
Come ye to seek a champion's aid,
On palfrey white, with harper hoar,
Like errant¹ damosel of yore?
200 Does thy high quest a knight require,
Or may the venture suit a squire?"
Her dark eye flash'd; she paused and sigh'd,
"O what have I to do with pride!

Through scenes of sorrow, shame, and strife.

205 A suppliant for a father's life,
I crave an audience of the King Behold, to back my suit, a ring,
The royal pledge of grateful claims, Given by the Monarch to Fitz-James" 210 The signet-ring young Lewis took,
With deep respect and alter'd look,
And said, "Thus ring our duties own,
And pardon, if to worth unknown,
In semblance mean obscurely veil'd, 215 Lady, in aught my folly fail'd Soon as the day flings wide his gates,
The King shall know what suitor waits.
Plea-se you, meanwhile, in fitting bowel, Repose you till his waking hour, 220 Female attendance shall obey Your heat, for service or array Permit I marshall you the way"
But, ere she followed, with the grace
And open bounty of her race, 225 She bade her slender purse be shared Among the soldiers of the guard
The rest with thanks their guerdon took,
But Brent, with shy and awkward look,
On the reluctant maiden's hold 230 Forced bluntly back the proffer'd gold—
"Forgive a haughty English heart, And O forget its ruder part!
The vacant purse shall be my share,
Which in my barret-cap¹ I'll bear, 235 Perchance, in jeopardy of war, Where gayer crests may keep afar"
With thanks ('twas all she could) the maid
His rugged courtesy repaid

When Ellen forth with Lewis went, 240 Allan made suit to John of Brent:
"My lady safe, O let your grace Give me to see my master's face!
His minstrel I; to share his doom Bound from the cradle to the tomb;
245 Tenth in descent, since first my sires Waked for his noble house their lyres;
Nor one of all the race was known But prized its weal above their own.
With the chief's birth begins our care;
250 Our harp must soothe the infant hen, Teach the youth tales of fight, and grace
His earliest feat of field or chase;
In peace, in war, our rank we keep,
We cheer his board, we soothe his sleep,
Nor leave him till we pour our verse, 255 A doleful tribute! o'er his hearse.
Then let me share his captive lot;

¹ A kind of small cap formerly worn by soldiers

- It is my right, deny it not!"
 "Little we reck," said John of Brent, 260 "We Southern men, of long descent; Nor wot¹ we how a name, a word,
 Makes clansmen vassals to a lord.
 Yet kind my noble landlord's part.— God bless the house of Beaudeसर!
 265 And, but I loved to drive the deer,
 More than to guide the laboring steer,
 I had not dwelt an outcast here Come, good old Minstrel, follow me, Thy lord and chieftain shalt thou see."
- 270 Then, from a rusted iron hook, A bunch of ponderous keys he took, Lighted a torch, and Allan led Through grated arch and passage dread; Portals they pass'd, where, deep within, 275 Spoke prisoner's moan, and fetters' din, Through rugged vaults, where, loosely stored,
 Lay wheel, and axe, and headsman's sword,
 And many an hideous engine² grim,
 For wrenching joint, and crushing limb.
 280 By artist form'd, who deem'd it shame
 And sin to give them work a name
 They halted at a low-brow'd porch,
 And Brent to Allan gave the torch,
 While bolt and chain he backward roll'd, 285 And made the bar unhasp its hold They enter'd 'twas a prison-room
 Of stern security and gloom,
 Yet not a dungeon, for the day
 Through lofty gratings found its way, 290 And rude and antique garniture Deck'd the sad walls and oaken floor,
 Such as the rugged days of old Deem'd fit for captive noble's hold "Here," said De Brent, "thou mayst
 remain
 295 Till the leech visit him again.
 Strict is his charge, the warders tell,
 To tend the noble prisoner well."
 Retiring then, the bolt he drew,
 And the lock's murmurs growl'd anew 300 Roused at the sound, from lowly bed
 A captive feebly raised his head;
 The wondering Minstrel look'd, and knew Not his dear lord, but Roderick Dhu!
 For, come from where Clan-Alpine fought, 305 They, erring, deem'd the Chief he sought.
- As the tall ship, whose lofty prow³ Shall never stem the billows more, Deserted by her gallant band,
 Amid the breakers lies astrand, 310 So, on his couch, lay Roderick Dhu!
- And oft his fever'd limbs he threw In toss abrupt, as when her sides Lie rocking in the advancing tides,
 That shake her frame with ceaseless beat, 315 Yet cannot leave her from her seat,
 O! how unlike her course at sea!
 Or his free step on hill and lea!
 Soon as the Minstrel he could scan,
 "What of thy lady? of my clan?
 320 My mother? Douglas? tell me all?
 Have they been ruin'd in my fall?
 Ah, yes! or wherefore art thou here?
 Yet speak, speak boldly, do not fear."
 (For Allan, who his mood well knew, 325 Was choked with grief and terror too!—
 "Who fought—who fled? Old man, be brief;
 Some might—for they had lost their chief Who basely live! who bravely died?"
 "O, calm thee, Chief!" the Minstrel cried 330 "Ellen is safe"—"For that, thank
 Heaven!"
 "And hopes are for the Douglas given.
 The Lady Margaret, too, is well,
 And, for thy clan,—on field or fell,
 Has never harp of minstrel told, 335 O! combat fought so true and bold.
 Thy stately pine is yet unbent, Though many a goodly bough is rent "
- The Chieftain rear'd his form on high,
 And fever's fire was in his eye, 340 But ghastly, pale, and livid streaks Chequer'd his swarthy brow and cheeks
 "Hark, Minstrel! I have heard thee play,
 With measure bold, on festal day,
 In yon lone isle,—again where ne'er 345 Shall harper play, or warrior hear!— That stirring air that peals on high, O'er Dermid's race! on victory Strike it! and then (for well thou canst)
 Free from thy minstrel-spirit glanced, 350 Fling me the picture of the fight When met my clan the Saxon might I'll listen, till my fancy hears
 The clang of swords, the crash of spears!
 These grates, these walls, shall vanish then, 355 For the fair field of fighting men.
 And my free spirit burst away
 As if it soar'd from battle fray"
 The trembling Bard with awe obey'd, Slow on the harp his hand he laid, 360 But soon remembrance of the sight
 He witness'd from the mountain's height,
 With what old Bertram told at night,
 Awaken'd the full power of song,
 And bore him in career along—

BATTLE OF BEAL' AN DUINE

The Minstrel came once more to view 370 The eastern ridge of Benvenue, For, ere he parted, he would say Farewell to lovely Loch Achray:
Where shall he find, in foreign land,
So lone a lake, so sweet a strand!
375 There is no breeze upon the fern,
Nor ripple on the lake,
Upon her eyry¹ nods the erne,²
The deer has sought the brake;
The small birds will not sing aloud, 380 The springing trout lies still,
So darkly glooms yon thunder cloud,
That swathes, as with a purple shroud,

Is it the thunder's solemn sound 385 That mutters deep and dread, Or echoes from the groaning ground
The warrior's measured tread?
Is it the lightning's quivering glance
That on the thicket streams, 390 Or do they flash on spear and lance
The sun's retiring beams?
I see the dagger-crest of Mar,
I see the Moray's silver star Wave o'er the cloud of Saxon war, 395 That up the lake comes winding far!
To hero bound for battle-strife,
Or hard of martial lay,
'Twere worth ten years of peaceful life,
One glance at their array!

Survey'd the tangled ground,
Their centre ranks, with pike and spear,
A twilight forest frown'd;
Their barded³ horsemen, in the rear, 405 The stern battalia⁴ crown'd.
No cymbal clash'd, no clarion rang,
Still were the pipe and drum;
Save heavy tread, and armor's clang,
The sullen march was dumb 410 There breathed no wind their crests to shake,
Or wave their flags abroad;
Scarcely the frail aspen seem'd to quake,
That shadow'd o'er their road
Their vaward⁵ scouts no tidings bring,

Where rise no rocks its pride to brave, 420 High-swelling, dark, and slow
The lake is pass'd, and now they gain

A narrow and a broken plain,
Before the Trossachs' rugged jaws;
And here the horse and spearmen pause, 425 While, to explore the dangerous glen,
Dive through the pass the archer-men.

At once there rose so wild a yell Within that dark and narrow dell,
As all the fiends, from heaven that fell, 430 Had peal'd the banner-cry of hell!
Forth from the pass in tumult driven,
Like chaff before the wind of heaven,
The archery appear;
For life! for life! their flight they ply—435 And shriek, and shout, and battle-cry,
And plaids and bonnets waving high,
And broadswords flashing to the sky,
Are maddening in the rear.
Onward they drive, in dreadful race, 440 Pursuers and pursued;
Before that tide of flight and chase,
How shall it keep its rooted place,
The spearmen's twilight wood?
"Down, down," cried Mar, "your lances
down!
445 Bear back both fiend and foe!"
Like reeds before the tempest's frown,
That serried grove of lances brown
At once lay level'd low,
And closely shouldering side to side, 450 The bristling ranks the onset bide
"We'll quell the savage mountaineer,
As their Tinchel¹ cows the game!
They come as fleet as forest deer, We'll drive them back as tame" 455 Bearing before them, in their course,
The relics of the archer force,
Like wave with crest of sparkling foam,
Right onward did Clan-Alpine come Above the tide, each broadsword bright 460 Was brandishing like beam of light, Each target² was dark below;
And with the ocean's mighty swing,
When heaving to the tempest's wing,
They hurl'd them on the foe 465 I heard the lance's shivering crash,
As when the whirlwind rends the ash,
I heard the broadsword's deadly clang,
As if a hundred anvils rang!
But Moray wheel'd his rearward rank 470 Of horsemen on Clan-Alpine's flank,
"My banner-man, advance!
I see," he cried, "their column shake.
Now, gallants! for your ladies' sake, Upon them with the lance!"
475 The horsemen dash'd among the rout, As deer break through the broom;
Their steeds are stout, their swords are out,
They soon make lightsome room.
Clan-Alpine's best are backward borne!
480 Where, where was Roderick then?
One blast upon his bugle-horn
Were worth a thousand men!

And reſluent through the paſs of fear,
The battle's tide was pour'd;
485 Vanish'd the Saxon's ſtruggling ſpear, Vanish'd the mountain-ſword
As Bracklinn's chasm, ſo black and ſteep,

Mine ear but heard the ſullen ſound,
Which like an earthquake ſhook the ground,
And ſpoke the ſtern and deſperate ſtrife
That parts not but with parting life, 515 Seeming, to minſtel ear, to toll
The duſe of many a paſſing ſoul Nearer it comes, the dim-wood glen The martial flood diſgorged again,
But not in mingled tide, 520 The plaided warriors of the North High on the mountain thunder forth
And overhang its ſide;
While by the lake below appears
The dark'ning cloud of Saxon ſpears.
525 At weary bay each ſhatter'd band, Eyeing their foemen, ſternly ſtand;
Their banners ſteam like tatter'd ſail,
That flings its fragments to the gale,
And broken arms and diſarray 530 Mark'd the fell havoc of the day.

Viewing the mountain's ridge aſkance
The Saxons ſtood in ſullen trance, Till Moray pointed with his lance,
And cried—"Behold yon iſle!"
535 See! none are left to guard its ſtrand, But women weak, that wring the hand.
'Tis there of yore the robber band
Their booty wont to pile;

545 On earth his caſque and corſlet rung,
He plunged him in the wave:
All ſaw the deed, the purpoſe knew,
And to their clamors Benvenue
A mingled echo gave;
550 The Saxons ſhout, their mate to cheer,
The helpless females ſcream for fear,
And yells for rage the mountaineer.
'Twas then, as by the outery riven, Pour'd down at once the lowering heaven.
555 A whirlwind ſwept Loch Katrine's breaſt, Her billows rear'd their ſnowy creſt
Well for the ſwimmer ſwell'd they high,
To mar the Highland marksman's eye,
For round him ſhower'd, 'mid rain and hail, 560 The vengeful arrows of the Gael
In vain; he nears the iſle, and lo!
His hand is on a ſhallop's bow.
Juſt then a flaſh of lightning came,
It tinged the waves and ſtrand with flame;
565 I mark'd Duneraggan's widow'd dame,¹ Behind an oak I ſaw her ſtand,
A naked dirk gleamed in her hand.
It darken'd, but, amid the moan
Of waves, I heard a dying groan, 570 Another flaſh!—the ſpearman floats
A weltering corſe beſide the boats,
And the ſtern matron o'er him ſtood,
Her hand and dagger ſtreaming blood.

"Revenge! revenge!" the Saxons cried,
The Gaels' exulting ſhout replied.
Deſpite the elemental rage, Again they hurried to engage;
But, ere they cloſed in deſperate fight, Bloody with ſpurring came a knight, 580 Sprung from his horſe, and, from a crag, Waved 'twixt the hoſts a milk-white flag Clarion and trumpet by his ſide Rung forth a tunc-note high and wide, While, in the Monarch's name, afar

His parting breath, stout Roderick Dhu!
 Old Allan-bane look'd on aghast, 605 While grim and still his spirit pass'd:
 But when he saw that life was fled,
 He pour'd his wailing o'er the dead:

LAMENT

And art thou cold and lowly laid,
 Thy foeman's dread, thy people's aid, 610 Breadalbane's boast, Clan-Alpine's shade!
 For thee shall none a requiem say!
 For thee, who loved the minstrel's lay,
 For thee, of Bothwell's house the stay,
 The shelter of her exiled line, 615 E'en in this prison-house of thine, I'll wail for Alpine's honor'd pine!

What groans shall yonder valleys fill!
 What shrieks of grief shall rend yon hill!
 What tears of burning rage shall thrill, 620 When mourns thy tribe thy battles done, Thy fall before the race was won,
 Thy sword ungirt ere set of sun!
 There breathes not clansman of thy line,
 But would have given his life for thine 625 O, woe for Alpine's honor'd pine!

Sad was thy lot on mortal stage!
 The captive thrush may brook the cage,
 The prison'd eagle dies for rage Brave spirit, do not scorn my strain!
 630 And, when its notes awake again,
 Even she, so long beloved in vain,
 Shall with my harp her voice combine,
 And mix her woe and tears with mine.
 To wail Clan-Alpine's honor'd pine

635 Ellen the while with bursting heart Remain'd in lordly bower apart,
 Where play'd with many-color'd gleams,
 Through storied pane¹ the rising beams.
 In vain on gilded roof they fall, 640 And lighten'd up a tapestried wall,
 And for her use a menial train
 A rich collation spread in vain.
 The banquet proud, the chamber gay, Scarce drew one curious glance astray, 645 Or, if she look'd, 'twas but to say,
 With better omen dawn'd the day
 In that lone isle, where waved on high
 The dun-deer's hide for canopy;
 Where oft her noble father shared 650 The simple meal her care prepared, While Lufra, crouching by her side
 Her station claim'd with jealous pride,
 And Douglas, bent on woodland game,
 Spoke of the chase to Malcolm Græme, 655 Whose answer, oft at random made,
 The wandering of his thoughts betray'd.
 Those who such simple joys have known,

Are taught to prize them when they're gone.

But sudden, see, she lifts her head!
 660 The window seeks with cautious tread.
 What distant music has the power To win her in this woful hour!
 'Twas from a turret that o'erhung Her latticed bower, the strain was sung:

LAY OF THE IMPRISONED HUNTSMAN

665 My hawk is tired of perch and hood,
 My idle greyhound loathes his food,
 My horse is weary of his stall,
 And I am sick of captive thrall.

I wish I were, as I have been,
 670 Hunting the hart in forest green,
 With bended bow and bloodhound free,
 For that's the life is meet for me.

I hate to learn the ebb of time
 From yon dull steeple's drowsy chime, 675 Or mark it as the sunbeams crawl, Inch after inch, along the wall

The lark was wont my matins ring,
 The sable rook my vespers sing,
 These towers, although a king's they be, 680 Have not a hall of joy for me

No more at dawning morn I rise,
 And sun myself in Ellen's eyes,
 Drive the fleet deer the forest through,
 And homeward wend with evening dew;

685 A blithesome welcome blithely meet,
 And lay my trophies at her feet,
 While fled the eve on wing of glee:
 That life is lost to love and me!

The heart-sick lay was hardly said, 690 The list'ner had not turn'd her head,
 It trickled still, the starting tear,
 When light a footstep struck her ear,
 And Snowdoun's graceful knight was near.
 She turn'd the hastier, lest again 695 The prisoner should renew his strain,
 "O welcome, brave Fitz-James!" she said;
 "How may an almost orphan maid Pay the deep debt?"—"O say not so!
 To me no gratitude you owe 700 Not mine, alas! the boon to give,
 And bid thy noble father live;
 I can but be thy guide, sweet maid,
 With Scotland's king thy suit to aid.
 No tyrant he, though ire and pride 705 May lay his better mood aside.
 Come, Ellen, come! 'tis more than time,
 He holds his court at morning prime"
 With beating heart, and bosom wrung,
 As to a brother's arm she clung

² dawn (It is literally the first hour of prayer, or G A M)

710 Gently he dried the falling tear,
And gently whisper'd hope and cheer,
Her faltering steps half led, half stayed,
Through gallery fair, and high arcade, Till, at his touch, its wings of pride 715 A portal arch unfolded wide.

Within 'twas brilliant all and light,
A thronging scene of figures bright;
It glow'd on Ellen's dazzled sight,
As when the setting sun has given 720 Ten thousand hues to summer even,
And from their tissue fancy frames Aerial knights and fairy dames.
Still by Fitz-James her footing stayed;
A few faint steps she forward made, 725 Then slow her drooping head she raised,
And fearful round the presence gazed,
For him she sought, who own'd this state,
The dreaded prince whose will was fate.
She gazed on many a princely port, 730 Might well have ruled a royal court,
On many a splendid garb she gazed,
Then turn'd bewild'ring and amazed,
For all stood bare, and, in the room,
Fitz-James alone wore cap and plume.
735 To him each lady's look was lent,
On him each courtier's eye was bent;
Midst furs, and silks, and jewels sheen,
He stood, in simple Lincoln green,¹
The centre of the glittering ring.
740 And Snowdown's Knight is Scotland's King!

A wreath of snow, on mountain-breast,
Slides from the rock that gave it rest,
Poor Ellen glided from her stay,
And at the Monarch's feet she lay, 745 No word her choking voice commands,
She show'd the ring, she clasp'd her hands.
O! not a moment could he brook,
The generous prince, that suppliant look!
Gently he raised her, and, the while, 750 Check'd with a glance the circle's smile;
Graceful, but grave, her brow he kiss'd,
And bade her terrors be dismiss'd:
"Yes, fair, the wandering poor Fitz-James
The fealty of Scotland claims 755 To him thy woes, thy wishes, bring,
He will redeem his signet ring.
Ask nought for Douglas; yester even,
His prince and he have much forgiven.
Wrong hath he had from slanderous
tongue,
760 I, from his rebel kinsmen, wrong.
We would not, to the vulgar crowd,
Yield what they craved with clamor loud;
Calmly we heard and judged his cause,

Our council aided, and our laws.
765 I stanch'd thy father's death-feud stern With stout De Vaux and Gray Glencairn;
And Bothwell's Lord henceforth we own
The friend and bulwark of our throne.
But, lovely infidel, how now?
770 What clouds thy misbelieving brow?
Lord James of Douglas, lend thine aid, Thou must confirm this doubting maid."

Then forth the noble Douglas sprung,
And on his neck his daughter hung 775 The Monarch drank, that happy hour,
The sweetest, holiest draught of Power,
When it can say, with godlike voice,
Arise, sad Virtue, and rejoice!
Yet would not James the general eye 780 On Nature's raptures long should pry, He stepp'd between—"Nay, Douglas, nay, Steal not my proselyte away!
The riddle 'tis my right to read,
That brought this happy chance to speed."
785 Yes, Ellen, when disguised I stray In life's more low but happier way,
'Tis under name which veils my power,
Nor falsely veils, for Stirling's tower
Of yore the name of Snowdown claims, 790 And Normans call me James Fitz-James Thus watch I o'er insulted laws, Thus learn to right the injured cause."
Then, in a tone apart and low,—
"Ah, little traitress! none must know 795 What idle dream, what lighter thought, What vanity full dearly bought,
Join'd to thine eye's dark witchcraft, drew My spell-bound steps to Benvenue, In dangerous hour, and all but gave 800 Thy Monarch's life to mountain glaive!"² —Aloud he spoke—"Thou still dost hold That little talisman of gold, Pledge of my faith, Fitz-James's ring;
What seeks fair Ellen of the King?"

805 Full well the conscious maiden guess'd
He probed the weakness of her breast,
But, with that consciousness, there came A lightening of her fears for Grame,
And more she deem'd the Monarch's ire 810 Kindl'd 'gainst him, who, for her sire, Rebellious broadsword boldly drew;
And, to her generous feeling true,
She craved the grace of Roderick Dhu.
"Forbear thy suit, the King of kings 815 Alone can stay life's parting wings:
I know his heart, I know his hand, Have shared his cheer, and proved his brand."

My fairest earldom would I give To bid Clan-Alpine's Chieftain live!
 820 Hast thou no other boon to crave?
 No other captive friend to save?"
 Blushing, she turn'd her from the King,
 And to the Douglas gave the ring,
 As if she wish'd her sire to speak 825 The suit that stain'd her glowing cheek —
 "Nay, then, my pledge has lost its force,
 And stubborn justice holds her course Malcolm, come forth!" And at the word, Down kneel'd the Græme to Scotland's
 Lord

830 "For thee, rash youth, no suppliant sue,
 From thee may Vengeance claim her dues,
 Who, nurtured underneath our smile,
 Hast paid our care by treacherous wile,
 And sought, amid thy faithful clan, 835 A refuge for an outlaw'd man, Dishonoring thus thy loyal name Fetters and warder for the Græme!"
 His chain of gold the King unstrung,
 The links o'er Malcolm's neck he flung, 840 Then gently drew the glittering band,
 And laid the clasp on Ellen's hand

Harp of the North, farewell! The hills grow dark,
 On purple peaks a deeper shade descending,
 In twilight cope the glow-worm lights her spark,
 845 The deer, half-seen, are to the covert wending Resume thy wizzard elm! the fountain lending,
 And the wild breeze, thy wilder minstrelsy,
 Thy numbers sweet with nature's vespers
 blending,
 With distant echo from the fold and lea, 850 And herd-boy's evening pipe, and hum of housing bee.

Yet once again farewell, thou Minstrel harp!

Yet once again forgive my feeble sway,
 And little reck I of the censure sharp May idly cavil at an idle lay 855 Much have I owed thy strains on life's long way, Through secret woes the world has never known,
 When on the weary night dawn'd wearier
 day,
 And bitterer was the grief devour'd
 alone.
 That I o'erlive such woes, Enchantress! is thine own.

860 Hark! as my lingering footsteps slow retire,
 Some Spirit of the Air has waked thy string!
 'Tis now a seraph bold, with touch of fire,
 'Tis now the brush of Fairy's frolic
 wing
 Receding now, the dying numbers ring 865 Fainter and fainter down the rugged
 dell,
 And now the mountain breezes scarcely bring A wandering witch-note of the distant spell—
 And now, 'tis silent all!—Enchantress, fare thee well!

BRIGNALL BANKS

O, Brignall banks are wild and fair,
 And Greta woods are green,
 And you may gather garlands there Would grace a summer queen.
 5 And as I rode by Dalton-hall, Beneath the turrets high,
 A maiden on the castle wall
 Was singing merrily—
 "O Brignall banks are fresh and fair,
 10 And Greta woods are green,
 I'd rather rove with Edmund there, Than reign our English queen."
 "If, maiden, thou wouldst wend with me.

 And if thou canst that riddle read,
 As read full well you may,

Pibroch of Donuil Dhu, Pibroch of Donuil,
Wake thy wild voice anew,
Summon Clan-Conuil.

¹ trained² The hall was the public dwelling of the Teutonic chieftain, and the bower the private apartments, especially of the women. See Wordsworth's London, 4 (p 287)³ A kind of Highland bagpipe music.

5 Come away, come away,
Hark to the summons!
Come in your war array,
Gentles and commons.
10 'Come from deep glen, and From mountain so rocky,
The war-pipe and pennon
Are at Inverlochy.
Come every hill-plaid, and True heart that wears one.
15 Come every steel blade, and Strong hand that bears one.

Leave untended the herd,
The flock without shelter,
Leave the corpse uninterr'd, 20 The bride at the altar, Leave the deer, leave the steer,
Leave nets and barges.
'Come with your fighting gear, Broadswords and targes.¹

25 Come as the winds come, when Forests are rended,
'Come as the waves come, when Navies are stranded
Faster come, faster come, 30 Faster and faster,
'Chief, vassal, page and groom,
Tenant and master

Fast they come, fast they come,
See how they gather!
35 Wide waves the eagle plume, Blended with heather
'Cast your plaids, draw your blades, Forward, each man, set!
Pibroch of Donuil Dhu,
40 Knell for the onset!

THE DREARY CHANGE
 1817 1817

The sun upon the Weirclaw Hill,
 In Ettrick's vale, is sinking sweet;
 The westland wind is hush and still,
 The lake lies sleeping at my feet

5 Yet not the landscape to mine eye Bears those bright hues that once it
 bore,
 Though evening, with her richest dye,
 Flames o'er the hills of Ettrick's shore.

With listless look along the plain, 10 I see Tweed's silver current glide,
 And coldly mark the holy fane
 Of Melrose rise in ruin'd pride.
 The quiet lake, the balmy air,
 The hill, the stream, the tower, the

THE BAREFOOTED FRIAR

I'll give thee, good fellow, a twelvemonth or twain,
 To search Europe through from Byzantium to Spain;

But ne'er shall you find, should you search till you tire,
So happy a man as the Barefooted
Friar.

5 Your knight for his lady pricks forth in career,
And is brought home at even-song prick'd through with a spear,
I confess him in haste—for his lady desires
No comfort on earth save the Barefooted Friar's.

Your monarch?—Pshaw! many a prince has been known 10 To barter his robes for our cowl and our gown;
But which of us e'er felt the idle desire To exchange for a crown the gray hood of a Friar?

The Friar has walk'd out, and where'er he has gone,
The land and its fatness is mark'd for his
own, 15 He can roam where he lists, he can stop when he tires,
For every man's house is the Barefooted
Friar's

He's expected at noon, and no wight,¹ till he comes,
May profane the great chair, or the porridge of plums;
For the best of the cheer, and the seat by the fire,
20 Is the undenied right of the Barefooted Friar.

He's expected at night, and the pasty's made hot,
They broach² the brown ale, and they fill the black pot;
And the goodwife would wish the goodman in the mire, Ere he lack'd a soft pillow, the Barefooted Friar

25 Long flourish the sandal, the cord, and the cope,
The dread of the devil and trust of the Pope!
For to gather life's roses, unscathed by the brier,
Is granted alone to the Barefooted Friar

REBECCA'S HYMN

When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Out from the land of bondage came,
Her fathers' God before her moved,
An awful guide in smoke and flame¹ 5 By day, along the astonish'd lands
The cloudy pillar glided slow;
By night, Arabia's crimson'd sands Return'd the fiery column's glow

There rose the choral hymn of praise, 10 And trump and tumbrel² answer'd keen,
And Zion's daughters pour'd their lays,
With priest's and warrior's voice between.
No portents now our foes amaze, Forsaken Israel wanders lone 15 Our fathers would not know Thy ways,
And Thou hast left them to their own

But present still, though now unseen!
When brightly shines the prosperous
day,
Be thoughts of Thee a cloudy screen 20 To temper the deceitful ray And oh, when stoops on Judah's path
In shade and storm the frequent night,
Be Thou, long-suffering, slow to wrath,
A burning and a shining light!

25 Our harps we left by Babel's streams,
The tyrant's jest, the Gentile's scorn;
No censor round our altar beams,
And mute our tumbrel, harp, and horn
But Thou hast said, The blood of goat, 30 The flesh of rams I will not prize;
A contrite heart, a humble thought,
Are mine accepted sacrifice.³

THE SONG OF THE REIM-KENNAR²

Stern eagle of the far north-west, Thou that bearest in thy grasp the thunderbolt,

Thou whose rushing pinions stir ocean to madness,

Thou the destroyer of herds, thou the scatterer of navies,

5 Amidst the scream of thy rage,
Amidst the rushing of thy onward wings, Though thy scream be as loud as the cry of a perishing nation,

Though the rushing of thy wings be like the roar of ten thousand waves,

Yet hear, in thine ire and thy haste,

10 Hear thou the voice of the Reim-kennar

Thou hast met the pine-trees of Drontheim,

Their dark-green heads lie prostrate beside their up-rooted stems,

Thou hast met the rider of the ocean,
The tall, the strong bark of the fearless
lover,

15 And she has struck to thee the topsail
That she had not veil'd³ to a royal armada.
Thou hast met the tower that bears its crest among the clouds,

The battled massive tower of the Jarl⁴ of former days,

And the cope-stone of the turret

20 Is lying upon its hospitable hearth;
But thou too shalt stoop, proud compeller of clouds,

When thou hearest the voice of the Reimkennar

There are verses that can stop the stag in the forest,

Ay, and when the dark-color'd dog is opening on his track,

25 There are verses can make the wild hawk pause on the wing,

Like the falcon that wears the hood and the jesses,¹

And who knows the shrill whistle of the fowler.

Thou who canst mock at the scream of the drowning mariner,

And the crash of the ravaged forest.

30 And the groan of the overwhelmed crowds, When the church hath fallen in the moment of prayer;

There are sounds which thou also must list,

When they are chanted by the voice of the Reim-kennar

Enough of woe hast thou wrought on the ocean.

35 The widows wing their hands on the beach,

Enough of woe hast thou wrought on the
land,

The husbandman folds his arms in despair.

'Cease thou the waving of thy pinions,

Let the ocean repose in her dark strength,

40 'Cease thou the flashing of thine eye, Let the thunderbolt sleep in the armory of Odin.

Be thou still at my bidding, viewless racer of the north-western heaven,—

Sleep thou at the voice of Norna the Reim-kennar

Eagle of the far north-western waters,

45 Thou hast heard the voice of the Reimkennar,

Thou hast closed thy wide sails at her bidding,

And folded them in peace by thy side

My blessing be on thy retiring path,

When thou stoopest from thy place on
high,

50 Soft be thy slumbers in the caverns of the unknown ocean.

Rest till destiny shall again awaken thee.

Eagle of the north-west, thou hast heard the voice of the Reim-kennar.

FAREWELL TO THE MUSE

1822

Enchantress, farewell, who so oft hast
decoy'd me,

At the close of the evening through woodlands to roam,

Where the forester, 'lated, with wonder espied me

Explore the wild scenes he was quitting for home.

5 Farewell, and take with thee thy numbers wild speaking

The language alternate of rapture and
woe:

Oh! none but some lover, whose heartstrings are breaking,

The pang that I feel at our parting can
know.

Each joy thou couldst double, and when there came sorrow,

10 Or pale disappointment to darken my
way,

What voice was like thine, that could sing of tomorrow,

Till forgot in the strain was the grief of today!

But when friends drop around us in life's weary waning,

The grief, Queen of Numbers, thou canst not assuage;

15 Nor the gradual estrangement of those yet remaining,

The languor of pain, and the chillness of age.

'Twas thou that once taught me, in accents bemoaning,

To sing how a warrior¹ lay stretch'd on
the plain,

And a maiden hung o'er him with aid unavailing,

20 And held to his lips the cold goblet in
vain;

As vain thy enchantments, O Queen of wild Numbers,

To a bard when the reign of his fancy is o'er,

And the quick pulse of feeling in apathy slumbers—

Farewell, then, Enchantress! I meet thee no more!

 And the sky is dark and the night is wet,
 And we must ply the lusty oar,
 For the tide is ebbing from the shore,

 So kindly stored for our return.

Our boat is small, and the tempest raves.

 Yet sea and tempest rise in vain,
 We'll bless our blazing hearths again.

 See, swiftly moves yon flaming brand
 Before the midnight watch be past

- I hear below the water roar,
The mill w¹ clacking din,
And Lucky scolding frae her door, 20 To ca' the bairnies in Oh no! sad and slow,
These are na' sounds for me,
The shadow of our trysting bush,
It creeps sae drearily

- 25 I coft yestreen frae Chapman Tam,²
A snood³ of bonny blue,
And promised when our trysting cam',
To lie it round her brow
Oh no! sad and slow, 30 The mark it winna' pass,
The shadow of that weary thorn
Is tethered on the grass

- O now I see her on the way,
She's past the witch's knowe,⁴ 35 She's climbing up the Brownie's biae,⁵ My heart is in a lowe⁶
Oh no! 'tis no' so,

THE LOVELY LASS OF PRESTON MILL 1807 1813

- The lark had left the evening cloud,
The dew fell saft, the wind was lowne,⁸ Its gentle breath among the flowers, Scarce stirred the thistle's tap o' down, 5 The dappled swallow left the pool
The stars were blinking owre the hill,
As I met, among the hawthornes green,
The lovely lass of Preston Mill.

- Her naked feet, among the grass, 10 Shone like twa dew-gemmed lilies fair,
Her brow shone comely 'mang her locks,
Dark curling owre her shoulders bare,
Her cheeks were rich w¹ bloomy youth.
Her lips had words and wit at will; 15 And heaven seemed looking through her een,—
The lovely lass of Preston Mill.

- Quo' I, "Sweet lass, will ye gang w¹ me Where blackcocks caw, and plovers

Six hills are woolly w¹ my sheep, 20 Six vales are lowing w¹ my kye.
I hae looked lang for a weel-fau¹ 'd lass By Nithsdale's holmes² an' mome a

She hung her head like a dew-bent rose,—

- 25 Quo' I, "Sweet maiden, look nae down, But gie's a kiss, and gang w¹ me."
A lovelier face, O, never looked up,
And the tears were dripping frae her ee
"I hae a lad, wha's far awa', 30 That weel could win a woman's will,
My heart's already fu' o' love," Quo' the lovely lass of Preston Mill

- "Now wha is he wha could leave sic a lass To seek for love in a far countree?"— 35 Her tears dropped down like summer dew, I fain had kissed them frae her ee
I took but ane o' her comely cheek;
"For pity's sake, kind sir, be still!
My heart is fu' o' other love,"

GANE WERE BUT THE WINTER CAULD
1813

Gane were but the winter cauld,
And gane were but the snaw,
I could sleep in the wild woods,
Where primroses blaw.

5 Cauld's the snaw at my head,
And cauld at my feet,
And the finger o' death's at my een,
Closing them to sleep.

Let nane tell my father, 10 Or my mither sae dear:
I'll meet them baith in heaven
At the spring o' the year.

A WET SHEET AND A FLOWING SEA 1825

A wet sheet and a flowing sea,
A wind that follows fast,
And fills the white and rustling sail
And bends the gallant mast;
5 And bends the gallant mast, my boys, While, like the eagle free,
Away the good ship flies, and leaves Old England on the lee.

"O for a soft and gentle wind!" 10 I heard a fair one cry,
But give to me the snoring breeze
And white waves heaving high,
And white waves heaving high, my lads,
The good ship tight and free,— 15 The world of waters is our home,
And merry men are we.

There's tempest in yon hornéd moon,
And lightning in yon cloud;
But hark the music, mariners!
20 The wind is piping loud,
The wind is piping loud, my boys,
The lightning flashes free,— While the hollow oak our palace is,
Our heritage the sea

WHEN THE KYE COMES HAME
1810

Come, all ye jolly shepherds
That whistle through the glen,
I'll tell ye of a secret
That courtiers dinna ken.
5 What is the greatest bliss
That the tongue o' man can name?
"Tis to woo a bonnie lassie
When the kye comes hame,

¹ do not know

When the kye comes hame,
10 When the kye comes hame,
'Tween the gloaming and the mirk,¹
When the kye comes hame.

'Tis not beneath the coronet,
Nor canopy of state, 15 'Tis not on couch of velvet, Nor arbor of the great—
'Tis beneath the spreading birk,² In the glen without the name, Wi' a bonnie, bonnie lassie,
20 When the kye comes hame
When the kye comes hame, etc.

There the blackbird bigs³ her nest
For the mate he lo'es to see,
And on the topmost bough, 25 Oh, a happy bird is he,
Where he pours his melting ditty,
And love is a' the theme,
And he'll woo his bonnie lassie
When the kye comes hame.
30 When the kye comes hame, etc.

When the blewait⁴ bears a pearl,
And the daisy turns a pea,
And the bonnie lucken-gowan⁵
Has fauldit⁶ up her ee, 35 Then the laverock⁷ frae the blue lit⁸ Drops down, an' thinks nae shame
To woo his bonnie lassie
When the kye comes hame,
When the kye comes hame, etc.

10 See yonder pawkie⁹ shepherd,
That lingers on the hill,
His ewes are in the fauld,
An' his lambs are lying still;
Yet he downa gang¹⁰ to bed, 45 For his heart is in a flame
To meet his bonnie lassie
When the kye comes hame
When the kye comes hame, etc.

When the little wee bit heart 50 Rises high in the breast,
An' the little wee bit stain¹¹
Rises red in the east,
Oh there's a joy sae dear,
That the heart can hardly frame,

 An' leavin' fast to pray;
 15 And oh, what will the lads do
 When Maggy gangs away?

The young laird o' the Lang-Shaw
 Has drunk her health in wine,
 The priest has said—in confidence—20 The lassie was divine,
 And that is mair in maiden's praise
 Than ony priest should say:
 But oh, what will the lads do
 When Maggy gangs away?

25 The wailing in our green glen That day will quaver high;
 Twill draw the redbreast frae the wood.
 The laverock frae the sky,
 The fairies frae their beds o' dew 30 Will rise an' join the lay An' hey! what a day will be When Maggy gangs away!

KILMENY

Bonnie Kilmeny gaed up the glen;
 But it wasna to meet Duneira's men,
 Nor the rosy monk of the isle to see,
 For Kilmeny was pure as pure could be 5 It was only to hear the yorlin² sing,
 And pu' the cress-flower round the spring.
 The scarlet hypp³ and the hind-berry,⁴
 And the nest that hung frae the hazel
 tree;
 For Kilmeny was pure as pure could be.
 10 But lang may her minny⁵ look o'er the wa',
 And lang may she seek i' the greenwood shaw,⁶ Lang the laird o' Duneira blame, And lang lang greet⁷ or Kilmeny come
 hame!

When many lang day had come and fled, 15 When grief grew calm, and hope was
 dead,
 When mass for Kilmeny's soul had been
 sung,

³ yellow-hammer or bramble-berry rose ⁷ weep

When the bedesman¹ had pray'd and the dead-bell rung,
Late, late in a gloaming, when all was still,
When the fringe was red on the westlin
hill,

²⁰ The wood was wene, the moon i' the wane,
The reek o' the cot hung o'er the plain,
Like a wee cloud in the world its lane,²
When the ingle lowed wi' an eiry leme³—Late, late in the gloaming Kilmeny came hame!

²⁵ "Kilmeny, Kilmeny, where have you been?

Lang hae we sought baith holt and dean,⁴
By burn,⁵ by ford, by greenwood tree, Yet you are halesome and fair to see.

Where gat ye that joup⁶ o' the lily sheen?

³⁰ That bonnie snood⁷ o' the birk⁸ sae
green?

And those roses, the fairest that ever were seen?

Kilmeny, Kilmeny, where have you
been?"

Kilmeny look'd up wi' a lovely grace,
But nae smile was seen on Kilmeny's
face,

³⁵ As still was her look, and as still was her
ee,

As the stillness that lay on the emerant⁹
lea,

Or the mist that sleeps on a waveless sea For Kilmeny had been, she kenned not
where,

And Kilmeny had seen what she could not declare,

⁴⁰ Kilmeny had been where the cock never crew,

Where the rain never fell, and the wind never blew.

But it seemed as the harp of the sky had rung,

And the airs of heaven played round her
tongue,

When she spoke of the lovely forms she had seen,

⁴⁵ And a land where sin had never been,
A land of love and a land of light,

Withouten sun, or moon, or night;
Where the river swa'd¹⁰ a living stream.

And the light a pure and cloudless beam,

⁵⁰ The land of vision, it would seem,
A still, an everlasting dream.

In yon green wood there is a waik,¹

And in that waik there is a wene,²

And in that wene there is a maik;³

⁵⁵ That neither has flesh, nor blood, nor bane;

And down in yon greenwood he walks his lane⁴

In that green wene Kilmeny lay,

Her bosom hap'd⁵ wi' flowerets gay;

But the air was soft, and the silence deep,

⁶⁰ And bonny Kilmeny fell sound asleep

She kenned nae mair, nor open'd her ee,

Till wak'd by the hymns of a far countrye.

She woke on a couch of silk sae slim,

All striped wi' the bars of the rainbow's rim;

⁶⁵ And lovely beings round were rife,

Who eist had travelled mortal life,

And aye they smiled and 'gan to speer.⁶

"What spirit has brought this mortal
here?"

"Lang have I rang'd the world wide,"

⁷⁰ A meek and reverend fere⁷ replied,

"Baith night and day I have watched the
fair,

Eident⁸ a thousand years and mair

Yes, I have watched o'er ilk degree,⁹

Wherever blooms femmitye,

⁷⁵ And sinless virgin, free of stain

In mind and body, found I nane

Never since the banquet of time

Found I a virgin in her prime,

Till late this bonnie maiden I saw,

⁸⁰ As spotless as the morning snaw.

Full twenty years she has lived as free

As the spirits that sojourn in this coun-
trye:

I have brought her away from the snares
of men,

That sin or death she never may ken "

⁸⁵ They clasped her waist, and her hands sae fair.

They kissed her cheeks, and they kemmed her hair;

And round came many a blooming fere,

Saying, "Bonnie Kilmeny, ye're welcome
here!

 90 O blessed be the day Kilmeny was born!¹
 Now shall the land of the spirits see,
 Now shall it ken what a woman may be!¹
 Many lang year, in sorrow and pain, Many lang year through the world we've gane,

95 Commissioned to watch fair woman-kind,
 For it's they who nurse the immortal mind
 We have watched their steps as the dawning shone,

And deep in the greenwood walks alone,
 By hily bower and silken bed,

100 The viewless tears have been o'er them
 shed,

Have soothed their ardent minds to sleep,
 Or left the couch of love to weep.

We have seen, we have seen! but the time

And the angels will weep at the day of doom!

105 "O would the fairest of mortal kind Aye keep these holy truths in mind,
 That kindred spirits their motions see,
 Who watch their ways with anxious ee,
 And grieve for the guilt of humanity!

110 O, sweet to Heaven the maiden's prayer,
 And the sigh that heaves a bosom sae fan!¹
 And dear to Heaven the words of truth
 And the praise of virtue frae beauty's mouth!

And dear to the viewless forms of air, 115 The mind that kythes² as the body fan!

"O, bonny Kilmeny! free frae stam,
 If ever you seek the world again,
 That world of sin, of sorrow, and fear.

O tell of the joys that are waiting here, 120 And tell of the signs you shall shortly
 see,

Of the times that are now, and the times that shall be"

They lifted Kilmeny, they led her away.
 And she walked in the light of a sunless
 day,

The sky was a dome of crystal bright, 125 The fountain of vision, and fountain of
 light,

The emerald fields were of dazzling glow.
 And the flowers of everlasting blow!

Then deep in the stream her body they laid.
 That her youth and her beauty never might
 fade;

130 And they smil'd on Heaven, when they saw her lie

In the stream of life that wandered by
 And she heard a song, she heard it sung, She ken'd not where, but sae sweetly it
 rung,

It fell on the ear like a dream of the moon,—

135 "O blest be the day Kilmeny was born!¹
 Now shall the land of the spirits see,
 Now shall it ken what a woman may be!¹ The sun that shines on the world sae
 bright,

A borrowed gleid³ frae the fountain of
 light.

140 And the moon that sleeks² the sky sae dun,
 Like a golden⁴ bow on a beamless sun,
 Shall wear away and be seen nae mair,
 And the angels shall miss them travelling
 the air.

But lang, lang after, baith nicht and day, 145 When the sun and the world have fled
 away,

When the sunner has gane to his waesome
 doom,

Kilmeny shall smile in eternal bloom!"

They bore her away, she wist not how For she felt not aim nor rest below,

150 But so swift they wamed¹ her through the
 light,

'Twas like the motion of sound or sight,
 They seemed to split the gales of air,

And yet nor gale nor breeze was there Unnumbered groves below them grew,

155 They came, they passed, and backward
 flew,

Like floods of blossoms gliding on,
 A moment seen, in a moment gone

Ah! never vales to mortal view Appeared like those o'er which they flew,

That land to human spirits given,
 The lowermost vales of the storied heaven,

From thence they can view the world below,

And heaven's blue gates with sapphires
 glow.

More glory yet unmeet to know.

165 They bore her far to a mountain green,
 To see what mortal never had seen,
 And they seated her high on a purple sward,

And bade her heed what she saw and

- She looked, and she saw nae land aright,
 But an endless whirl of glory and light, 175 And radiant beings went and came,
 Far swifter than wind, or the linked flame.
 She hid her een frae the dazzling view;
 She looked again, and the scene was new.
- She saw a sun in a summer sky, 180 And clouds of amber sailing by;
 A lovely land beneath her lay,
 And that land had lakes and mountains
 gray;
 And that land had valleys and hoary piles,
 And marled¹ seas and a thousand isles 185 Its fields were speckled, its forests green,
 And its lakes were all of the dazzling sheen,
 Like magic mirrors, where shining lay The sun, and the sky, and the cloudlet
 gray;
 Which heaved and trembled and gently
 swung,
 190 On every shore they seemed to be hung.
 For there they were seen on their downward plain
 A thousand times and a thousand again.
 In winding lake and placid firth, Little peaceful heavens in the bosom of
 earth
- 195 Kilmeny sighed and seemed to grieve, For she found her heart to that land did cleave;
 She saw the corn² wave on the vale,
 She saw the deer run down the dale;
 She saw the plaid and the broad claymore,³ 200 And the brows that the badge of freedom
 bore,—
 And she thought she had seen the land
 before
- She saw a lady sit on a throne,
 The fairest that ever the sun shone on.
 A lion licked her hand of milk, 205 And she held him in a leish of silk,
 And a leifu⁴ maiden stood at her knee,
 With a silver wand and melting ee;
 Her sovereign shield till love stole in,
 And poisoned all the fount within.
- 210 Then a gruff, untoward bedesman came,
 And hundi⁵ the lion on his dame,
 And the guardian maid wi' the dauntless
 ee,
 She dropped a tear, and left her knee;
 And she saw till the queen frae the lion
 fled,
- 215 Till the bonniest flower o' the world lay
 dead;
 A coffin was set on a distant plain,
 And she saw the red blood fall like rain;
 Then bonnie Kilmeny's heart grew sair,
 And she turned away, and could look nae mair.
- 220 Then the gruff, grim carle¹ girmed²
 amain,
 And they trampled him down, but he rose
 again;
 And he baited³ the lion to deeds of weir,⁴ Till he lapped the blood to the kingdom
 dear;
 And weening⁵ his head was danger preef,⁶ 225 When crowned with the rose and clover
 leaf,
 He gowled⁷ at the carle, and chased him
 away,
 To feed wi' the deer on the mountain gray.
 He gowled at the carle, and he gecked⁸ at
 heaven,
 But his mark was set and his arles given⁹ 230 Kilmeny a while her een withdrew,
 She looked again, and the scene was new
- She saw before her fair unfurled
 One-half of all the glowing world, Where oceans rolled, and rivers ran, 235 To bound the aims of sinful man
 She saw a people, fierce and fell, Burst frae their bounds like fiends of hell;
 There lilies grew, and the eagle flew;
 And she herked¹⁰ on her ravening ciew, 240 Till the cities and towers were wrapt in a blaze,
 And the thunder it roared o'er the lands and the seas.
 The widows wailed, and the red blood ran,
 And she threatened an end to the race of
 man;
 She never lened,¹¹ nor stood in awe, 245 Till caught by the lion's deadly paw Oh! then the eagle swinked¹² for life,
 And brainzelled¹³ up a mortal strife,
 But flew she north, or flew she south,
 She met wi' the gowl¹⁴ o' the lion's mouth.
- 250 With a mooted¹⁵ wing and waeifu' maen,¹⁶

¹ variegated⁴ loyal² wheat⁵ hounded, incited³ A large two-edged sword¹ fellow² grinned³ set on⁴ dread⁵ thinking⁶ proof⁷ howled⁸ scorned; mocked⁹ his limit or course

wages, his desert¹⁰ urged on¹¹ rested, ceased¹² struggled, toiled¹³ stirred¹⁴ howl¹⁵ moulted¹⁶ woful mien

The eagle sought her eiry again;
 But lang may she cower in her bloody
 nest,
 And lang, lang sleek her wounded breast,
 Before she sey¹ another flight, 265 To play wi' the norland lion's might.

But to sing the sights Kilmeny saw,
 So far surpassing nature's law,
 The singer's voice wad sink away,
 And the string of his harp wad cease to
 play.
 260 But she saw till the sorrows of man were by,
 And all was love and harmony,— Till the stars of heaven fell calmly away, Like flakes of snaw on a winter day.

Then Kilmeny begged again to see 265 The friends she had left in her ain coun-trie,
 To tell of the place where she had been,
 And the glories that lay in the land un-
 seen,
 To warn the living maidens fair,
 The loved of heaven, the spirits' care, 270 That all whose minds unmeled² remain Shall bloom in beauty when time is gane.

With distant music, soft and deep,
 They lulled Kilmeny sound asleep,
 And when she awakened, she lay her lane,³ 275 All happed with flowers, in the greenwood wene.
 When seven long years had come and fled,
 When grief was calm, and hope was dead, Whence scarce was remembered Kil-meny's name,
 Late, late in a gloamin' Kilmeny came
 hame.
 280 And O, her beauty was fair to see,
 But still and steadfast was her ee!
 Such beauty bard may never declare,
 For there was no pride nor passion there;
 And the soft desire of maiden's een 285 In that mild face could never be seen.
 Her seymar⁴ was the lily flower,
 And her cheek the moss-rose in the shower,
 And her voice like the distant melodye,
 That floats along the twilight sea.
 290 But she loved to raik⁵ the lanely glen,
 And keep afar frae the haunts of men,

 And cowered beneath her lily hand.
 300 And when at eve the woodlands rung,
 When hymns of other worlds she sung

 The wild beasts of the forest came,

 The hawk and the hern attour them hung,⁷
 And the merle and the mavis⁸ forhooyed⁹

 And all in a peaceful ring were hurled—
 It was like an eve in a sinless world!

When a month and a day had come and
 gane,
 320 Kilmeny sought the greenwood wene;
 There laid her down on the leaves sae
 green,
 And Kilmeny on earth was never mair

 But O! the words that fell frae her mouth 325 Were words of wonder, and words of

 But all the land were in fear and dread,

10 To sing at the morning's rosy yett,²

An' water my mare at its fountain clear—

But I see her yet, I see her yet.

Away, thou bonnie witch o' Fife,

On foam of the air to heave an' flit,

15 An' little reck thou of a poet's life,

For he sees thee yet, he sees thee yet!

A BOY'S SONG

1840

Where the pools are bright and deep,

Where the gray trout lies asleep,

Up the river and o'er the lea,

That's the way for Billy and me.

5 Where the blackbird sings the latest,

Where the hawthorn blooms the sweetest.

Where the nestlings chirp and flee,

That's the way for Billy and me.

Where the mowers mow the cleanest,

10 Where the hay lies thick and greenest,

There to trace the homeward bee,

That's the way for Billy and me.

Where the hazel bank is steepest,

Where the shadow falls the deepest,

15 Where the clustering nuts fall free,

That's the way for Billy and me.

Why the boys should drive away

Little maidens from their play,

Or love to banter and fight so well,

20 That's the thing I never could tell

But this I know, I love to play,

Through the meadow, among the hay:

Up the water and o'er the lea,

That's the way for Billy and me.

M'KIMMAN

1840

Is your war-pipe asleep, and forever,
M'Kimman?

Is your war-pipe asleep, and forever?

Shall the pibroch³ that welcomed the foe to Ben-Aer

Be hushed when we seek the red wolf in his lair,

5 To give back our wrongs to the giver?

To the raid and the onslaught our chieftains have gone—

Like the course of the fire-slaught¹ then clansmen pass'd on;

With the lance and the shield 'gainst the foe they have bound them,

And have taken the field with their vassals around them.

10 Then raise the wild slogan-ery, On to the foray!

Sons of the heather-hill, pine-wood, and glen,

Shout for M'Pherson, M'Leod, and the Moray,

Till the Lomonds re-echo the challenge again.

Youth of the daring heart, bright be thy doom

15 As the bodings which light up thy bold spirit now,

But the fate of M'Kimman is closing in
gloom,

And the breath of the gray wraith² hath pass'd o'er his brow

Victorious in joy thou'lt return to Ben-Aer,

And be clasp'd to the hearts of thy best beloved there;

20 But M'Kimman, M'Kimman, M'Kimman shall never—

O never—never—never—never!

Wilt thou shrink from the doom thou can shun not, M'Kimman?

Wilt thou shrink from the doom thou can shun not?

If thy course must be brief, let the proud Saxon know

25 That the soul of M'Kimman ne'er quail'd when a foe

Bared his blade in a land he had won
not.

Where the light-footed roe leaves the wild breeze behind,

And the red heather-bloom gives its sweets to the wind—

There our broad pennon flies, and our keen steeds are prancing

30 'Mid the startling war-cries, and the bright weapons glancing!

Then raise the wild slogan-ery, On
to the foray!

LOCK THE DOOR, LARISTON
1840

"Lock the door, Lariston, hon of Liddes-
dale;
Lock the door, Lariston, Lowther comes
on;
The Armstrongs are flying,
The widows are crying,
5 The Castletown's burning, and Ohver's
gone!
"Lock the door, Lariston—high on the weather-gleam
See how the Saxon plumes bob on the sky—Yeomen¹ and carbiner,² Billman³ and halberdier,⁴ 10 Fierce is the foray, and far is the cry!
"Bewcastle brandishes high his broad scimitar,
Ridley is riding his fleet-footed gray, Hidley and Howard there,
Wandale and Windermere,
15 Lock the door, Lariston, hold them at bay
"Why dost thou smile, noble Elliot of Lariston?
Why does the joy-candle gleam in thine
eye?
Thou bold Border ranger,
Beware of thy danger, 20 Thy foes are relentless, determined, and nigh!"
Jack Elliot raised up his steel bonnet and lookit,
His hand grasp'd the sword with a nervous embrace;
"Ah, welcome, brave foemen.
On earth there are no men 25 More gallant to meet in the foray or chase!"
"Little know you of the hearts I have hidden here;

¹ cavalymen of the yeomanry class

² cavalry soldier armed with a carbine, a short rifle

³ soldier armed with a bill, a hook-shaped blade attached to the end of a long staff

⁴ soldier armed with a halberd, a long-handled weapon with a sharp point and several sharp edges

Little know you of our moss-troopers'¹ might—
Lanhope and Sorbie true,
Sundhope and Milburn too, 30 Gentle in manner, but lions in fight!

"I have Mangerton, Ogilvie, Raeburn, and Netherbie,
Old Sim of Whitram, and all his array;
Come all Northumberland, Teesdale and Cumberland, 35 Here at the Breaken tower end shall the fray!"

Scowled the broad sun o'er the links² of green Liddesdale, Red as the beacon-light tipped he the wold,³
Many a bold martial eye
Mirror'd that morning sky, 40 Never more oped on his orbit of gold.

Shrill was the bugle's note, dreadful the warrior's shout, Lances and halberds in splinters were borne,
Helmet and hauberk⁴ then Braved the claymore⁵ in van, 45 Buckler and armlet in shivers were shorn

See how they wane—the proud files of the Windermere!
Howard! ah, woe to thy hopes of the
day!
Hear the wide welkin rend,
While the Scots' shouts ascend—50 "Elliot of Lariston, Elliot for aye!"

THE MAID OF THE SEA
1840

Come from the sea,
Maiden, to me,
Maiden of mystery, love, and pain!
Wake from thy sleep,
5 Low in the deep,
Over thy green waves sport again!
Come to this sequestered spot, love, Death's where thou art, as where thou art not, love;
Then come unto me,
10 Maid of the Sea,
Rise from the wild and stormy main;
Wake from thy sleep,
Calm in the deep,
Over thy green waves sport again!

Made for the slave,

- 20 Thing of delight to a minstrel's soul, Come, with thy song of love and of sadness,
Beauty of face and rapture of madness,
O, come unto me,

GEORGE NOEL GORDON, LORD BYRON (1788-1824)

LACHIN Y GAIR
1807

- Away, ye gay landscapes, ye gardens of roses!
In you let the minions of luxury rove.
Restore me the rocks, where the snowflake reposes,
Though still they are sacred to freedom
and love:
- 5 Yet, Caledonia, beloved are thy mountains, Round their white summits though elements war;
Though cataracts foam 'stead of smooth-flowing fountains,
I sigh for the valley of dark Loch na Garr.
- Ah! there my young footsteps in infancy wander'd,
- 10 My cap was the bonnet, my cloak was the plaid,
On chieftains long perish'd my memory
ponder'd,
As daily I strode through the pine-cover'd glade;
I sought not my home till the day's dying
glory
Gave place to the rays of the bright polar star:
- 15 For fancy was cheer'd by traditional story,
Disclosed by the natives of dark Loch na Garr.
- "Shades of the dead! have I not heard your voices
Rise on the night-rolling breath of the gale?"
Surely the soul of the hero rejoices,

- 20 And rides on the wind, o'er his own Highland vale.
Round Loch na Garr while the stormy mist gathers,
Winter presides in his cold icy car:
'Clouds there encircle the forms of my fathers,
They dwell in the tempests of dark Loch na Garr
- 25 "Ill-starr'd, though brave, did no visions foreboding
Tell you that fate had forsaken your cause?"¹
Ah! were you destined to die at Culloden, Victory crown'd not your fall with applause.
Still were you happy in death's earthly slumber,
- 30 You rest with your clan in the caves of Braemar,
The pibroch² resounds, to the piper's loud number,
Your deeds on the echoes of dark Loch
na Garr
- Years have roll'd on, Loch na Garr, since I left you,
Years must elapse ere I tread you again.
35 Nature of verdure and flow'rs has bereft you,
Yet still are you dearer than Albion's
plain England! thy beauties are tame and domestic
To one who has roved o'er the mountains afar:
Oh for the eagles that are wild and majestic!
- 40 The steep frowning glories of dark Loch na Garr.

FAREWELL! IF EVER FONDEST

1808 1814

- Farewell! if ever fondest prayer For other's weal avail'd on high, Mine will not all be lost in an,
But waft thy name beyond the sky
- 5 'Twere vain to speak, to weep, to sigh.
Oh! more than tears of blood can tell,
When wrung from guilt's expiring eye,
Are in that word—Farewell!—Fare-
well!
- ¹ "I allude here to my maternal ancestors, the Gordons, many of whom fought for the unfortunate Prince Charles, better known by the name of Pretender"—Byron
- ² A kind of Highland bagpipe music

These lips are mute, these eyes are dry; 10 But in my breast and in my brain, Awake the pangs that pass not by,
 The thought that ne'er shall sleep again.
 My soul nor deigns nor dares complain, Though grief and passion there rebel;
 15 I only know we loved in vain—
 I only feel—Farewell!—Farewell!

BRIGHT BE THE PLACE OF THY SOUL!
 1808 1815

Bright be the place of thy soul!
 No lovelier spirit than thine E'er burst from its mortal control,
 In the orbs of the blessed to shine

5 On earth thou wert all but divine.
 As thy soul shall immortally be.
 And our sorrow may cease to repine
 When we know that thy God is with thee

Light be the turf of thy tomb!
 10 May its verdure like emeralds be!
 There should not be the shadow of gloom
 In aught that reminds us of thee.

Young flowers and an evergreen tree
 May spring from the spot of thy rest 15 But nor cypress nor yew let us see.
 For why should we mourn for the blest?

WHEN WE TWO PARTED
 1808 1816

When we two parted
 In silence and tears,
 Half broken-hearted
 To sever for years, 5 Pale grew thy cheek and cold, Colder thy kiss,
 Truly that hour foretold
 Sorrow to this.

The dew of the morning
 10 Sunk chill on my brow—
 It felt like the warning
 Of what I feel now
 Thy vows are all broken,
 And light is thy fame 15 I hear thy name spoken,
 And share in its shame

They name thee before me,
 A knell to mine ear,
 A shudder comes o'er me—20 Why wert thou so dear?
 They know not I knew thee,
 Who knew thee too well.—

¹ The cypress and the yew are common trees in graveyards

Long, long shall I rue thee, Too deeply to tell.

25 In secret we met—
 In silence I grieve,
 That thy heart could forget,
 Thy spirit deceive
 If I should meet thee 30 After long years, How should I greet thee?—
 With silence and tears

From ENGLISH BARDS AND SCOTCH REVIEWERS
 1807-09 1809

Still must I hear?—shall hoarse Fitzgerald bawl
 His creaking couplets in a tavern hall,
 And I not sing, lest, haply, Scotch reviews Should dub me scribbler, and denounce my muse?

5 Prepare for rhyme—I'll publish, right or wrong.
 Fools are my theme, let satire be my
 song

Oh! nature's noblest gift—my gray goose-quill!

Slave of my thoughts, obedient to my
 will,
 Torn from thy parent bird to form a pen, 10 That mighty instrument of little men!
 The pen! foredoom'd to aid the mental throes
 Of brains that labor, big with verse or prose,
 Though nymphs forsake, and critics may deride,
 The lover's solace, and the author's pride.
 15 What wits, what poets dost thou daily raise!
 How frequent is thy use, how small thy
 praise!
 Condemn'd at length to be forgotten quite,
 With all the pages which 'twas thine to write.

But thou, at least, mine own especial pen!
 20 Once laid aside, but now assumed again, Our task complete, like Hamlet's shall be
 free;

Though spurn'd by others, yet beloved by
 me:

Then let us soar today; no common theme,
 No eastern vision, no distemper'd dream 25 Inspires—our path, though full of thorns, is plain;

Smooth be the verse, and easy be the strain.

When Vice triumphant holds her sov' reign sway,
 Obey'd by all who nought beside obey,
 When Folly, frequent harbinger of crime, 30 Bedecks her cap with bells of every clime,
 When knaves and fools combined o'er all prevail,
 And weigh their justice in a golden scale.
 E'en then the boldest start from public sneers,
 Afraid of shame, unknown to other fears.
 35 More darkly sm, hy satire kept in awe, And shrink from ridicule, though not from law

Such is the force of wit! but not belong
 To me the arrows of satiric song,
 The royal vices of our age demand 40 A keener weapon, and a mightier hand Still there are follies, e'en for me to chase,
 And yield at least amusement in the race Laugh when I laugh, I seek no other
 fame;
 The cry is up, and scribblers are my game 45 Speed, Pegasus!—ye strams of great and small,
 Ode, epic, elegy, have at you all!
 I too can scrawl, and once upon a time
 I pour'd along the town a flood of rhyme, A school boy freak, unworthy praise or blame;
 50 I printed—older children do the same.
 'Tis pleasant, sure, to see one's name in print;
 A book's a book, although there's nothing in 't
 Not that a title's sounding charm can save Or scrawl or scribbler from an equal grave.
 55 This Lambe must own, since his patrician
 name Fail'd to preserve the spurious faice from shame.
 No matter, George continues still to write, Though now the name is veil'd from public sight
 Moved by the great example, I pursue 60 The self-same road, but make my own review.
 Not seek great Jeffrey's, yet, like him, will
 Self-constituted judge of poesy.

A man must serve his time to every trade
 Save censure—critics all are ready made

65 Take hackney'd jokes from Millei, got by rote,
 With just enough of learning to misquote, A mind well skill'd to find or forge a fault,
 A turn for punning, call it Attie salt;¹
 To Jeffrey go, be silent and discreet, 70 His pay is just ten sterling pounds per sheet:
 Fear not to lie, 'twill seem a sharper hit, Shrink not from blasphemy, 'twill pass for wit,
 Care not for feeling—pass your proper jest,
 And stand a critic, hated yet caress'd.

75 And shall we own such judgment? no
 —as soon
 Seek roses in December—ice in June,
 Hope constancy in wind, or corn in chaff;
 Believe a woman or an epitaph,
 Or any other thing that's false, before 80 You trust in critics, who themselves are sore,
 Or yield one single thought to be misled By Jeffrey's heart, or Lambe's Bæotian head.²
 To these young tyrants, by themselves misplaced,
 Combined usurpers on the throne of taste.
 85 To these, when authors bend in humble
 awe,
 And hail their voice as truth, their word as law—
 While these are censors, 'twould be sin to spare,
 While such are critics, why should I forbear?
 But yet, so near all modern worthies
 run, 90 'Tis doubtful whom to seek, or whom to shun,
 Nor know we when to spare, or where to strike,
 Our bards and censors are so much alike

Then should you ask me, why I venture
 o'er
 The path which Pope and Gifford trod
 before.
 95 If not yet sicken'd, you can still proceed Go on; my rhyme will tell you as you read
 "But hold!" exclaims a friend, "here's some neglect:
 This—that—and t'other line seem incorrect"

² The Bæotians were proverbial for dullness

- What then? the self-same blunder Pope has got,
100 And careless Dryden—"Ay, but Pye has not:"— Indeed!—'tis granted, faith!—but what care I?
Better to err with Pope, than shine with Pye.
- Time was, ere yet in these degenerate
days, 105 Ignoble themes obtain'd mistaken praise,
When sense and wit with poesy allied,
No fabled graces, flourish'd side by side,
From the same fount their inspiration
drew,
And, rear'd by taste, bloom'd fairer as they grew
Then, in this happy isle, a Pope's pure
strain
110 Sought the rapt soul to charm, nor sought
in vain,
A polish'd nation's praise aspired to
claim,
And raised the people's, as the poet's
fame.
Like him great Dryden pour'd the tide of
song.
In stream less smooth, indeed, yet doubly
strong.
115 Then Congreve's scenes could cheer, or Otway's melt—
For nature then an English audience felt But why these names, or greater still, re-
trace,
When all to feeble bards resign their
place?
Yet to such times our lingering looks are cast, 120 When taste and reason with those times are past.
Now look around, and turn each trifling
page,
Survey the precious works that please the
age,
This truth at least let satire's self allow,
No dearth of bards can be complain'd of
now
125 The loaded press beneath her labor groans, And printers' devils shake their weary bones;
While Southey's epics cram the creaking shelves,
And Little's lyrics shine in hot-press'd twelves.¹
Thus saith the Preacher: "Nought beneath the sun
- 130 Is new,"² yet still from change to change
we run:
What varied wonders tempt us as they pass!
The cow-pox,³ tractors,⁴ galvanism,⁴ and gas,⁵
In turns appear, to make the vulgar stare, Till the swoln bubble bursts—and all is
air!
135 Nor less new schools of Poetry arise, Where dull pretenders grapple for the prize
O'er taste awhile these pseudo-bards prevail;
Each country book-club bows the knee to Baal,
And, hurling lawful genius from the throne,
140 Erects a shrine and idol of its own,
Some leaden calf—but whom it matters
not,
From soaring Southey down to grovelling Stott
- Behold! in various throngs the scribbling crew,
For notice eager, pass in long review:
145 Each spurs his jaded Pegasus apace, And rhyme and blank maintain an equal
race;
Sonnets on sonnets crowd, and ode on ode,
And tales of terror⁶ jostle on the road;
Immeasurable measures move along,⁷ 150 For simpering folly loves a varied song, To strange mysterious dulness still the
friend,
Admires the strain she cannot comprehend.
Thus Lays of Minstrels—may they be the last!⁸—
On half-strung harps whine mournful to the blast
155 While mountain spirits prate to river sprites,
That dames may listen to the sound at nights;
- ¹ Ecclesiastes, 1. 9.
² A disease of cows which, when communicated to the human system by vaccination, protects from the small-pox.
³ Metal rods used in treating rheumatism, etc.
⁴ The use of electric currents for curative purposes.
⁵ Laughing gas. All of these "wonders" were quick panaceas of the early 19th century.
⁶ A reference to Lewis's Tales of Terror (1799) and Tales of Wonder (1800).
⁷ A thrust at the new anapaestic meters, introduced by Cowper, Coleridge, Southey, Moore, and others.
⁸ A reference to Scott's The Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805), which grew out of a suggestion for a ballad on the Border legend of Gilpin Horner.

- And goblin brats, of Gulpin Horner's brood, Decoy young border-nobles through the
wood,
And skip at every step, Lord knows how
high, 160 And frighten foolish babes, the Lord knows why;
While high-born ladies in their magic cell, Forbidding knights to read who cannot spell,
Despatch a courier to a wizard's grave,
And fight with honest men to shield a knave.
- 165 Next view in state, proud prancing on his roan,
The golden-crested haughty Mammon.
Now forging scrolls, now foremost in the fight,
Not quite a felon, yet but half a knight,
The gibbet or the field prepare to grace; 170 A mighty mixture of the great and base And think'st thou, Scott! by vain conceit perchance,
On public taste to foist thy stale romance.
Though Murray with his Miller may combine
To yield thy muse just half-a-crown per line!
- 175 No! when the sons of song descend to
trade,
Their bays¹ are sear, their former laurels
fade.
Let such forego the poet's sacred name, Who rack their brains for lucre, not for
fame.
Still for stern Mammon may they toil in
vain!
- 180 And sadly gaze on gold they cannot gain!
Such be their meed, such still the just reward
Of prostituted muse and hireling bard!
For this we spurn Apollo's venal son,²
And bid a long "good night to Mammon."³
- 185 These are the themes that claim our plaudits now,
These are the bards to whom the muse must bow;
While Milton, Dryden, Pope, alike forgot, Resign their hallow'd bays to Walter Scott.
- The time has been, when yet the muse was young,
190 When Homer swept the lyre, and Maro
sung,
- An epic scarce ten centuries could claim, While awe-struck nations hail'd the magic
name
The work of each immortal bard appears
The single wonder of a thousand years.
195 Empires have moulder'd from the face of
earth,
Tongues have expired with those who gave them birth,
Without the glory such a strain can give,
As even in ruin bids the language live Not so with us, though minor bards, content, 200 On one great work a life of labor spent:
With eagle pinion soaring to the skies, Behold the ballad-monger Southey rise!
To him let Camoëns, Milton, Tasso yield, Whose annual strains, like armies, take the field.
- 205 First in the ranks see Joan of Arc advance,¹
The scourge of England and the boast of France!
Though burnt by wicked Bedford for a witch,
Behold her statue placed in glory's niche;
Her fetters burst, and just released from prison, 210 A virgin phoenix from her ashes risen.
Next see tremendous Thalaba come on, Arabia's monstrous, wild, and wondrous
son;
Domdaniel's dread destroyer, who o'er-threw
More mad magicians than the world e'er knew.
- 215 Immortal hero! all thy foes o'ercome, Forever reign—the rival of Tom Thumb!
Since startled metre fled before thy face, Well wert thou doom'd the last of all thy
race!
Well might triumphant genu bear thee
hence,
- 220 Illustrious conqueror of common sense!
Now, last and greatest, Madoc spreads his sails,
Cacique² in Mexico, and prince in Wales; Tells us strange tales, as other travellers do,
More old than Mandeville's, and not so true.
- 225 Oh! Southey! Southey! cease thy varied
song!
A bard may chant too often and too long.
As thou art strong in verse, in mercy.
spare!

¹ Wreaths of honor made from leaves of the ivy-tree, a kind of laurel.

² Scott, who received £1,000 for Marmion

³ Marmion, 6, 869

tively

² chief; petty king

- A fourth, alas! were more than we could ²⁶⁵ bear.
 But if, in spite of all the world can say.
 230 Thou still wilt verseward plod thy weary way,¹ If still in Berkley ballads most uncivil, Thou wilt devote old women to the devil,²
 The babe unborn thy dread intent may 1ue
 "God help thee,"³ Southey, and thy ²⁷⁰ readers too.
 235 Next comes the dull disciple of thy school,
 That mild apostate from poetic rule,
 The simple Wordsworth, framer of a lay As soft as evening in his favorite May, Who warns his friend "to shake off toil and trouble, 240 And quit his books for fear of growing double,"⁴ Who, both by precept and example, shows That prose is verse, and verse is merely prose,
 Convincing all, by demonstration plain,
 Poetic souls delight in prose insane, 245 And Christmas stories tortured into rhyme Contain the essence of the true sublime
 Thus, when he tells the tale of Betty Foy,⁵
 The idiot mother of "an idiot boy,"
 A moon-struck, silly lad, who lost his way, 250 And, like his bard, confounded night with day,
 So close on each pathetic part he dwells,
 And each adventure so sublimely tells,
 That all who view the "idiot in his glory," Conceive the bard the hero of the story 255 Shall gentle Coleridge pass unnoticed here,
 To turgid ode and tumid stanza dear!
 Though themes of innocence amuse him best,
 Yet still obscurity's a welcome guest.
 If Inspiration should her aid refuse 260 To him who takes a pixy for a muse,⁶ Yet none in lofty numbers can surpass
 The hard who soars to elegize an ass!
 So well the subject suits his noble mind,
 He brays the laureat of the long-eat'd
 kind.
- Oh! wonder-working Lewis! monk, or
 bard,
 Who fain wouldst make Parnassus a churchyard!
 Lo! wreaths of yew,¹ not laurel, bind thy
 brow,
 Thy muse a sprite, Apollo's sexton thou!
 Whether on ancient tombs thou tak'st thy
 stand,
 270 By gibb'ring spectres hail'd, thy kindred
 band,
 Or tracest chaste descriptions on thy page,
 To please the females of our modest age,² All hail, M. P.!³ from whose infernal brain
 Thin-sheeted phantoms glide, a grisly
 train, 275 At whose command "grim women" throng in crowds,
 And kings of fire, of water, and of clouds, With "small gray men," "wild ya-gers,"⁴ and what not,
 To crown with honor thee and Walter Scott,⁵ Again all hail! if tales like thine may
 please,
 280 St Luke alone can vanquish the disease,⁶ Even Satan's self with thee might dread to dwell,
 And in thy skull discern a deeper hell.
- Who in soft guise, surrounded by a choir
 Of virgins melting, not to Vesta's fire, 285 With sparkling eyes, and cheek by passion flush'd,
 Strikes his wild lyre, whilst listening dainties are hush'd!
 'Tis Lattle! young Catullus of his day,
 As sweet, but as immoral, in his lay!
 Grieved to condemn, the muse must still be just,
 290 Nor spare melodious advocates of lust.
 Pure is the flame which o'er her altar
 burns;
 From grosser incense with disgust she turns.
 Yet kind to youth, this expiation o'er,
 She bids thee "mend thy line and sin no
 more."

- 295 For thee, translator of the tinsel song, To whom such glittering ornaments belong,
Hibernian Strangford! with thine eyes of blue,
And boasted locks of red or auburn hue, Whose plaintive strain each love-sick muse
admires,
300 And o'er harmonious fustian half expires, Learn, if thou canst, to yield thine author's sense,
Nor vend thy sonnets on a false pretence Think'st thou to gain thy verse a higher
place,
By dressing Camoens in a suit of lace?
305 Mend, Strangford! mend thy morals and thy taste,
Be warm, but pure; be amorous, but be chaste,
Cease to deceive; thy pilfer'd harp restore,
Nor teach the Lusian bard¹ to copy Moore
- Behold—ye tails!²—one moment spare the text—

Whether he spin poor couplets into plays,
Or damn the dead with purgatorial praise.
His style in youth or age is still the same,
Forever feeble and forever tame

At least I'm sure they triumph'd over
mine
Of Music's Triumphs, all who read may

That luckless music never triumph'd there.
- Moravians, rise! bestow some meet reward
320 On dull devotion—Lo! the Sabbath bard, Sepulchral Grahame, pours his notes sublime
In mangled prose, nor e'en aspires to rhyme;
Breaks into blank the Gospel of St. Luke,
And boldly pilfers from the Pentateuch; 325 And, undisturb'd by conscientious qualms, Perverts the Prophets, and purloins the Psalms.
- Hail, Sympathy! thy soft idea brings A thousand visions of a thousand things,
- And¹ shows, still whimpering through three-score of years, 330 The maudlin prince of mournful son-neteers.
And art thou not their prince, harmonious Bowles!
Thou first, great oracle of tender souls?
Whether thou sing'st with equal ease, and
grief,
The fall of empires, or a yellow leaf, 335 Whether thy muse most lamentably tells What merry sounds proceed from Oxford
bells,
Or, still in bells delighting, finds a friend
In every chime that jingled from Ostend,¹ Ah! how much juster were thy muse's hap, 340 If to thy bells thou wouldst but add a cap!²
Delightful Bowles! still blessing and still
blest,
All love thy strain, but children like it
best
'Tis thine, with gentle Little's moral song,
To soothe the mania of the amorous throng!³
345 With thee our nursery damsels shed their
tears,
Ere miss as yet completes her infant
years.
But in her teens thy whining powers are
vain,
She quits poor Bowles for Little's puer
strain
Now to soft themes thou scornest to confine
350 The lofty numbers of a harp like thine, "Awake a louder and a loftier strain,"
Such as none heard before, or will again!
Where all Discoveries jumbled from the flood,
Since first the leaky ark reposed in mud, 355 By more or less, are sung in every book,
From Captain Noah down to Captain
Cook
Nor this alone, but, pausing on the road,
The bard sighs forth a gentle episode;⁴
And gravely tells—attend, each beauteous

Though Bristol bloat him with the ver-³⁹⁵ If Commerce fills the purse, she clogs the

And Amos Cottle strikes the lyre in vain.
In him an author's luckless lot behold, 'condemn'd to make the books which once he sold.
Oh, Amos Cottle!—Phœbus! what a name To fill the speaking trump of future
fame!
Oh, Amos Cottle! for a moment think What meagre profits spring from pen and ink!
When thus devoted to poetic dreams,
Who will peruse thy prostituted reams?
⁴⁰⁵ Oh! pen perverted! paper misapplied!— Had Cottle still adorn'd the counter's
side, Bent o'er the desk, or, born to useful toils,
Been taught to make the paper which he soils,
Plough'd, delved, or plied the oar with lusty limb, ⁴¹⁰ He had not sung of Wales, nor I of him.
As Sisyphus against the infernal steep Rolls the huge rock whose motions ne'er may sleep,
So up thy hill, ambrosial Richmond, heaves
Dull Maurice all his granite weight of leaves.
⁴¹⁵ Smooth, solid monuments of mental pain!
The petrifications of a plodding brain,
That, ere they reach the top, fall lumbering back again
With broken lyre and cheek serenely
pale,
Lo! sad Alcæus wanders down the vale, ⁴²⁰ Though fair they rose, and might have bloom'd at last,
His hopes have perish'd by the northern blast
Nipp'd in the bud by Caledonian gales,
His blossoms wither as the blast prevails!
O'er his lost works let classic Sheffield
weep; ⁴²⁵ May no rude hand disturb their early
sleep!
Yet say! why should the bard at once
reign
His claim to favor from the sacred nine?
Forever startled by the mingled howl
Of northern wolves, that still in darkness

¹ Mallet was hired by Henry St John, Lord Bolingbroke, to defame Pope, after his death, because he had kept some copies of The Patriot King, a work by Bolingbroke, which Bolingbroke himself had ordered destroyed

- 430 A coward brood, which mangle as they prey,
By hellish instinct, all that cross their way,
Aged or young, the living or the dead,
No mercy find—these harpies must be fed.
Why do the injured unresisting yield 435 The calm possession of their native field?
Why tamely thus before their fangs retreat, Nor hunt the blood-hounds back to Arthur's Seat?
- Health to immortal Jeffrey! once, in name, England could boast a judge almost the same.¹ 440 In soul so like, so merciful, yet just,
Some think that Satan has resign'd his trust,
And given the spirit to the world again,
To sentence letters, as he sentenced men.
With hand less mighty, but with heart as black, 445 With voice as willing to decree the rack; Bred in the courts betimes, though all that law
As yet hath taught him is to find a flaw, Since well instructed in the patriot school
To rail at party, though a party tool, 450 Who knows, if chance his patrons should restore Back to the sway they forfeited before,
His scribbling toils some recompense may meet,
And raise this Daniel to the judgment-seat?²
Let Jeffrey's shade indulge the pious hope, 455 And greeting thus, present him with a rope—
"Heir to my virtues' man of equal mind' Skill'd to condemn as to traduce mankind,
This cord receive, for thee reserved with care,
To wield in judgment, and at length to wear"
- 460 Health to great Jeffrey! Heaven preserve his life,
To flourish on the fertile shores of Fife.
And guard it sacred in its future wars,
Since authors sometimes seek the field of Mars!
Can none remember that eventful day
- 465 That ever-glorious, almost fatal fray,
When Little's leadless pistol met his eye,³ And Bow-Street myrmidons² stood laughing by?
Oh, day disastrous! on her firm-set rock, Dunedin's castle felt a secret shock;
170 Dark roll'd the sympathetic waves of Forth, Low groan'd the startled whirlwinds of the north;
Tweed ruffled half his waves to form a tear,
The other half pursued its calm career;
Arthur's steep summit nodded to its base, 475 The surly Tolbooth scarcely kept her place.
The Tolbooth felt—for marble sometimes can,
On such occasions, feel as much as man—
The Tolbooth felt defrauded of his charms, If Jeffrey died, except within her arms:
480 Nay last, not least, on that portentous morn,
The sixteenth story, where himself was born,
His patrimonial garret, fell to ground,
And pale Edina shudder'd at the sound Strew'd were the streets around with milk-white reams, 485 Flow'd all the Canongate with inky streams;
Thus of his candor seem'd the sable dew,
That of his valor show'd the bloodless hue,
And all with justice deem'd the two combined
The mingled emblems of his mighty mind.
490 But Caledonia's goddess hover'd o'er
The field, and saved him from the wrath of Moore,
From either pistol snatch'd the vengeful lead,
And straight restored it to her favorite's head;
That head, with greater than magnetic power, 495 Caught it, as Danaë caught the golden shower,
And, though the thickening dross will scarce refine, Augments its ore, and is itself a mine.
"My son," she cried, "ne'er thirst for gore again, Resign the pistol and resume the pen;

² Officers from the Bow street police court (London)

500 O'er politics and poesy preside, Boast of thy country, and Britannia's guide!

For long as Albion's heedless sons submit,
Or Scottish taste decides on English wit,
So long shall last thine unmolested reign.

505 Nor any dare to take thy name in vain Behold, a chosen band shall aid thy plan,
And own thee chieftain of the critic clan.
First in the oat-fed phalanx shall be seen The travell'd thane, Athenian Aberdeen.

510 Herbert shall wield Thor's hammer, and sometimes,
In gratitude, thou'lt praise his rugged rhymes

Smug Sidney too thy bitter page shall seek,

And classic Hallam, much renown'd for Greek;

Scott may perchance his name and influence lend,

515 And paltry Pillans shall traduce his
friend,

While gay Thalia's luckless votary,
Lambe,

Damn'd like the devil, devil-like will damn.

Known be thy name, unbounded be thy sway!

Thy Holland's banquets shall each toil repay,

520 While grateful Britain yields the praise she owes

To Holland's hnehangs and to learning's foes.

Yet mark one caution ere thy next Review Spread its light wings of saffron and of blue,¹

Beware lest blundering Brougham destroy the sale,

525 Turn beet to bannocks,² cauliflowers to kail,³

Thus having said, the kilted goddess kiss'd

Her son, and vanish'd in a Scottish mist.

Then prosper, Jeffrey! pertest of the train

Whom Scotland pampers with her fiery grain!

530 Whatever blessing wait a genuine Scot,
In double portion swells thy glorious lot;
For thee Edina culls her evening sweets,
And showers their odors on thy candid sheets,

Whose hue and fragrance to thy work adhere—

535 This scents its pages, and that gilds its rear.

Lo! blushing Itch, coy nymph, enamor'd
grown,

Forsakes the rest, and cleaves to thee
alone;

And, too unjust to other Pictish men, Enjoys thy person, and inspires thy pen!

To the famed throng now paid the tribute due,

800 Neglected genius! let me turn to you Come forth, oh Campbell! give thy talents scope,

Who dares aspire if thou must cease to hope?⁴

And thou, melodious Rogers! rise at last, Recall the pleasing memory of the past,⁵

805 Arise! let blest remembrance still inspire, And strike to wonted tones thy hallow'd lyre;

Restore Apollo to his vacant throne,
Assert thy country's honor and thine own.

What! must deserted Poesy still weep Where her last hopes with pious Cowper
sleep?

810 Unless, perchance, from his cold bier she turns,

To deck the turf that wraps her minstrel,
Burns!

No! though contempt hath mark'd the spurious blood,

The race who rhyme from folly, or for food,

815 Yet still some genuine sons 'tis hers to boast,

Who, least affecting, still affect the most:
Feel as they write, and write but as they feel—

Bear witness Gifford, Sotheby, Macneil.

"Why slumbers Gifford?" once was ask'd in vain,

820 Why slumbers Gifford? let us ask again.⁶
Are there no follies for his pen to purge?

Are there no fools whose backs demand the scourge?

Are there no sins for satire's bard to greet?

Stalks not gigantic Vice in every street?

825 Shall peers or princes tread pollution's path,

- And 'scape alike the law's and muse's wrath?
Nor blaze with guilty glare through future
 time,
Eternal beacons of consummate crime?
Arouse thee, Gifford! be thy promise claim'd, 830 Make bad men better, or at least ashamed.
- Unhappy White! while life was in its
 spring,
And thy young muse just waved her joyous wing,
The spoiler swept that soaring lyre away,
Which else had sounded an immortal lay.
835 Oh! what a noble heart was here undone,¹ When Science' self destroy'd her favorite son!
Yes, she too much indulged thy fond pursuit,
She sow'd the seeds, but death has reap'd the fruit.
'Twas thine own genius gave the final
 blow, 840 And help'd to plant the wound that laid thee low.
So the struck eagle, stretch'd upon the
 plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar
 again,
View'd his own feather on the fatal
 dart,
And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in his
 heart;
845 Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel
He nursed the pinion which impell'd the steel;
While the same plumage that had warm'd his nest
Drank the last life-drop of his bleeding
 breast.
- There be who say, in these enlighten'd
 days, 850 That splendid lies are all the poet's
 praise;
That strain'd invention, ever on the wing, Alone impels the modern bard to sing
'Tis true, that all who rhyme—nay, all who write,
Shrink from that fatal word to genius—trite;
855 Yet Truth sometimes will lend her noblest fires,
And decorate the verse herself inspires.
This fact in Virtue's name let Crabbe attest;
- Though nature's sternest painter, yet the
 best.

Yet let them¹ not to vulgar Wordsworth stoop,
The meanest object of the lowly group, 905 Whose verse, of all but childish prattle void,
Seems blessed harmony to Lamb and Lloyd.
Let them—but hold, my muse, nor dare to teach A strain far, far beyond thy humble reach.
The native genius with their being given 910 Will point the path, and peal their notes to heaven.
- And thou, too, Scott! resign to minstrels rude
The wilder slogan of a Border feud.
Let others spin then meagre lines for me, Enough for genius, if itself inspire!
915 Let Southey sing, although his teeming
 muse,
Prolific every spring, be too profuse.
Let simple Wordsworth chime his childish verse,
And brother Coleridge lull the babe at nurse,²
Let spectre-mongering Lewis aim, at most, 920 To rouse the gallies, or to raise a ghost.
Let Moore still sigh; let Strangford steal from Moore,
And swear that Camoens sang such notes
 of yore,
Let Hayley hobble on, Montgomery rave,
And godly Grahame chant a stupid slave.
925 Let sonneteering Bowles his strains refine.
And whine and whimper to the fourteenth
 line;
Let Stott, Carlisle, Matilda, and the rest Of Grub Street, and of Grosvenor Place
 the best,
Scrawl on, till death release us from the
 strain,
930 Or Common Sense assert her rights again.
But thou, with powers that mock the aid of praise,
Shouldst leave to humbler bards ignoble
 lays Thy country's voice, the voice of all the nine,

⁵ The cypress is an emblem of mourning; the myrtle, of love ⁶ turtledove

- Where the flowers ever blossom, the beams ever shine,
Where the light wings of Zephyr, oppress'd with perfume, Wax faint o'er the gardens of Gûl¹ in her bloom;
Where the citron and olive are fairest of fruit, 10 And the voice of the nightingale never is mute:
Where the tints of the earth, and the hues of the sky,
In color though varied, in beauty may vie,
And the purple of ocean is deepest in dye;
Where the virgins are soft as the roses they twine,
15 And all, save the spirit of man, is divine?
'Tis the clime of the East; 'tis the land
of the Sun—
'Can he smile on such deeds as his children have done?
Oh! wild as the accents of lovers' farewell Are the hearts which they bear, and the tales which they tell
- 20 Begirt with many a gallant slave, Apparell'd as becomes the brave,
Awaiting each his lord's behest
To guide his steps, or guard his rest, Old Giaffir sate in his Divan² 25 Deep thought was in his aged eye,
And though the face of Mussulman Not oft betrays to standers by The mind within, well skill'd to hide
All but unconquerable pride, 30 His pensive cheek and pondering brow Did more than he was wont avow
- "Let the chamber be clear'd."—The train disappear'd—
"Now call me the chief of the Haram guard."
35 With Giaffir is none but his only son,
And the Nubian awaiting the sire's award.
"Haroun—when all the crowd that wait
Are pass'd beyond the outer gate, (Woe to the head whose eye beheld 40 My child Zuleika's face unveil'd!) Hence, lead my daughter from her
tower;
Her fate is fix'd this very hour:
Yet not to her repeat my thought;
By me alone be duty taught!"
- 45 "Pacha! to hear is to obey."
No more must slave to despot say—
- Then to the tower had ta'en his way,
But here young Selim silence brake,
First lowly rendering reverence meet;
And downcast look'd, and gently spake, 50 Still standing at the Pacha's feet:
For son of Moslem must expire, Ere dare to sit before his sire!
- "Father! for fear that thou shouldst chide
My sister, or her sable guide, 55 Know—for the fault, if fault there be,
Was mine, then fall thy frowns on
me—
So lovelily the morning shone,
That—let the old and weary sleep—
I could not; and to view alone 60 The fairest scenes of land and deep,
With none to listen and reply To thoughts with which my heart beat
high
Were irksome—for whate'er my mood,
In sooth I love not solitude;
65 I on Zuleika's slumber broke,
And, as thou knowest that for me Soon turns the Haram's grating key.
Before the guardian slaves awoke
We to the cypress groves had flown, 70 And made earth, man, and heaven our own!
There linger'd we, beguiled too long
With Mejnoun's tale, or Sadi's song.
Till I, who heard the deep tambour¹ Beat thy Divan's approaching hour, 75 To thee, and to my duty true, Warn'd by the sound, to greet thee
flew.
But there Zuleika wanders yet—
Nay, father, rage not—nor forget That none can pierce that secret bowe!
80 But those who watch the women's tower."
- "Son of a slave"—the Pacha said—
"From unbelieving mother bred, Vain were a father's hope to see Aught that beseems a man in thee 85 Thou, when thine arm should bend the bow,
And hurl the dart, and curb the steed.
Thou, Greek in soul if not in creed.
Must pore where babbling waters flow,
And watch unfolding roses blow 90 Would that yon orb, whose matin glow Thy listless eyes so much admire, Would lend thee something of his fire!
Thou, who wouldst see this battlement

¹ the rose² royal court council of state¹ A large kettledrum which was sounded at sunrise, noon and twilight

- 95 By Christian cannon piecemeal rent;
 Nay, tamely view old Stambol's wall 145
 Before the dogs of Moscow fall, Nor strike one stroke for life and death Against the curs of Nazareth!
 100 Go—let thy less than woman's hand Assume the distaff—not the brand. 150
 But, Hailoun!—to my daughter speed, And hark—of thine own head take heed—
 If thus Zuleika oft takes wing—
 Thou see'st yon bow—it hath a sting! 155
- 106 No sound from Selim's lip was heard,
 At least that met old Gaffir's ear,
 But every frown and every word Pierced keener than a Christian's sword "Son of a slave!—reproach'd with
 fear!
 110 Those gibes had cost another dear Son of a slave!—and who my sire?"
 Thus held his thoughts their dark
 career,
 And glances ev'n of more than he Flash forth, then faintly disappear 115 Old Gaffir gazed upon his son And started, for within his eye
 He read how much his wrath had done.
 He saw rebellion there begun
 "Come hither, boy—what, no reply? 165 120 I mark thee—and I know thee too,
 But there be deeds thou dar'st not do But if thy beard had manlier length,
 And if thy hand had skill and strength,
 I'd joy to see thee break a lance.
 125 Albeit against my own perchance"
- As sneeringly these accents fell,
 On Selim's eye he fiercely gazed That eye return'd him glance for
 glance,
 And proudly to his sire's was raised, 130 Till Gaffir's quail'd and shrunk
 askance—
 And why—he felt, but durst not tell.
 "Much I misdoubt this wayward boy Will one day work me more annoy
 I never loved him from his birth, 135 And—but his arm is little worth,
 And scarcely in the chase could cope With timid fawn or antelope, Far less would venture into strife Where man contends for fame and
 life—
 140 I would not trust that look or tone
 No—nor the blood so near my own.
 That blood—he hath not heard—no
 more—I'll watch him closer than before
- He is an Arab to my sight,¹ Or Christian crouching in the fight—
 But hark!—I hear Zuleika's voice, Like Houris' hymn it meets mine ear:
 She is the offspring of my choice;
 Oh! more than ev'n her mother dear, 150 With all to hope, and nought to fear—
 My Peri! ever welcome here!
 Sweet, as the desert fountain's wave
 To lips just cool'd in time to save—Such to my longing sight art thou Nor can they waft to Mecca's shine More thanks for life, than I for thine, Who blest thy birth and bless thee
 now."
- Fan, as the first that fell of womankind,² When on that dread yet lovely serpent smiling, 160 Whose image then was stamp'd upon her
 mind—
 But once beguil'd—and ever more be guiling,
 Dazzling, as that, oh! too transcendent vision
 To Sorrow's phantom-peopled slumber
 given,
 When heart meets heart again in dreams
 Elysian, 165 And paints the lost on Earth revived in Heaven,
 Soft, as the memory of buried love, Pure, as the prayer which Childhood wafts above,
 Was she—the daughter of that rude old Chief,
 Who met the maid with tears—but not of grief.
- 170 Who hath not proved how feebly words essay
 To fix one spark of Beauty's heavenly
 ray?
 Who doth not feel, until his failing sight Faints into dimness with its own delight, His changing cheek, his sinking heart confess 175 The might, the majesty of Loveliness?
 Such was Zuleika, such around her shone
 The nameless charms unmark'd by her
 alone—
 The light of love, the purity of grace,
 The mind, the Music breathing from her
 face, 180 The heart whose softness harmonized the whole,
 And oh! that eye was in itself a Soul!

² Eve See Genesis, 3

Her graceful arms in meekness bending Across her gently-budding breast;
 At one kind word those arms extending 235
 To clasp the neck of him who blest His child caressing and caress, Zuleika came—and Giaffir felt
 His purpose half within him melt:
 Not that against her fancied weal 240
 His heart though stern could ever feel, Affection chain'd her to that heart,
 Ambition tore the links apart.

“Zuleika! child of gentleness!
 How dear this very day must tell, 195 When I forget my own distress,
 In losing what I love so well,
 To bid thee with another dwell Another! and a braver man Was never seen in battle's van 200 We Moslem reck not much of blood.
 But yet the line of Curasman Unchanged, unchangeable hath stood First of the bold Timariot bands!
 That won and well can keep their lands 205 Enough that he who comes to woo Is kinsman of the Rev Oglou
 His years need scarce a thought employ. 255
 I would not have thee wed a boy
 And thou shalt have a noble dower
 And his and my united power 210 Will laugh to scorn the death-firman,² Which others tremble but to scan.
 And teach the messenger what fate
 The bearer of such boon may wait 215 And now thou know'st thy father's will
 All that thy sex hath need to know
 'Twas mine to teach obedience still—
 The way to love, thy lord may
 show”

In silence bow'd the virgin's head, 220 And if her eye was fill'd with tears
 That stifled feeling dare not shed,
 And changed her cheek from pale to red,
 And red to pale, as though her ears 225 Those winged words like arrows sped.
 What could such be but maiden fears?³
 So bright the tear in Beauty's eye.
 Love half regrets to kiss it dry;
 So sweet the blush of Bashfulness, Even Pity scarce can wish it less!

230 Whate'er it was the sire forgot;
 Or if remember'd, mark'd it not, Thrice clapp'd his hands, and call'd his
 steed,

Resign'd his gem-adorned chibouque,¹
 And mounting fealty² for the mead,

 His way amid his Delis⁵ took,
 To witness many an active deed
 With sabre keen, or blunt jerreed.⁶
 The Kislar⁷ only and his Moors
 Watch well the Haram's massy doors.

His head was leant upon his hand,
 His eye look'd o'er the dark blue water That swiftly glides and gently swells Between the winding Dardanelles; 245 But yet he saw nor sea nor strand, Nor even his Pacha's turban'd band
 Mix in the game of mimic slaughter.
 Career'ing cleave the folded felt,
 With sabre stroke right sharply dealt.
 250 Nor mark'd the javelin-darting crowd Nor heard their Ollahs⁸ wild and loud—He thought but of old Giaffir's daughter!

No word from Selim's bosom broke.
 One sigh Zuleika's thought bespoke Still gazed he through the lattice grate, Pale, mute, and mournfully sedate
 To him Zuleika's eye was turn'd,
 But little from his aspect learn'd.
 Equal her grief, yet not the same;
 Her heart confess'd a gentler flame.
 But yet that heart, alarm'd or weak,
 She knew not why, forbade to speak
 Yet speak she must—but when essay?
 “How strange he thus should turn
 away!”
 265 Not thus we e'er before have met, Nor thus shall be our parting yet.” Thrice paced she slowly through the
 room,

And watch'd his eye—it still was fix'd She snatch'd the urn wherein was nix'd
 The Persian Atar-gul's perfume,⁹
 And sprinkled all its odors o'er
 The pictured roof and marble floor:
 The drops, that through his glittering vest
 The playful girl's appeal address'd, 275 Unheeded o'er his bosom flew,
 As if that breast were marble too

 She saw in curious order set 280 The fairest flowers of eastern land—
 "He loved them once; may touch them
 yet,
 If offer'd by Zuleika's hand." 280 The childish thought was hardly breathed
 Before the rose was pluck'd and
 wreathed;
 285 The next fond moment saw her seat Her fairy form at Selim's feet:
 "This rose to calm my brother's cares 335
 A message from the bulbul¹ bears;
 It says tonight he will prolong 290 For Selim's ear his sweetest song;
 And though his note is somewhat sad, He'll try for once a strain more glad, 340 With some faint hope his alter'd lay May sing these gloomy thoughts away
- 295 "What! not receive my foolish flower?
 Nay then I am indeed unbless'd.
 345 On me can thus thy forehead lower?
 And know'st thou not who loves thee
 best?
 Oh, Selim dear! oh, more than dearest!
 300 Say, is it me thou hat'st or fearest?
 Come, lay thy head upon my breast, 350 And I will kiss thee into rest, Since words of mine, and songs must
 fail,
 Ev'n from my fabled nightingale.
 305 I knew our sire at times was stern,
 But thus from thee had yet to learn:
 Too well I know he loves thee not, 355 But is Zuleika's love forgot?
 Ah! deem I right? the Pacha's plan—310 This kinsman Bey of Carasman
 Perhaps may prove some foe of thine
 If so, I swear by Mecca's shrine,— 360 If shrines that ne'er approach allow To woman's step admit her vow,— 315 Without thy free consent, command,
 The Sultan should not have my hand!
 Think'st thou that I could bear to 365
 part
 With thee, and learn to halve my
 heart?
 Ah! were I sever'd from thy side, 320 Where were thy friend—and who my 370
 guide?
 Years have not seen, Time shall not see,
 The hour that tears my soul from thee:
 Ev'n Azrael, from his deadly quiver
 When flies that shaft, and fly it must, 375 325 That parts all else, shall doom forever
 Our hearts to undivided dust!"
- He lived—he breathed—he moved—he
 felt;
 He raised the maid from where she knelt;
 His trance was gone—his keen eye shone 280 With thoughts that long in darkness dwelt,
 With thoughts that burn—in rays that melt.
 As the stream late conceal'd
 By the fringe of its willows,
 When it rushes reveal'd
 In the light of its billows,
 As the bolt bursts on high
 From the black cloud that bound it, Flash'd the soul of that eye
 Through the long lashes round it.
 340 A war-horse at the trumpet's sound,
 A lion roused by heedless hound,
 A tyrant waked to sudden strife
 By graze of ill-directed knife, Starts not to more convulsive life Than he, who heard that vow, display'd,
 And all, before repress'd, betray'd:
 "Now thou art mine, forever mine,
 With life to keep, and scarce with life resign;
 Now thou art mine, that sacred oath, 350 Though sworn by one, hath bound us
 both.
 Yes, fondly, wisely hast thou done,
 That vow hath saved more heads than
 one:
 But blench not thou—thy simplest tress Claims more from me than tenderness.
 355 I would not wrong the slenderest hair
 That clusters round thy forehead fair,
 For all the treasures buried far Within the caves of Istakar
 This morning clouds upon me lower'd, 360 Reproaches on my head were shower'd,
 And Giaffir almost call'd me coward!
 Now I have motive to be brave;
 The son of his neglected slave, Nay, start not, 'twas the term he gave,
 May show, though little apt to vaunt,
 A heart his words nor deeds can daunt.
 His son, indeed!—yet, thanks to thee, Perchance I am, at least shall be;
 But let our plighted secret vow
 Be only known to us as now.
 I know the wretch who dares demand
 From Giaffir thy reluctant hand;
 More ill-got wealth, a meaner soul Holds not a Musselim's¹ control:
 Was he not bred in Egripo?
 A viler race let Israel show!
 But let that pass—to none be told

 Thy cheek, thine eyes, thy lips to kiss, 395 Like this—and this—no more than this,
 For, Allah! sure thy lips are flame
 What fever in thy veins is flushing? 450
 My own have nearly caught the same,
 At least I feel my cheek, too, blush-
 ing
 400 To soothe thy sickness, watch thy health,

 Or stand with smiles unmurmuring by.
 And lighten half thy poverty.
 405 Do all but close thy dying eye,
 For that I could not live to try,

 More can I do? or thou require?
 But, Selim, thou must answer why 460
 We need so much of mystery?
 410 The cause I cannot dream nor tell.
 But be it, since thou say'st 'tis well, Yet what thou mean'st by 'arms' and

CANTO THE SECOND

The winds are high on Helle's wave,
 As on that night of stormy water
 When Love, who sent, forgot to save The young, the beautiful, the brave.
 5 The lonely hope of Sestos' daughter!
 Oh! when alone along the sky
 Her turret-torch was blazing high, Though rising gale, and breaking foam,
 And shrieking sea-birds warn'd him
 home,
 10 And clouds aloft and tides below,
 With signs and sounds, forbade to go,
 He could not see, he would not hear,
 Or sound or sign foreboding fear,
 His eye but saw that light of love, 15 The only star it hail'd above;
 His ear but rang with Hero's song,
 "Ye waves, divide not lovers long!"— That tale is old, but love anew May nerve young hearts to prove as true
 20 The winds are high, and Helle's tide Rolls darkly heaving to the main,
 And Night's descending shadows hide
 That field with blood bedew'd in vain,
 The desert of old Priam's pride, 25 The tombs, sole relics of his reign, All—save immortal dreams that could beguile
 The blind old man of Scio's rocky isle!
 Oh! yet—for there my steps have been,
 These feet have press'd the sacred
 shore,
 30 These limbs that buoyant wave hath borne²—
 Minstrel! with thee to muse, to mourn,
 To trace again those fields of yore, Believing every hillock green Contains no fabled hero's ashes,

² Byron swam across the Hellespont to test Homer's use of the adjective εγχορ, broad or boundless. See Byron's Don Juan, 2, 105 and n 1 (p 561).

35 And that around the undoubted scene Thine own "broad Hellespont" still dashes,
 Be long my lot! and cold were he Who there could gaze denying thee!
 The night hath closed on Helle's stream, 40 Nor yet hath risen on Ida's hill That moon, which shone on his high theme.
 No warrior chides her peaceful beam, But conscious shepherds bless it still Their flocks are grazing on the mound 45 Of him¹ who felt the Dardian's arrow That mighty heap of gather'd ground Which Ammon's son² ran proudly round,
 By nations raised, by monarchs crown'd,
 Is now a lone and nameless barrow!
 50 Within—thy dwelling-place how narrow!
 Without—can only strangers breathe
 The name of him that was beneath Dust long outlasts the storied stone,
 But thou—thy very dust is gone!
 55 Late, late tonight will Dian cheer
 The swain, and chase the boatman's
 fear,
 Till then—no beacon on the cliff
 May shape the course of struggling <skiff.
 The scatter'd lights that skirt the bay, 60 All, one by one, have died away,
 The only lamp of this lone hour
 Is glimmering in Zuleika's tower.
 Yes! there is light in that lone chamber,
 And o'er her silken ottoman³ 65 Are thrown the fragrant beads of amber,⁴
 O'er which her fairy fingers ran,
 Near these, with emerald rays beset, (How could she thus that gem forget?)
 Her mother's sainted amulet, 70 Whereon engraved the Koorsee text, 'Could smooth this life, and win the next,
 And by her comboloos⁵ lies

 And many a bright emblazon'd rhyme

 And o'er those scrolls, not oft so mute, Reclines her now neglected lute,

And round her lamp of fretted gold Bloom flowers in urns of China's mould, 80 The richest work of Iran's loom,
 And Sheeraz' tribute of perfume,
 All that can eye or sense delight Are gather'd in that gorgeous room
 But yet it hath an air of gloom 85 She, of this Peril cell the spite.
 What doth she hence, and on so rude a
 night?

Wrapt in the darkest sable vest,
 Which none save noblest Moslem wear,
 To guard from winds of heaven the
 breast
 90 As heaven itself to Selim dear, With cautious steps the thicket thread-
 ing,
 And starting oft, as through the glade
 The gust its hollow moaning made,
 Till on the smoother pathway treading, 95 More free her timid bosom beat,
 The maid pursued her silent guide,
 And though her terror urged retreat,
 How could she quit her Selim's side?
 How teach her tender lips to chide?
 100 They reach'd at length a grotto, hewn
 By nature, but enlarged by art,
 Where oft her lute she wont to tune,
 And oft her Koran conn'd apart,
 And oft in youthful reverie 105 She dream'd what Paradise might be Where woman's parted soul shall go Her Prophet had disclaim'd to show.¹
 But Selim's mansion was secure, Nor deem'd she, could he long endure 110 His bower in other worlds of bliss Without her, most beloved in this!
 Oh! who so dear with him could dwell?
 What Houri soothe him half so well?

Since last she visited the spot 115 Some change seem'd wrought within the grot
 It might be only that the night
 Disguised things seen by better light That brazen lamp but dimly threw A ray of no celestial hue, 120 But in a nook within the cell Her eye on stranger objects fell
 There arms were piled, not such as wield
 The turban'd Delis in the field.
 But brands of foreign blade and hilt, 125 And one was red—perchance with guilt!
 Ah! how without can blood be spilt?

A cup too on the board was set
 That did not seem to hold sherbet.
 What may this mean? she turn'd to see Her Selim—"Oh! can this be he?"

His robe of pride was thrown aside, His brow no high-crown'd turban
 bore,
 But in its stead a shawl of red, Wreathed lightly round, his temples wore.

That dagger, on whose hilt the gem
 Were worthy of a diadem,
 No longer glitter'd at his waist,
 Where pistols unadorn'd were braced,
 And from his belt a sabre swung,
 And from his shoulder loosely hung
 The cloak of white, the thin capote¹
 That decks the wandering Candiot,² Beneath—his golden plated vest Clung like a cuirass to his breast,
 The greaves below his knee that wound With silvery scales were sheathed and
 bound
 But were it not that high command Spake in his eye, and tone, and hand,
 All that a careless eye could see In him was some young Galiouée³

"I said I was not what I seem'd, And now thou see'st my words were
 true.
 I have a tale thou hast not dream'd,
 If sooth—its truth must others rue 155 My story now 'twere vain to hide, I must not see thee Osman's bride.
 But had not thine own lips declared
 How much of that young heart I shared.
 I could not, must not, yet have shown The darker secret of my own 160 In this I speak not now of love, That, let time, truth, and peril prove.
 But first—Oh! never wed another—Zuleika! I am not thy brother!"

"Oh! not my brother!—yet unsay—God! am I left alone on earth
 To mourn—I dare not curse—the day That saw my solitary birth.
 Oh! thou wilt love me now no more!
 170 My sinking heart forboded ill;
 But know me all I was before, Thy sister—friend—Zuleika still Thou led'st me here perchance to kill If thou hast cause for vengeance, see!
 My breast is offer'd—take thy fill!
 Far better with the dead to be

- Than live thus nothing now to thee! 230
 Perhaps far worse, for now I know Why Giaffir always seem'd thy foe; 180 And I, alas! am Giaffir's child,
 For whom thou wert contemn'd, reviled.
 If not thy sister—wouldst thou save My life, oh! bid me be thy slave!" 235
- "My slave, Zuleika!—nay, I'm thine:
 185 But, gentle love, this transport calm.
 Thy lot shall yet be link'd with mine;
 I swear it by our Prophet's shrine, 240
 And be that thought thy sorrow's balm.
 So may the Koran verse display'd 190 Upon its steel direct my blade,
 In danger's hour to guard us both, 245
 As I preserve that awful oath!
 The name in which thy heart hath prided Must change; but, my Zuleika, know, 195 That tie is widen'd, not divided, Although thy sire's my deadliest foe
 My father was to Giaffir all That Selim late was deem'd to thee
 That brother wrought a brother's fall, 200 But spared, at least, my infancy; 250
 And lull'd with me a vain deceit
 That yet a like return may meet.
 He rear'd me, not with tender help,
 But like the nephew of a Cain;
 205 He watch'd me like a lion's whelp, That gnaws and yet may break his 255
 chain.
 My father's blood in every vein
 Is boiling; but for thy dear sake No present vengeance will I take;
 210 Though here I must no more remain But first, beloved Zuleika! hear 260 How Giaffir wrought this deed of fear.
- "How first their strife to rancor grew,
 If love or envy made them foes, 215 It matters little if I knew, 265
 In fiery spirits, slights, though few
 And thoughtless, will disturb repose.
 In war Abdallah's arm was strong, Remember'd yet in Bosniac song, 220 And Paswan's rebel hordes attest 270
 How little love they bore such guest.
 His death is all I need relate,
 The stern effect of Giaffir's hate;
 And how my birth disclosed to me, 225 Whate'er beside it makes, hath made 275 me free.
- "When Paswan, after years of strife,
 At last for power, but first for life,
 In Widdin's walls too proudly sate,
 Our Pachas rallied round the state;
- Nor last nor least in high command,
 Each brother led a separate band;
 They gave their horse-tails¹ to the wind,
 And mustering in Sophia's plain Their tents were pitch'd, their post assign'd;
 To one, alas! assign'd in vain!
 What need of words! the deadly bowl,
 By Giaffir's order drugged and given,
 With venom subtle as his soul,
 Dismiss'd Abdallah's hence to heaven.
 Reclined and feverish in the bath,
 He, when the hunter's sport was up,
 But little deem'd a brother's wrath
 To quench his thirst had such a cup
 The bowl a bribed attendant bore, He drank one draught, nor needed
 more!
 If thou my tale, Zuleika, doubt,
 Call Haroun—he can tell it out.
- "The deed once done, and Paswan's feud
 In part suppress'd, though ne'er sub-
 dued,
 Abdallah's Pachalick² was gain'd:— Thou know'st not what in our Divan Can wealth procure for worse than
 man—Abdallah's honors were obtain'd—
 By him a brother's murder stain'd;
 'Tis true, the purchase nearly drain'd His ill got treasure, soon replaced.
 Wouldst question whence? Survey the waste,
 And ask the squalid peasant how His gains repay his broiling brow!—
 Why me the stern usurper spared,
 Why thus with me his palace shared,
 I know not. Shame, regret, remorse,
 And little fear from infant's force;
 Besides, adoption as a son
 By him whom Heaven accorded none,
 Or some unknown cabal, caprice, Preserved me thus,—but not in peace.
 He cannot curb his haughty mood,
 Nor I forgive a father's blood.
- "Within thy father's house are foes;
 Not all who break his bread are true:
 To these should I my birth disclose,
 His days, his very hours were few:
 They only want a heart to lead,
 A hand to point them to the deed.
 But Haroun only knows, or knew,
 This tale, whose close is almost nigh:
 He in Abdallah's palace grew,

 But what could single slavery do?
 Avenge his lord? alas! too late,
 Or save his son from such a fate?
 He chose the last, and when elate 285 With foes subdued, or friends betray'd,
 Proud Giaffir in high triumph sate, 335
 He led me helpless to his gate,
 And not in vain it seems essay'd
 To save the life for which he pray'd 290 The knowledge of my birth secured From all and each, but most from me;
 Thus Giaffir's safety was insured. 340 Removed he too from Roumelie

 300 And this and more to me reveals.
 Such still to guilt just Alla sends—Slaves, tools, accomplices—no friends! 350 “All this, Zuleika, harshly sounds; But harsher still my tale must be.
 305 Howe'er my tongue thy softness wounds, Yet I must prove all truth to thee.
 I saw thee start this garb to see,
 Yet is it one I oft have worn, 355
 And long must wear: this Gahongée, 310 To whom thy plighted vow is sworn,
 Is leader of those pirate hordes, Whose laws and lives are on their Awaited'st there the field's event.

 Haroun, who saw my spirit pining Beneath inaction's sluggish yoke, His captive, though with dread resign-
 ing,
 My thralldom for a season broke,
 On promise to return before

 'Tis vain—my tongue cannot impart
 My almost drunkenness of heart,
 When first this liberated eye
 Survey'd Earth, Ocean, Sun, and Sky,
 As if my spirit pierced them through,
 And all their inmost wonders knew!
 One word alone can paint to thee
 That more than feeling—I was Free!
 E'en for thy presence ceased to pine,
 The World—nay, Heaven itself was
 mine!
 “The shallop of a trusty Moor Convey'd me from this idle shore;
 I long'd to see the isles that gem

 I sought by turns, and saw them all, But when and where I join'd the
 crew,
 With whom I'm pledged to rise or fall,
 When all that we design to do Is done, 'twill then be time more meet
 To tell thee, when the tale's complete.
 “'Tis true, they are a lawless brood,
 But rough in form, not mild in mood;
 And every creed, and every race,
 With them hath found—may find a
 place;
 But open speech, and ready hand.
 Obedience to their chief's command,
 A soul for every enterprise,
 That never sees with terror's eyes, Friendship for each, and faith to all,
 And vengeance vow'd for those w'
 fall,
 Have made them fitting instruments
 For more than ev'n my own intents.
 And some—and I have studied all

 385 So let them ease their hearts with prate
 Of equal rights, which man ne'er knew,
 I have a love for freedom too.
 Ay! let me like the ocean-Patriarch roam,
 Or only know on land the Tartar's home!
 390 My tent on shore, my galley on the sea,
 Are more than cities and serais to me:
 Borne by my steed, or wafted by my sail,
 Across the desert, or before the gale, Bound where thou wilt, my barb² or glide, my prow!
 395 But be the star that guides the wanderer,
 thou!
 Thou, my Zuleika, share and bless my
 bark;

 Dear—as his native song to exile's ears, Shall sound each tone thy long-loved voice endears
 For thee in those bright isles is built a bower
 Blooming as Aden⁴ in its earliest hour 410 A thousand swords, with Selim's heart and hand,
 Wait—wave—defend—destroy—at thy

 Girt by my band, Zuleika at my side,
 The spoil of nations shall bedeck my bride
 The Haram's languid years of listless ease 415 Are well resign'd for cares—for joys like these
 Not blind to fate, I see, where'er I rove, Unnumber'd perils—but one only love!
 Yet well my toils shall that fond breast
 repay,
 Though fortune frown, or false friends
 betray.
 420 How dear the dream in darkest hours of ill,
 Should all be changed, to find thee faithful still!
 Be but thy soul, like Selim's, firmly shown,
 To thee be Selim's tender as thine own,
 To soothe each sorrow, share in each de-
 light,
 425 Blend every thought, do all—but disunite!
 Once free, 'tis mine our horde again to guide,
 Friends to each other, foes to aught beside:
 Yet there we follow but the bent assign'd
 By fatal Nature to man's warring kind 430 Mark! where his carnage and his conquests cease!
 He makes a solitude, and calls it—peace!
 I, like the rest, must use my skill or
 strength,
 But ask no land beyond my sabre's length Power sways but by division—her resource 435 The blessed alternative of fraud or force!
 Ours be the last, in time deceit may come When cities cage us in a social home There ev'n thy soul might eir—how oft the heart Corruption shakes which peril could not
 part!
 440 And woman, more than man, when death or woe,
 Or even Disgrace, would lay her lover
 low,
 Sunk in the lap of Luxury will shame—
 Away suspicion!—not Zuleika's name!
 But life is hazard at the best, and here 445 No more remains to win, and much to fear:
 Yes, fear! the doubt, the dread of losing
 thee,
 By Osman's power, and Giaffir's stern decree
 That dread shall vanish with the favoring
 gale,
 Which Love tonight hath promised to my sail.
 450 No danger daunts the pair his smile hath blest,
 Their steps still roving, but their hearts at rest.

 hath charms;

455 So that those arms cling closer round my

 The deepest murmur of this lip shall be,
 No sigh for safety, but a prayer for thee!
 The war of elements no fears impart To Love, whose deadliest bane is human 460 These lie the only rocks our course can 505

 But hence ye thoughts that rise in Hor-

 This hour bestows, or ever bars escape Few words remain of mine my tale to close,
 465 Of thine but one to waft us from our foes, Yea—foes—to me will Giaffir's hate decline?
 And is not Osman, who would part us, 515
 thine?
 “His head and faith from doubt and
 death
 Return'd in time my guard to save, 520 470 Few heard, none told, that o'er the

 From isle to isle I roved the while,
 And since, though parted from my band
 Too seldom now I leave the land,
 No deed they 've done, nor deed shall do, 525 475 Ere I have heard and doom'd it too:
 I form the plan, decree the spoil,
 'Tis fit I oftener share the toil
 But now too long I've held thine ear, Time presses, floats my bark, and here 480 We leave behind but hate and fear 530 Tomorrow Osman with his train Arrives—tonight must break thy chain.
 And wouldst thou save that haughty Bey,— Perchance his life who gave thee
 thine,— 485 With me this hour away—away!
 But yet, though thou art plighted
 mine,
 Wouldst thou recall thy willing vow.
 Appall'd by truths imparted now.
 Here rest I—not to see thee wed 490 But be that peril on my head!” 540

 Zuleika, mute and motionless, Stood like that statue of distress,
 When, her last hope forever gone,
 The mother harden'd into stone.
 495 All in the maid that eye could see Was but a younger Niobé.
 But ere her lip, or even her eye,
 Essay'd to speak, or look reply,

Beneath the garden's wicket porch
 Far flash'd on high a blazing torch!
 Another—and another—and another—“Oh! fly—no more—yet now my more than brother!”
 Far, wide, through every thicket spread
 The fearful lights are gleaming red, Nor these alone—for each right hand
 Is ready with a sheathless brand
 They part, pursue, return, and wheel
 With searching flambeau,¹ shining steel.
 And last of all, his sabre waving, Stern Giaffir in his fury raving.
 And now almost they touch the cave—Oh! must that grot be Selim's grave?

Dauntless he stood—“ 'Tis come—soon
 past—
 One kiss, Zuleika—'tis my last But yet my band not far from shore
 May hear this signal, see the flash, Yet now too few—the attempt were rash
 No matter—yet one effort more ”
 Forth to the cavern mouth he stept,
 His pistol's echo rang on high,
 Zuleika started not, nor wept, Despair benumb'd her breast and
 eye!
 “They hear me not, or if they ply Their oars, 'tis but to see me die, That sound hath drawn my foes more
 nigh

Then forth my father's scimitar,
 Thou ne'er hast seen less equal war!
 Farewell, Zuleika!—sweet! retire:
 Yet stay within—here linger safe,
 At thee his rage will only chafe
 Stir not—lest even to thee perchance
 Some erring blade or ball should glance.
 Fear 'st thou for him?—may I expire
 If in this strife I seek thy sire!
 No—though by him that poison pour'd;
 No—though again he call me coward!
 But tamely shall I meet their steel?
 No—as each crest save his may feel!”

One bound he made, and gain'd the
 sand:
 Already at his feet hath sunk
 The foremost of the prying band,
 A gasping head, a quivering trunk Another falls—but round him close A swarming circle of his foes; 545 From right to left his path he clef't.
 And almost met the meeting wave His boat appears—not five oars'
 length—

¹ flaming torch

His comrades strain with desperate strength—

Oh! are they yet in time to save?

His feet the foremost breakers lave;

His band are plunging in the bay,

Their sabres glitter through the spray;

Wet—wild—unwearied to the strand

They struggle—now they touch the land!

They come—'tis but to add to slaughter—

His heart's best blood is on the water.

Escaped from shot, unharm'd by steel,

Or scarcely grazed its force to feel,

Had Selim won, betray'd, beset,

To where the strand and billows met;

There as his last step left the land—

And the last death-blow dealt his hand—

Ah! wherefore did he turn to look

For her his eye but sought in vain?

That pause, that fatal gaze he took,

Hath doom'd his death, or fix'd his chain.

Sad proof, in peril and in pain,

How late will lover's hope remain!

His back was to the dashing spray;

Behind, but close, his comrades lay,

When, at the instant, hiss'd the ball—

“So may the foes of Giaffir fall!”

Whose voice is heard? whose carbine rang?

Whose bullet through the night-air sang.

Too nearly, deadly aim'd to err?

'Tis thine—Abdallah's murderer!

The father slowly rued thy hate,

The son hath found a quicker fate

Fast from his breast the blood is bubbling,

The whiteness of the sea-foam troubling—

If aught his lips essay'd to groan,

The rushing billows choked the tone!

Morn slowly rolls the clouds away;

Few trophies of the fight are there

The shouts that shook the midnight-bay

Are silent; but some signs of fray

That strand of strife may bear,

And fragments of each shiver'd brand;

Steps stamp'd; and dash'd into the sand

The print of many a struggling hand

May there be mark'd; nor far remote

A broken torch, an oarless boat;

And tangled on the weeds that heap

The beach where shelving to the deep

There lies a white capote!

'Tis rent in twain—one dark-red stain

The wave yet ripples o'er in vain;

But where is he who wore?

Ye! who would o'er his relics weep,

Go, seek them where the surges sweep

Their burthen round Sigæum's steep

And cast on Lemnos' shore:

The sea-birds shriek above the prey,

O'er which their hungry beaks delay,

As shaken on his restless pillow,

His head heaves with the heaving billow;

That hand, whose motion is not life,

Yet feebly seems to menace strife,

Flung by the tossing tide on high,

Then levell'd with the wave—

What reck's it, though that corse shall lie

Within a living grave?

The bird that tears that prostrate form

Hath only robb'd the meaner worm,

The only heart, the only eye

Had bled or wept to see him die.

Had seen those scatter'd limbs composed,

And mourn'd above his turban-stone,

That heart hath burst—that eye was closed—

Yea—closed before his own!

By Helle's stream there is a voice of wail!
And woman's eye is wet—man's cheek is pale.

Zuleika! last of Giaffir's race,

Thy destined lord is come too late:

He sees not—ne'er shall see thy face!

Can he not hear

The loud Wul-wulleh¹ warn his distant ear?

Thy handmaids weeping at the gate,

The Koran-chanters of the hymn of fate,

The silent slaves with folded arms that wait,

Sighs in the hall, and shrieks upon the gale,

Tell him thy tale!

Thou didst not view thy Selim fall!

That fearful moment when he left the cave

Thy heart grew chill:

He was thy hope—thy joy—thy love—thine all,

And that last thought on him thou couldst not save

Sufficed to kill;

Burst forth in one wild cry—and all was still.

Peace to thy broken heart, and virgin grave!

¹ The death song of the Turkish women.

Ah! happy! but of life to lose the worst! 680 That grief—though deep—though fatal—was thy first!
 Thrice happy ne'er to feel nor fear the force
 Of absence, shame, pride, hate, revenge. 685 remorse!
 646 And, oh! that pang where more than madness lies!
 The worm that will not sleep—and never
 dies;
 Thought of the gloomy day and ghastly
 night, 690
 That dreads the darkness, and yet loathes
 the light,
 That winds around, and tears the quivering heart!
 650 Ah! wherefore not consume it—and de- 695
 part!
 Woe to thee, rash and unrelenting chief!
 Vainly thou heap'st the dust upon thy
 head,
 Vainly the sackcloth o'er thy limbs dost
 spread. 700
 By that same hand Abdallah—Selim bled.
 655 Now let it tear thy beard in idle grief.
 Thy pride of heart, thy bride for Osman's bed, 705
 She, whom thy sultan had but seen to wed, Thy daughter's dead!
 Hope of thine age, thy twilight's lonely beam, 660 The star hath set that shone on Helle's 710
 stream.
 What quench'd its ray?—the blood that thou hast shed!
 Hark! to the hurried question of Despair.
 "Where is my child?"—an Echo an- 715 swers—"Where?"
 Within the place of thousand tombs 665 That shine beneath, while dark above
 The sad but living cypress blooms
 And withers not, though branch and leaf 720
 Are stamp'd with an eternal grief.
 Like early unrequited Love, 670 One spot exists, which ever blooms, Ev'n in that deadly grove—
 A single rose is shedding there
 Its lonely lustre, meek and pale. 725
 It looks as planted by Despair—675 So white—so faint—the slightest gale Might whirl the leaves on high;
 And yet, though storms and blight assail,
 And hands more rude than wintry sky May wring it from the stem—in 730
 vain—

Tomorrow sees it bloom again:
 The stalk some spirit gently rears,
 And waters with celestial tears;
 For well may maids of Helle deem That this can be no earthly flower, Which mocks the tempest's withering 685
 hour,
 And buds unshelter'd by a bower;
 Nor droops though Spring refuse her
 shower,
 Not woos the summer beam:
 To it the livelong night there sings
 A bird unseen—but not remote: 690
 Invisible his airy wings,
 But soft as harp that Hours strings
 His long entrancing note!
 It were the bulbul, but his throat, Though mournful, pours not such a 695
 strain.
 For they who listen cannot leave
 The spot, but linger there and grieve,
 As if they loved in vain!
 And yet so sweet the tears they shed,
 'Tis sorrow so unmix'd with dread,
 They scarce can bear the morn to break
 That melancholy spell,
 And longer yet would weep and wake,
 He sings so wild and well!
 700 But when the day-blush bursts from high
 Expires that magic melody.
 And some have been who could believe,
 (So fondly youthful dreams deceive, Yet harsh be they that blame,) 705
 That note so piercing and profound Will shape and syllable its sound Into Zuleika's name
 'Tis from her cypress summit heard,
 That melts in air the liquid word.
 710 'Tis from her lowly virgin earth
 That white rose takes its tender birth.
 There late was laid a marble stone;
 Eve saw it placed—the Morrow gone!
 It was no mortal arm that bore
 That deep-fix'd pillar to the shore;
 For there, as Helle's legends tell, Next morn 'twas found where Selim 715
 fell;
 Lash'd by the tumbling tide, whose wave Denied his bones a holier grave:
 And there by night, reclined, 'tis said,
 Is seen a ghastly turban'd head:
 And hence extended by the billow,
 'Tis named the "Pirate-phantom's pillow!"
 Where first it lay that mourning
 flower
 Hath flourish'd; flourisheth this 720
 hour,

Alone and dewy, coldly pure and pale;
As weeping Beauty's cheek at Sorrow's tale!

ODE TO NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE
1814 1814

'Tis done—but yesterday a king!
And aim'd with kings to strive—
And now thou art a nameless thing
So abject—yet alive!

5 Is this the man of thousand thrones.
Who strew'd our earth with hostile bones.
And can he thus survive?
Since he, miscall'd the Morning Star,¹ Nor man nor field hath fallen so far

10 Ill-minded man! why scourge thy kind Who bow'd so low the knee?
By gazing on thyself grown blind, Thou taught'st the rest to see With might unquestion'd,—power to save,—

15 Thine only gift hath been the grave.
To those that worshipp'd thee,
Nor till thy fall could mortals guess Ambition's less than littleness¹

Thanks for that lesson—It will teach 20 To after-warriors more, Than high Philosophy can preach
And vainly preach'd before That spell upon the minds of men Breaks never to unite again, 25 That led them to adore
Those Pagod things² of sabre sway
With fronts of brass, and feet of clay

The triumph and the vanity.
The rapture of the strife—

30 The earthquake voice of Victory,
To thee the breath of life,
The sword, the sceptre, and that sway
Which man seem'd made but to obey.
Wherewith renown was rife—

35 All quell'd!—Dark Spirit! what must be The madness of thy memory!

The desolator desolate!
The victor overthrown!

The arbiter of others' fate 40 A suppliant for his own!
Is it some yet imperial hope That with such change can calmly cope?
Or dread of death alone?
To die a prince—or live a slave—45 Thy choice is most ignobly brave!

Was slaked with blood of Rome,
Threw down the dagger—dared depart.

Yet left him such a doom!

75 Too late thou leav'st the high command
To which thy weakness clung,
All Evil Spirit as thou art,
It is enough to grieve the heart
To see thine own unstrung;
80 To think that God's fair world hath been The footstool of a thing so mean;

And Earth hath spilt her blood for him,
Who thus can hoard his own!

85 And monarchs bow'd the trembling limb,
And thank'd him for a throne!
Fair Freedom! we may hold thee dear,
When thus thy mightiest foes their fear
In humblest guise have shown.

¹ Milo, a famous Greek athlete (6th cent. B. C.), who is said to have been eaten by wolves while his hands were caught in the cleft of a tree which he had tried to pull apart. See Valerius Maximus' Factorum et Dictorum Memorabilium, IX, 12, 2, 9.

² After Napoleon abdicated the throne on April 8, 1814, he was banished to the Island of Elba.

³ Sulla, the great Roman general, who made himself dictator, revenged himself on his foes, and then, in the height of his power (79 B. C.), retired to private life.

⁴ Charles V, King of Spain and Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, who abdicated his throne in 1556, and spent the rest of his life in a monastery.

Oh! ne'er may tyrant leave behind 90 A brighter name to lure mankind!

Thine evil deeds are writ in gore,
 Nor written thus in vain—
 Thy triumphs tell of fame no more,
 Or deepen every stain.

95 If thou hadst died as honor dies,
 Some new Napoleon might arise,
 To shame the world again—
 But who would soar the solar height,
 To set in such a starless night?

100 Weigh'd in the balance, hero dust
 Is vile as vulgar clay, Thy scales, Mortality! are just
 To all that pass away
 But yet methought the living great 105 Some higher sparks should animate,
 To dazzle and dismay Nor deem'd Contempt could thus make mirth
 Of these, the conquerors of the earth

And she, proud Austria's mournful flower, 110 Thy still imperial bride,¹ How bears her breast the torturing hour?
 Still clings she to thy side?
 Must she too bend, must she too share Thy late repentance, long despair.
 115 Thou throneless homicide?
 If still she loves thee, hoard that gem,—
 'Tis worth thy vanish'd diadem!

Then haste thee to thy sullen isle,
 And gaze upon the sea,
 120 That element may meet thy smile—
 It ne'er was ruled by thee!
 Or trace with thine all idle hand
 In loitering mood upon the sand
 That Earth is now as free!
 125 That Corinth's pedagogue² liath now Transfer'd his by-word to thy brow.

Thou Timon! in his captive's cage³
 What thoughts will there be thine, While brooding in thy prison'd rage?
 130 But one—"The world was mine!"
 Unless, like he of Babylon,⁴
 All sense is with thy sceptre gone,

³ Napoleon is likened to Timur (Tamerlane), the Mongolian conqueror, who in 1402 defeated and captured Bajazet I, Sultan of Turkey, and is said to have carried him about in an iron cage. See Marlowe's Tamburlaine the Great, IV, 2, also Rowe's Tamerlane

⁴ Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon (604-561 B. C.). He was insane for seven years. See Daniel, 4.

Life will not long confine That spirit pour'd so widely forth—135 So long obey'd—so little worth!

O! like the thief of fire from heaven,¹ Wilt thou withstand the shock?
 And share with him, the unforgiven,
 His vulture and his rock!
 140 Foredoom'd by God—by man accurst,
 And that last act, though not thy worst,
 The very Friend's arch mock;²
 He in his fall preserved his pride,
 And, if a mortal, had as proudly died!

145 There was a day—there was an hour, While earth was Gaul's—Gaul thine—
 When that immeasurable power
 Unsated to resign
 Had been an act of purer fame 150 Than gathers round Marengo's name,
 And gilded thy decline,
 Through the long twilight of all time,
 Despite some passing clouds of crime

But thou forsooth must be a king, 155 And don the purple vest,
 As if that foolish robe could wring Remembrance from thy breast Where is that faded garment? where The gewgaws thou wert fond to wear, 160 The star, the string,³ the crest?
 Vain forward child of empire! say,
 Are all thy playthings snatched away?

Where may the wearied eye repose
 When gazing on the Great, 165 Where neither guilty glory glows, Nor despicable state?
 Yes—one—the first—the last—the best—
 The Cincinnatus of the West,
 Whom envy dared not hate, 170 Bequeath'd the name of Washington,
 To make man blush there was but one!

SHE WALKS IN BEAUTY⁴ 1814 1815

She walks in beauty, like the night Of cloudless climes and starry skies,
 And all that's best of dark and bright Meet in her aspect and her eyes.
 5 Thus mellow'd to that tender light Which heaven to gaudy day denies

³ The chain of enameled eagles

⁴ Lady Willmot Horton, whom Byron had seen at a ball, attired in mourning with spangles on her dress.

One shade the more, one ray the less,
 Had half impaired the nameless grace Which waves in every raven tress, 10 Or softly lightens o'er her face, Where thoughts serenely sweet express How pure, how dear their dwelling-
 place.

And on that cheek, and o'er that brow,
 So soft, so calm, yet eloquent, 15 The smiles that win, the tints that glow,
 But tell of days in goodness spent,
 A mind at peace with all below,
 A heart whose love is innocent!

OH! SNATCH'D AWAY IN BEAUTY'S BLOOM¹

1814 1815

Oh! snatch'd away in beauty's bloom,
 On thee shall press no ponderous tomb,
 But on thy turf shall roses rear
 Their leaves, the earliest of the year; 5 And the wild cypress² wave in tender
 gloom:

And oft by yon blue gushing stream Shall Sorrow lean her drooping head, And feed deep thought with many a dream,
 And lingering pause and lightly tread; 10 Fond wretch! as if her step disturb'd
 the dead!

Away! we know that tears are vain,
 That death nor heeds nor hears distress.
 Will this unteach us to complain?
 Or make one mourner weep the less?
 15 And thou—who tell'st me to forget,
 Thy looks are wan, thine eyes are wet.

MY SOUL IS DARK

1814 1815

My soul is dark—Oh! quickly string
 The harp I yet can brook to hear;³
 And let thy gentle fingers fling
 Its melting murmurs o'er mine ear.
 5 If in this heart a hope be dear,
 That sound shall charm it forth again:
 If in these eyes there lurk a tear,
 'Twill flow, and cease to burn my brain.

But bid the strain be wild and deep, 10 Nor let thy notes of joy be first:

¹ It has been surmised that this poem refers to the unidentified Thyrza. See Byron's To Thyrza.

² The cypress is an emblem of mourning, it is a common tree in graveyards.

³ See Macpherson's Osian Moral (p. 92n. 32). Byron was a great admirer of the Osianic poems.

I tell thee, minstrel, I must weep,
 Or else this heavy heart will burst;
 For it hath been by sorrow nursed,
 And ach'd in sleepless silence long;
 15 And now 'tis doom'd to know the worst,
 And break at once—or yield to song.

SONG OF SAUL BEFORE HIS LAST BATTLE¹

1815 1815

Warriors and chiefs! should the shaft or the sword
 Pierce me in leading the host of the Lord, Heed not the corse, though a king's, in your path:
 Bury your steel in the bosoms of Gath!

5 Thou who art bearing my buckler and
 bow,
 Should the soldiers of Saul look away from the foe,
 Stretch me that moment in blood at thy
 feet!
 Mine be the doom which they dared not to
 meet.

Farewell to others, but never we part, 10 Hie to my royalty, son of my heart!
 Bright is the diadem, boundless the sway, Or kingly the death, which awaits us today!

HEROD'S LAMENT FOR MARIAMNE

1815 1815

Oh, Mariamne! now for thee
 The heart for which thou bled'st is bleeding;
 Revenge is lost in agony,
 And wild remorse to rage succeeding.
 5 Oh, Mariamne! where art thou?
 Thou canst not hear my bitter pleading:
 Ah! could'st thou—thou would'st pardon
 now,
 Though Heaven were to my prayer unheeding.

And is she dead?—and did they dare 10 Obey my frenzy's jealous raving?
 My wrath but doom'd my own despair:
 The sword that smote her's o'er me waving.—
 But thou art cold, my murder'd love!
 And this dark heart is vainly craving 15 For her who soars alone above.
 And leaves my soul unworthy saving.

She's gone, who shared my diadem;
 She sunk, with her my joys entombing;

I swept that flower from Judah's stem, 20 Whose leaves for me alone were blooming;
 And mine's the guilt, and mine the hell,
 This bosom's desolation dooming,
 And I have earn'd those tortures well,
 Which unconsumed are still consuming!

THE DESTRUCTION OF SENNACHERIB!

1815 1816

The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold,
 And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold;
 And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea,
 When the blue wave rolls nightly on deep Galilee.

5 Like the leaves of the forest when summer is green,
 That host with their banners at sunset
 were seen.
 Like the leaves of the forest when autumn hath blown,
 That host on the morrow lay wither'd and strown.

For the Angel of Death spread his wings on the blast, 10 And breathed in the face of the foe as he pass'd;
 And the eyes of the sleepers wax'd deadly and chill,
 And their hearts but once heaved, and forever grew still!

And there lay the steed with his nostril all
 wide,
 But through it there roll'd not the breath of his pride, 15 And the foam of his gasping lay white on the turf,
 And cold as the spray of the rock-beating surf.

And there lay the rider distorted and pale,
 With the dew on his brow, and the rust on his mail.

And the tents were all silent, the banners
 alone,
 20 The lances unlifted, the trumpet unblown.

And the widows of Ashur are loud in their wail,
 And the idols are broke in the temple of Baal;

1 See 2 Kings, 18-19

And the might of the Gentile, unsmitote by
 the sword,
 Hath melted like snow in the glance of the Lord!

STANZAS FOR MUSIC

1815 1816

There's not a joy the world can give like that it takes away, When the glow of early thought declines in feeling's dull decay,
 'Tis not on youth's smooth cheek the blush alone, which fades so fast, But the tender bloom of heart is gone, ere youth itself be past.

5 Then the few whose spirits float above the wreck of happiness
 Are driven o'er the shoals of guilt or ocean of excess
 The magnet of their course is gone, or only points in vain
 The shore to which their shiver'd sail shall never stretch again.

Then the mortal coldness of the soul like death itself comes down, 10 It cannot feel for others' woes, it dare not dream its own,
 That heavy chill has frozen o'er the fountain of our tears,
 And though the eye may sparkle still, 'tis where the ice appears.

Though wit may flash from fluent lips, and mirth distract the breast, Through midnight hours that yield no more their former hope of rest, 15 'Tis but as ivy-leaves around the ruin'd turret wreath,
 All green and wildly fresh without, but worn and gray beneath.

Oh could I feel as I have felt,—or be what I have been,
 Or weep as I could once have wept o'er many a vanish'd scene,
 As springs in deserts found seem sweet,
 And brackish though they be, 20 So, midst the wither'd waste of life, those tears would flow to me

FARE THEE WELL!

1816 1816

"Alas! they had been friends in youth;
 But whispering tongues can poison truth,
 And constancy lives in realms above,
 And life is thorny, and youth is vain,
 And to be wroth with one we love
 Doth work like madness in the brain

1 Addressed to Byron's wife, shortly after their separation.

But never either found another
 To free the hollow heart from paining—
 They stood aloof, the scars remaining,
 Like cliffs which had been rent asunder,
 A dreary sea now flows between,
 But neither heat, nor frost, nor thunder,
 Shall wholly do away, I ween,
 The marks of that which once hath been "
 —COLERIDGE'S Christabel 1

Fare thee well! and if forever, Still forever, fare thee well.
 Even though unforgiving, never
 'Gainst thee shall my heart rebel

5 Would that breast were bared before thee Where thy head so oft hath lain, While that placid sleep came o'er thee Which thou ne'er canst know again

10 Would that breast, by thee glanced over, Every inmost thought could show!
 Then thou wouldst at last discover 'Twas not well to spurn it so

Though the world for this commend thee—
 Though it smile upon the blow, 15 Even its praises must offend thee, Founded on another's woe.

Though my many faults defaced me,
 Could no other arm be found,
 Than the one which once embraced me, 20 To inflict a cureless wound?

Yet, oh yet, thyself deceive not;
 Love may sink by slow decay,
 But by sudden wrench, believe not Hearts can thus be torn away

25 Still thine own life retaineth, Still must mine, though bleeding, beat;
 And the undying thought which paineth
 Is—that we no more may meet

30 These are words of deeper sorrow
 Than the wail above the dead,
 Both shall live, but every morrow Wakes us from a widow'd bed

And when thou wouldst solace gather,
 When our child's first accents flow, 35 Wilt thou teach her to say "Father!"² Though his care she must forego?

When her little hands shall press thee,
 When her lip to thine is press'd, Think of him whose prayer shall bless
 thee,
 40 Think of him thy love had bless'd!

² Lady Byron kept Byron's relationship concealed from their daughter Ada

Should her lineaments resemble Those thou never more may'st see,
 Then thy heart will softly tremble
 With a pulse yet true to me

45 All my faults perchance thou knowest,
 All my madness none can know;
 All my hopes, where'er thou goest, Wither, yet with thee they go

Every feeling hath been shaken; 50 Pride, which not a world could bow, Bows to thee—by thee forsaken,
 Even my soul forsakes me now.

But 'tis done—all words are idle—Words from me are vainer still, 55 But the thoughts we cannot bridle Force then way without the will Fare thee well! thus disunited, Torn from every nearer tie,

 Sear'd in heart, and lone, and blighted, 60 More than this I scarce can die

1816

1816

There be none of Beauty's daughters
 With a magic like thee,
 And like music on the waters
 Is thy sweet voice to me:
 5 When, as if its sound were causing The charmed ocean's pausing,
 The waves lie still and gleaming,
 And the lull'd winds seem dreaming.

And the midnight moon is weaving 10 Her bright chain o'er the deep; Whose breast is gently heaving,
 As an infant's asleep.
 So the spirit bows before thee,
 To listen and adore thee;
 15 With a full but soft emotion,
 Like the swell of Summer's ocean.

SONNET ON CHILLON

1816

1816

Eternal Spirit of the chainless Mind!
 Brightest in dungeons, Liberty! thou art,
 For there thy habitation is the heart—
 The heart which love of thee alone can bind;
 5 And when thy sons to fetters are con-sign'd—
 To fetters, and the damp vault's dayless
 gloom,
 Their country conquers with their martyrdom,

And Freedom's fame finds wings on every
wind.

- Chillon! thy prison is a holy place, 10 And thy sad floor an altar—for 'twas trod, Until his very steps have left a trace Worn, as if thy cold pavement were a sod, By Bonivard! May none those marks
efface!
For they appeal from tyranny to God

THE PRISONER OF CHILLON
1816 1816

- My hair is gray, but not with years,
Nor grew it white
In a single night,
As men's have grown from sudden fears.¹ 5 My limbs are bow'd, though not with toil, But rusted with a vile repose,
For they have been a dungeon's spoil,
And mine has been the fate of those To whom the goodly earth and air 10 Are bann'd, and barr'd—Forbidden fare
But this was for my father's faith
I suffer'd chains and courted death,
That father perish'd at the stake
For tenets he would not forsake.
15 And for the same his lineal race
In darkness found a dwelling-place.
We were seven—who now are one,
Six in youth, and one in age,
Finish'd as they had begun, 20 Proud of Persecution's rage,
One in fire, and two in field,
Their belief with blood have seal'd, Dying as their father died,
For the God their foes denied.
25 Three were in a dungeon cast,
Of whom this wreck is left the last

- There are seven pillars of Gothic mould,
In Chillon's dungeons deep and old,
There are seven columns, mazy and gray.
30 Dim with a dull imprison'd ray.
A sunbeam which hath lost its way,
And through the crevice and the cleft
Of the thick wall is fallen and left,
Creeping o'er the floor so damp, 35 Like a marsh's meteor lamp.
And in each pillar there is a ring,
And in each ring there is a chain.
That iron is a cankering thing,
For in these limbs its teeth remain.
40 With marks that will not wear away, Till I have done with this new day.
Which now is painful to these eyes,
Which have not seen the sun so rise

- For years—I cannot count them o'er, 45 I lost their long and heavy score,
When my last brother droop'd and died,
And I lay living by his side.

- They chain'd us each to a column stone,
And we were three—yet, each alone, 50 We could not move a single pace,
We could not see each other's face,
But with that pale and livid light
That made us strangers in our sight:
And thus together—yet apart, 55 Fetter'd in hand, but join'd in heart,
'Twas still some solace, in the dearth
Of the pure elements of earth,
To hearken to each other's speech,
And each turn comforter to each 60 With some new hope, or legend old,
Or song heroically bold,
But even these at length grew cold.
Our voices took a dreary tone,
An echo of the dungeon stone.
65 A grating sound, not full and free As they of yore were wont to be
It might be fancy, but to me
They never sounded like our own

- I was the eldest of the three, 70 And to uphold and cheer the rest
I ought to do—and did my best;
And each did well in his degree.
The youngest, whom my father loved,
Because our mother's brow was given 75 To him, with eyes as blue as heaven—
For him my soul was sorely moved,
And truly might it be distress'd
To see such bird in such a nest,
For he was beautiful as day 80 (When day was beautiful to me As to young eagles, being free)—
A polar day, which will not see A sunset till its summer's gone,
Its sleepless summer of long light.
85 The snow-clad offspring of the sun
And thus he was as pure and bright,
And in his natural spirit gay,
With tears for nought but others' ill,
And then they flow'd like mountain rills, 90 Unless he could assuage the woe Which he abhorr'd to view below

- The other was as pure of mind,
But form'd to combat with his kind;
Strong in his frame, and of a mood 95 Which 'gainst the world in war had stood,
And perish'd in the foremost rank
With joy—but not in chains to pine:
His spirit wither'd with their clank,
I saw it silently decline—

¹ Byron cites, in a note, the cases of Indevito Storma (1451-1808) and others

100 And so perchance in sooth did mine
But yet I forced it on to cheer
Those relics of a home so dear.
He was a hunter of the hills,
Had follow'd there the deer and wolf;
105 To him his dungeon was a gulf,
And fetter'd feet the worst of ills.

Lake Lemán lies by Chillon's walls
A thousand feet in depth below,
Its massy waters meet and flow;
110 Thus much the fathom-line was sent From Chillon's snowy-white battlement, Which round about the wave intrals
A double dungeon wall and wave
Have made—and like a living grave 115 Below the surface of the lake¹
The dark vault lies wherein we lay,
We heard it ripple night and day;
Sounding o'er our heads it knock'd,
And I have felt the winter's spray 120 Wash through the bars when winds were high
And wanton in the happy sky;
And then the very rock hath rock'd.
And I have felt it shake, unshock'd.
Because I could have smiled to see 125 The death that would have set me free

I said my nearer brother pined,
I said his mighty heart declined,
He loathed and put away his food,
It was not that 'twas coarse and rude, 130 For we were used to hunters' fare,
And for the like had little care:
The milk drawn from the mountain goat
Was changed for water from the moat, Our bread was such as captives' tears 135 Have moisten'd many a thousand years, Since man first pent his fellow men Like brutes within an iron den.
But what were these to us or him?
These wasted not his heart or limb;
140 My brother's soul was of that mould
Which in a palace had grown cold,
Had his free breathing been denied
The range of the steep mountain's side
But why delay the truth?—he died 145 I saw, and could not hold his head, Nor reach his dying hand—nor dead,— Though hard I strove, but strove in vain,
To rend and gnash my bonds in twain.
He died—and they unlock'd his chain, 150 And scoop'd for him a shallow grave
Even from the cold earth of our cave.
I begg'd them, as a boon, to lay His corse in dust whereon the day

¹ The dungeon is not below the surface of the lake

Might shine—it was a foolish thought, 155 But then within my brain it wrought,
That even in death his froeborn breast
In such a dungeon could not rest.
I might have spared my idle prayer—
They coldly laugh'd, and laid him there 160 The flat and turfless earth above
The being we so much did love,
His empty chain above it leant,
Such murder's fitting monument!

But he, the favorite and the flower, 165 Most cherish'd since his natal hour,
His mother's image in fair face,
The infant love of all his race,
His martyr'd father's dearest thought,
My latest care, for whom I sought 170 To hoard my life, that his might be Less wretched now, and one day free,
He, too, who yet had held untired
A spirit natural or inspired—
He, too, was struck, and day by day 175 Was wither'd on the stalk away Oh, God! it is a fearful thing
To see the human soul take wing
In any shape, in any mood.
I've seen it rushing forth in blood, 180 I've seen it on the breaking ocean Strive with a swollen convulsive motion, I've seen the sick and ghastly bed Of Sin delirious with its dread,
But these were horrors—this was woe 185 Unmix'd with such—but sure and slow
He faded, and so calm and meek,
So softly worn, so sweetly weak,
So fearless, yet so tender—kind,
And grieved for those he left behind, 190 With all the while a cheek whose bloom
Was as a mockery of the tomb, Whose tints as gently sunk away
As a departing rainbow's ray;
An eye of most transparent light, 195 That almost made the dungeon bright,
And not a word of murmur, not A groan o'er his untimely lot,— A little talk of better days,
A little hope my own to raise,
200 For I was sunk in silence—lost In this last loss, of all the most;
And then the sighs he would suppress Of fainting nature's feebleness,
More slowly drawn, grew less and less.
205 I listen'd, but I could not hear;
I call'd, for I was wild with fear;
I knew 't was hopeless, but my dread
Would not be thus admonished;
I call'd, and thought I heard a sound—210 I burst my chain with one strong bound,
And rush'd to him:—I found him not,

I only stirr'd in this black spot,
 I only lived, I only drew
 The accursed breath of dungeon-dew;
 215 The last, the sole, the dearest link Between me and the eternal brink,
 Which bound me to my failing race,
 Was broken in this fatal place.
 One on the earth, and one beneath—220 My brothers—both had ceased to breathe—I took that hand which lay so still,
 Alas! my own was full as chill;
 I had not strength to stir, or strive,
 But felt that I was still alive—225 A frantic feeling, when we know That what we love shall ne'er be so.
 I know not why
 I could not die,
 I had no earthly hope—but faith, 230 And that forbade a selfish death.

What next befell me then and there I know not well—I never knew,
 First came the loss of light, and an.
 And then of darkness too 215 I had no thought, no feeling—none, Among the stones I stood a stone,
 And was, scarce conscious what I wist,
 As shrubless crags within the mist;
 For all was blank, and bleak, and gray.
 240 It was not night, it was not day,
 It was not even the dungeon-light,
 So hateful to my heavy sight,
 But vacancy absorbing space,
 And fixedness—without a place;
 245 There were no stars, no earth, no time.
 No check, no change, no good, no crime—
 But silence, and a stirless breath
 Which neither was of life nor death;
 A sea of stagnant idleness, 250 Blind, boundless, mute, and motionless!

A light broke in upon my brain.—
 It was the carol of a bird,
 It ceased, and then it came again.
 The sweetest song ear ever heard, 255 And mine was thankful till my eyes Ran over with the glad surprise,
 And they that moment could not see
 I was the mate of misery;
 But then by dull degrees came back 260 My senses to their wonted track;
 I saw the dungeon walls and floor Close slowly round me as before;
 I saw the glimmer of the sun
 Creeping as it before had done, 265 But through the crevice where it came That bird was perch'd, as fond and tame,
 And tamer than upon the tree;
 A lovely bird, with azure wings,

And song that said a thousand things, 270 And seem'd to say them all for me!
 I never saw its like before,
 I ne'er shall see its likeness more.
 It seem'd like me to want a mate,
 But was not half so desolate, 275 And it was come to love me when None lived to love me so again,
 And cheering from my dungeon's brink,
 Had brought me back to feel and think.
 I know not if it late were free, 280 Or broke its cage to perch on mine,
 But knowing well captivity,
 Sweet bird! I could not wish for thine!
 Or if it were, in winged guise,
 A visitant from Paradise; 285 For—Heaven forgive that thought! the while

Which made me both to weep and smile—
 I sometimes deem'd that it might be My brother's soul come down to me;
 But then at last away it flew.
 290 And then 'twas mortal—well I knew,
 For he would never thus have flown,
 And left me twice so doubly lone,— Lone—as the corpse within its shroud, Lone—as a solitary cloud.
 295 A single cloud on a sunny day, While all the rest of heaven is clear,
 A frown upon the atmosphere,
 That hath no business to appear
 When skies are blue, and earth is gay.

300 A kind of change came in my fate,
 My keepers grew compassionate;
 I know not what had made them so,
 They were mired to sights of woe,
 But so it was—my broken chain 305 With links unfasten'd did remain,
 And it was liberty to stride
 Along my cell from side to side,
 And up and down, and then athwart,
 And tread it over every part;
 310 And round the pillars one by one, Returning where my walk begun.
 Avoiding only, as I trod,
 My brothers' graves without a sod,
 For if I thought with heedless tread 315 My step profaned their lowly bed, My breath came gaspingly and thick,
 And my crush'd heart fell blind and sick.

I made a footing in the wall,
 It was not therefrom to escape, 320 For I had buried one and all Who loved me in a human shape;
 And the whole earth would henceforth be A wider prison unto me:
 No child, no sire, no kin had I,

325 No partner in my misery;
 I thought of this, and I was glad,
 For thought of them had made me mad;
 But I was curious to ascend
 To my barr'd windows, and to bend 330 Once more, upon the mountains high,
 The quiet of a loving eye.

I saw them—and they were the same,
 They were not changed like me in frame;
 I saw their thousand years of snow 335 On high—their wide long lake below,
 And the blue Rhone in fullest flow;
 I heard the torrents leap and gush O'er channell'd rock and broken bush;
 I saw the white-wall'd distant town,¹ 340 And whiter sails go skimming down:
 And then there was a little isle,
 Which in my very face did smile,
 The only one in view;
 A small green isle, it seem'd no more, 345 Scarce broader than my dungeon floor,
 But in it there were three tall trees,
 And o'er it blew the mountain breeze.
 And by it there were waters flowing,
 And on it there were young flowers growing,
 350 Of gentle breath and hue
 The fish swam by the castle wall,
 And they seem'd joyous each and all.
 The eagle rode the rising blast, Methought he never flew so fast 355 As then to me he seem'd to fly;
 And then new tears came in my eye.
 And I felt troubled—and would fain
 I had not left my recent chain;
 And when I did descend again, 360 The darkness of my dim abode Fell on me as a heavy load:
 It was as in a new-dug grave, Closing o'er one we sought to save,—
 And yet my glance, too much oppress'd, 365 Had almost need of such a rest.

It might be months, or years, or days—
 I kept no count, I took no note,
 I had no hope my eyes to raise,
 And clear them of their dreary mote; 370 At last men came to set me free;
 I ask'd not why, and reck'd not where.
 It was at length the same to me, Fetter'd or fetterless to be,
 I learn'd to love despair.
 375 And thus when they appear'd at last,
 And all my bonds aside were cast, These heavy walls to me had grown
 A hermitage—and all my own!
 And half I felt as they were come

¹ Villeneuve

380 To tear me from a second home:
 With spiders I had friendship made,
 And watch'd them in their sullen trade,
 Had seen the mice by moonlight play,
 And why should I feel less than they?
 385 We were all inmates of one place,
 And I, the monarch of each race,
 Had power to kill—yet, strange to tell!
 In quiet we had learn'd to dwell;
 My very chains and I grew friends, 390 So much a long communion tends To make us what we are:—even I Regain'd my freedom with a sigh.

1816

Though the day of my destiny's over,
 And the star of my fate hath declined.
 Thy soft heart refused to discover The faults which so many could find;¹ 5 Though thy soul with my grief was acquainted,
 It shrunk not to share it with me,
 And the love which my spirit hath panted
 It never hath found but in thee.
 Then when nature around me is smiling, 10 The last smile which answers to mine,
 I do not believe it beguiling,
 Because it reminds me of thine;
 And when winds are at war with the ocean,
 As the breasts I believed in with me.
 15 If their billows excite an emotion,
 It is that they bear me from thee.

Though the rock of my last hope is shiver'd,
 And its fragments are sunk in the wave,
 Though I feel that my soul is deliver'd 20 To pain—it shall not be its slave.
 There is many a pang to pursue me They may crush, but they shall not contemn;
 They may torture, but shall not subdue
 me;
 'Tis of thee that I think—not of them.

25 Though human, thou didst not deceive
 me,
 Though woman, thou didst not forsake.
 Though loved, thou forborest to grieve
 me,
 Though slander'd, thou never couldst
 shake;
 Though trusted, thou didst not disclaim
 me,

¹ Throughout all his domestic troubles, Byron was loyally supported by his sister Augusta. See Child Harold's Pilgrimage, III, 63-65 (p. 531)

30 Though parted, it was not to fly, Though watchful, 'twas not to defame
me,
Nor, mute, that the world might belie

Yet I blame not the world, nor despise it, Nor the war of the many with one, 35 If my soul was not fitted to prize it,
'Twas folly not sooner to shun:
And if dearly that error hath cost me,
And more than I once could foresee,
I have found that, whatever it lost me, 40 It could not deprive me of thee.

From the wreck of the past, which hath perish'd,
Thus much I at least may recall, It hath taught me that what I most cherish'd Deserved to be dearest of all.
45 In the desert a fountain is springing,
In the wide waste there still is a tree,
And a bird in the solitude singing,
Which speaks to my spirit of thee

My sister! my sweet sister! if a name Dearer and purer were, it should be
thine,
Mountains and seas divide us, but I claim No tears, but tenderness to answer
mine:
5 Go where I will, to me thou art the
same—
A loved regret which I would not resign
There yet are two things in my destiny,—
A world to roam through, and a home with thee.

The first were nothing—had I still the
last,
10 It were the haven of my happiness;
But other claims and other ties thou hast,
And mine is not the wish to make them
less
A strange doom is thy father's son's, and past
Recalling, as it lies beyond redress, 15 Reversed for him our grandsire's fate
of yore,—
He had no rest at sea,¹ nor I on shore.

¹ Admiral John Byron (1723-86), who was said to have encountered a storm on every voyage. He was known to the sailors as "Foulweather Jack."

If my inheritance of storms hath been In other elements, and on the rocks
Of perils, overlook'd or unforeseen.
20 I have sustain'd my share of worldly shocks,
The fault was mine, nor do I seek to screen
My errors with defensive paradox,
I have been cunning in mine overthrow,
The careful pilot of my proper¹ woe

25 Mine were my faults, and mine be their reward
My whole life was a contest, since the
day
That gave me being, gave me that which marr'd
The gift,—a fate, or will, that walk'd astray;
And I at times have found the struggle hard, 30 And thought of shaking off my bonds of clay.
But now I fain would for a time survive,
If but to see what next can well arrive.

Kingdoms and empires in my little day
I have outlived, and yet I am not old.
35 And when I look on this, the petty spray
Of my own years of trouble, which have
roll'd
Like a wild bay of breakers, melts
away.
Something—I know not what—does still uphold
A spirit of slight patience,—not in vain.
40 Even for its own sake, do we purchase
pain.

Perhaps the workings of defiance stir Within me,—or perhaps a cold despair, Brought on when ills habitually recur,— 45 Perhaps a kinder clime, or purer air (For even to this may change of soul refer,
And with light armor we may learn to bear),
Have taught me a strange quiet, which was not
The chief companion of a calmer lot

50 I feel almost at times as I have felt In happy childhood; trees, and flowers, and brooks,

¹ own

- Which do remember me of where I dwell
 Ere my young mind was sacrificed to books, Come as of yore upon me, and can melt
 My heart with recognition of their looks; 55 And even at moments I could think I see Some living thing to love—but none like thee.
- Here are the Alpine landscapes which create A fund for contemplation;—to admire
 Is a brief feeling of a trivial date; 60 But something worthier do such scenes inspire:
 Here to be lonely is not desolate,
 For much I view which I could most desire,
 And, above all, a lake I can behold¹ Lovelier, not dearer, than our own of old.²
- 65 Oh that thou wert but with me!—but I grow
 The fool of my own wishes, and forget
 The solitude, which I have vaunted so,
 Has lost its praise in this but one regret;
 There may be others which I less may show,— 70 I am not of the plaintive mood, and yet I feel an ebb in my philosophy,
 And the tide rising in my alter'd eye.
- I did remind thee of our own dear lake,
 By the old hall which may be mine no more 75 Leman's is fair; but think not I forsake
 The sweet remembrance of a dearer shore: 110 Sad havoc Time must with my memory make, Ere that or thou can fade these eyes before; Though, like all things which I have loved, they are 80 Resign'd forever, or divided far.
- The world is all before me, I but ask Of Nature that with which she will comply—
 It is but in her summer's sun to bask,
 To mingle with the quiet of her sky,
- To see her gentle face without a mask,
 And never gaze on it with apathy.
 She was my early friend, and now shall be My sister—till I look again on thee.
- I can reduce all feelings but this one;
 And that I would not;—for at length I see Such scenes as those wherein my life begun,
 The earliest—even the only paths for me;
 Had I but sooner learnt the crowd to shun, I had been better than I now can be;
 95 The passions which have torn me would have slept;
 I had not suffer'd, and thou hadst not wept.
- With false Ambition what had I to do?
 LITTLE with Love, and least of all with Fame;
 And yet they came unsought, and with me grew,
 And made me all which they can make—a name.
 Yet this was not the end I did pursue;
 Surely I once beheld a nobler aim.
 But all is over—I am one the more To baffled millions which have gone before.
- And for the future, this world's future may From me demand but little of my care.
 I have outlived myself by many a day, Having survived so many things that were;
 My years have been no slumber, but the prey 110 Of ceaseless vigils; for I had the share Of life which might have fill'd a century, Before its fourth in time had pass'd me by.
- And for the remnant which may be to come I am content; and for the past I feel Not thankless,—for within the crowded sum Of struggles, happiness at times would steal;
 And for the present, I would not be numb
 My feelings further—Nor shall I conceal

¹Lake Leman (Geneva).²The lake of Newstead Abbey. For a description of it, see Don Juan, XIII 37

That with all this I still can look
around,
120 And worship Nature with a thought profound.

For thee, my own sweet sister, in thy heart

I know myself secure, as thou in mine,
We were and are—I am, even as thou art—

Beings who ne'er each other can resign;

125 It is the same, together or apart,
From life's commencement to its slow decline

We are entwined—let death come slow or fast,

The tie which bound the first endures the last!

DARKNESS

1816 1816

I had a dream, which was not all a dream
The bright sun was extinguish'd, and the stars

Did wander darkling in the eternal space, Rayless, and pathless, and the icy earth

5 Swung him¹ and blackening in the moonless air,

Morn came and went—and came, and brought no day,

And men forgot their passions in the dread

Of this their desolation, and all hearts Were chill'd into a selfish prayer for light.

10 And they did live by watchfires—and the thrones,

The palaces of crowned kings—the huts,
The habitations of all things which dwell,
Were burnt for beacons; cities were consumed,

And men were gather'd round their blazing homes

15 To look once more into each other's face.
Happy were those who dwelt within the eye

Of the volcanoes, and their mountain-torch
A fearful hope was all the world contain'd;

Forests were set on fire—but hour by hour

200 They fell and faded—and the crackling trunks

Extinguish'd with a crash—and all was black.

The brows of men by the despairing light Wore an unearthly aspect, as by fits
The flashes fell upon them; some lay down

25 And hid their eyes and wept, and some did rest

Their chins upon their clenched hands, and smiled;

And others hurried to and fro, and fed
Their funeral piles with fuel, and look'd up

With mad disquietude on the dull sky.

30 The pall of a past world, and then again With curses cast them down upon the dust,

And gnash'd their teeth and howl'd: the wild birds shriek'd

And, terrified, did flutter on the ground,
And flap their useless wings, the wildest brutes

35 Came tame and tremulous; and vipers crawl'd

And twined themselves among the multitude,

Hissing, but stingless—they were slain for food!

And War, which for a moment was no more,

Did glut himself again—a meal was bought

40 With blood, and each sate sullenly apart Gorging himself in gloom no love was left;

All earth was but one thought—and that was death

Immediate and inglorious; and the pang
Of famine fed upon all entrails—men

45 Died, and their bones were tombless as their flesh;

The meagre by the meagre were devour'd,
Even dogs assail'd their masters, all save one,

And he was faithful to a corse, and kept

The birds and beasts and famish'd men at bay,

50 Till hunger clung them,¹ or the dropping dead

Lured their lank jaws, himself sought out no food,

But with a piteous and perpetual moan,
And a quick desolate cry, licking the hand
Which answer'd not with a caress—he died.

55 The crowd was famish'd by degrees; but two

Of an enormous city did survive,
And they were enemies: they met beside The dying embers of an altar-place, Where had been heap'd a mass of holy things

60 For an unholy usage; they raked up, ¹ dried them up (See Macbeth, V. 5. 40)

And shivering scraped with their cold skeleton hands
 The feeble ashes, and their feeble breath Blew for a little life, and made a flame
 Which was a mockery; then they lifted up 65 Their eyes as it grew lighter, and beheld Each other's aspects—saw, and shriek'd,
 and died—
 Even of their mutual hideousness they
 died,
 Unknowning who he was upon whose brow Famine had written Fiend. The world was void, 70 The populous and the powerful was a lump Seasonless, herbless, treeless, manless, lifeless—
 A lump of death—a chaos of hard clay.
 The rivers, lakes, and ocean all stood still,
 And nothing stirr'd within their silent depths;
 75 Ships sailorless lay rotting on the sea,
 And their masts fell down piecemeal, as they dropp'd
 They slept on the abyss without a surge—The waves were dead; the tides were in their grave,
 The Moon, their mistress, had expired before;
 80 The winds were wither'd in the stagnant
 air,
 And the clouds perish'd; Darkness had no need Of aid from them—She was the Universe

PROMETHEUS
 1816 1816

Titan! to whose immortal eyes
 The sufferings of mortality, Seen in their sad reality,
 Were not as things that gods despise;
 5 What was thy pity's recompense?
 A silent suffering, and intense,
 The rock, the vulture, and the chain,
 All that the proud can feel of pain,
 The agony they do not show, 10 The suffocating sense of woe,
 Which speaks but in its loneliness,
 And then is jealous lest the sky
 Should have a listener, nor will sigh Until its voice is echoless.
 15 Titan! to thee the strife was given Between the suffering and the will,
 Which torture where they cannot kill,
 And the inexorable Heaven,
 And the deaf tyranny of Fate, 20 The ruling principle of Fate, Which for its pleasure doth create

The things it may annihilate, Refused thee even the boon to die:
 The wretched gift eternity
 25 Was thine—and thou hast borne it well.¹
 All that the Thunderer² wrung from thee Was but the menace which flung back On him the torments of thy rack;
 The fate thou didst so well foresee, 30 But would not to appease him tell;³
 And in thy silence was his sentence,
 And in his soul a vain repentance,
 And evil dread so ill dissembled,
 That in his hand the lightnings trembled.
 35 Thy Godlike crime was to be kind,
 To render with thy precepts less
 The sum of human wretchedness,
 And strengthen man with his own mind:
 But baffled as thou wert from high, 40 Still in thy patient energy,
 In the endurance, and repulse Of thine impenetrable spirit, Which Earth and Heaven could not convulse,
 A mighty lesson we inherit:
 45 Thou art a symbol and a sign
 To mortals of their fate and force, Like thee, man is in part divine,
 A troubled stream from a pure source,
 And man in portions can foresee 50 His own funeral destiny;
 His wretchedness, and his resistance,
 And his sad unallied existence.
 To which his spirit may oppose Itself—and equal to all woes, 55 And a firm will, and a deep sense,
 Which even in torture can descry
 Its own concentr'd recompense, Triumphant where it dares defy,
 And making death a victory

SONNET TO LAKE LEMAN
 1816 1816

Rousseau, Voltaire, our Gibbon, and De Stael—Lemans' these names are worthy of thy
 shore,
 Thy shore of names likes these!—Wert thou no more
 Their memory thy remembrance would recall:
 5 To them thy banks were lovely as to all,
 But they have made them lovelier, for the lore
 Of mighty minds doth hallow in the core

Tithonus.

 would be overthrown. See Shelley's Prometheus Unbound, I, 371-74 (p. 667).

Of human hearts the ruin of a wall Where dwelt the wise and wondrous; but by thee
10 How much more, Lake of Beauty! do we feel,
In sweetly gliding o'er thy crystal sea,
The wild glow of that not ungentle zeal,
Which of the heirs of immortality Is proud, and makes the breath of glory real!

They say that Hope is happiness,
But genuine Love must prize the past,
And Memory wakes the thoughts that bless.
They rose the first—they set the last.
5 And all that Memory loves the most Was once our only Hope to be,
And all that Hope adored and lost Hath melted into Memory.
Alas! it is delusion all.

CANTO III

1816

1816

1 Is thy face like thy mother's, my fair
child!
Ada! sole daughter of my house and
heart!
When last I saw thy young blue eyes they smiled,
And then we parted,—not as now we
part,
But with a hope —¹
Awaking with a start.
The waters heave around me, and on
high
The winds lift up their voices I depart.
Whither I know not, but the hour's gone by,
When Albion's lessening shores could grieve or glad mine eye.
2 Once more upon the waters! yet once
more!
And the waves bound beneath me as a steed

That knows his rider. Welcome to their roar!
Swift be their guidance, wheresoe'er it lead!
Though the strain'd mast should quiver as a reed,
And the rent canvas fluttering strew the
gale,
Still must I on, for I am as a weed, Flung from the rock, on Ocean's foam to sail Where'er the surge may sweep, the tempest's breath prevail

3 In my youth's summer I did sing of one,¹
The wandering outlaw of his own dark
mind,
Again I seize the theme, then but begun,
And bear it with me, as the rushing
wind
Bears the cloud onwards: in that tale I find
The furrows of long thought, and dried-up tears,
Which, ebbing, leave a sterile track behind,
O'er which all heavily the journeying
years
Plod the last sands of life,—where not a flower appears

4 Since my young days of passion—joy, or pain, Perchance my heart and harp have lost a string,
And both may jar: it may be, that in
vain
I would essay as I have sung to sing Yet, though a dreary strain, to this I cling,
So that it wean me from the weary dream
Of selfish grief or gladness—so it fling Forgetfulness around me—it shall seem
To me, though to none else, a not ungrateful theme.

5 He, who grown aged in this world of
woe,
In deeds, not years, piercing the depths
of life,
So that no wonder waits him; nor below
Can love or sorrow, fame, ambition,
strife,

¹ Lady Byron left her husband in January, 1816 Ada was then only five weeks old Byron never saw her again

was written in 1809, when Byron was 21 years of age

- Cut to his heart again with the keen
Of silent, sharp endurance: he can tell Why thought seeks refuge in lone caves, yet rife
With airy images, and shapes which dwell Still unimpaired, though old, in the soul's haunted cell.
- 6 'Tis to create, and in creating live
A being more intense that we endow With form our fancy, gaining as we give
The life we image, even as I do now What am I? Nothing but not so art
thou,
Soul of my thought! with whom I traverse earth,
Invisible, but gazing, as I glow Mix'd with thy spirit, blended with thy
birth,
And feeling still with thee in my crush'd feelings' dearth.
- 7 Yet must I think less wildly.—I have
thought Too long and darkly, till my brain
became,
In its own eddy boiling and o'er-
wrought,
A whirling gulf of phantasy and flame And thus, untaught in youth my heart to tame,
My springs of life were poison'd. 'Tis too late!
Yet am I changed; though still enough
the same
In strength to bear what time cannot abate,
And feed on bitter fruits without accusing Fate.
- 8 Something too much of this:¹—but now
'tis past,
And the spell closes with its silent seal.²
Long absent Harold reappears at last;
He of the breast which fain no more would feel,
Wrung with the wounds which kill not,
but ne'er heal;
Yet Time, who changes all, had alter'd him
In soul and aspect as in age: years steal
- Fire from the mind as vigor from the limb;
And life's enchanted cup but sparkles near the brim.
- 9 His had been quaff'd too quickly, and he found
The dregs were wormwood; but he fill'd again,
And from a purer fount, on holier
ground,
And deem'd its spring perpetual, but
in vain!
Still round him clung invisible a chain Which gall'd forever, fettering though
unseen,
And heavy though it clank'd not; worn with pain,
Which pined although it spoke not, and grew keen,
Entering with every step he took through many a scene.
- 10 Seem in guarded coldness, he had mix'd Again in fancied safety with his kind,
And deem'd his spirit now so firmly fix'd
And sheath'd with an invulnerable mind,
That, if no joy, no sorrow lurk'd behind;
And he, as one, might 'midst the many
stand Unheeded, searching through the crowd to find
Fit speculation; such as in strange land He found in wonder-works of God and Nature's hand.
- 11 But who can view the ripen'd rose, nor¹
seek
To wear it? who can curiously behold
The smoothness and the sheen of beauty's cheek,
Nor feel the heart can never all grow
old?
Who can contemplate Fame through clouds unfold
The star which rises o'er her steep, nor climb?
Harold, once more within the vortex,
roll'd
On with the giddy circle, chasing Time, Yet with a nobler aim than in his youth's fond² prime.
- 12 But soon he knew himself the most unfit Of men to herd with man; with whom he held Little in common; untaught to submit

¹ See Hamlet, III, 2, 79² On the story of his own tragedy is set the seal of silence¹ and not² foolish

- His thoughts to others, though his soul was quell'd
In youth by his own thoughts; still uncompell'd,
He would not yield dominion of his
mind
To spirits against whom his own rebell'd;
Proud though in desolation; which could find
A life within itself, to breathe without mankind
- 13 Where rose the mountains, there to him were friends,
Where roll'd the ocean, thereon was his
home,
Where a blue sky, and glowing elms, extends,
He had the passion and the power to roam;
The desert, forest, cavern, breaker's
foam,
Were unto him companionship, they spoke
A mutual language, clearer than the tone
Of his land's tongue, which he would oft forsake
For Nature's pages glass'd by sunbeams on the lake.
- 14 Like the Chaldean, he could watch the stars,¹ Till he had peopled them with beings
bright
As their own beams, and earth, and earth-born jars,
And human frailties, were forgotten quite Could he have kept his spirit to that flight
He had been happy; but this clay will sink
Its spark immortal, envying it the light To which it mounts, as if to break the link
That keeps us from yon heaven which woos us to its brink.
- 15 But in man's dwellings he became a thing Restless and worn, and stern and wear-some,
Droop'd as a wild-born falcon with clipt wing,
To whom the boundless air alone were
home.
- Then came his fit again,¹ which to o'er-
come,
As eagerly the barr'd-up bird will beat His breast and beak against his wiry dome Till the blood tinge his plumage, so the heat
Of his impeded soul would through his bosom eat.
- 16 Self-exiled Harold wanders forth again, With nought of hope left, but with less of gloom,
The very knowledge that he lived in
vain,
That all was over on this side the tomb Had made Despair a smilingness assume,
Which, though 'twere wild,—as on the plunder'd wreck
When mariners would madly meet their doom
With draughts intemperate on the sinking deck.—
Did yet inspire a cheer, which he forbore to check
- 17 Stop!—for thy tread is on an empire's
dust!
An earthquake's spoil is sepulchred below!
Is the spot mark'd with no colossal bust?
Nor column trophied for triumphal
show?
None, but the moral's truth tells simpler so,
As the ground was before, thus let it
be;— How that red rain hath made the harvest grow!
And is this all the world has gain'd by
thee,
Thou first and last of fields' king-making Victory?²
- 18 And Harold stands upon this place of skulls,
The grave of France, the deadly Waterloo!
How in an hour the power which gave annals
Its gifts, transferring fame as fleeting
too!
In "pride of place"³ here last the eagle
flew.

² The Battle of Waterloo made the thrones of the European kings more secure.

³ The Chaldeans were especially versed in astrology.

Macbeth, II, 4, 12. This is a term in falconry, and means the highest point of flight.

Then tore with bloody talon the rent
plain,
Pierced by the shaft of banded nations
through;
Ambition's life and labors all were
vain;
He wears the shatter'd links of the world's broken chain.

19 Fit retribution! Gaul may champ the bit And foam in fetters;—but is Earth more free?
Did nations combat to make one submit;
Or league to teach all kings true sovereignty?
What! shall reviving Thraldom again be The patch'd-up idol of enlighten'd days?¹
Shall we, who struck the Lion² down, shall we Pay the Wolf³ homage? proffering lowly gaze
And servile knees to thrones? No; prove before ye praise!

20 If not, o'er one fallen despot boast no
more!
In vain fair cheeks were furrow'd with hot tears
For Europe's flowers long rooted up
before
The trampler of her vineyards; in vain,
years
Of death, depopulation, bondage, fears, Have all been borne, and broken by the accord
Of roused-up millions; all that most endears
Glory, is when the myrtle wreathes a sword
Such as Harmodius drew on Athens' tyrant lord.

21 There was a sound of revelry by night,⁴ And Belgium's capital had gather'd
then
Her Beauty and her Chivalry, and
bright
The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men;

³ Such a poor imitation of imperial strength as the Austrian emperor and others

⁴ A ball was given at Brussels on the evening before the battle of Quatre-Bras, which occurred two days before the battle of Waterloo

A thousand hearts beat happily; and when Music arose with its voluptuous swell, Soft eyes look'd love to eyes which spake again,
And all went merry as a marriage bell.
But hush! hark! a deep sound strikes like a rising knell!

22 Did ye not hear it?—No; 'twas but the
wind,
(O! the car rattling o'er the stony street; (O! with the dance! let joy be unconfined;
No sleep till morn, when Youth and Pleasure meet
To chase the glowing Hours with flying
feet—
But hark!—that heavy sound breaks in once more,
As if the clouds its echo would repeat;
And nearer, clearer, deadlier than before!
Arm! Arm! it is—it is—the cannon's opening roar!

23 Within a window'd niche of that high hall Sate Brunswick's fated chieftain,¹ he did hear
That sound the first amidst the festival,
And caught its tone with Death's prophetic ear;
And when they smiled because he deem'd it near,
His heart more truly knew that peal too
well
Which stretch'd his father on a bloody
bier,
And roused the vengeance blood alone could quell;
He rush'd into the field, and, foremost fighting, fell

24 Ah! then and there was hurrying to and fro,
And gathering tears, and tremblings of distress,
And cheeks all pale, which but an hour ago Blush'd at the praise of their own loveliness,
And there were sudden partings, such as press
The life from out young hearts, and choking sighs

¹ Frederick William, Duke of Brunswick. His father was killed in the Battle of Auerstadt, in 1806

Which ne'er might be repeated; who could guess
 If ever more should meet those mutual
 eyes,
 Since upon night so sweet such awful morn could rise!

25 And there was mounting in hot haste the steed,
 The mustering squadron, and the clat-tering car,
 Went pouring forward with impetuous speed,
 And swiftly forming in the ranks of
 war;
 And the deep thunder peal on peal
 afar;
 And near, the beat of the alarming drum Roused up the soldier ere the morning
 star, While throng'd the citizens with terror dumb, Or whispering, with white lips—"The foe! they come! they come!"

26 And wild and high the *Cameron's Gathering*¹ rose!
 The war-note of Lochiel, which Albyn's
 hills
 Have heard, and heard, too, have her Saxon foes —²
 How in the noon of night that pibroch³
 thrills,
 Savage and shrill! But with the breath which fills
 Their mountain-pipe, so fill the mountaineers
 With the fierce native daring which instils
 The stirring memory of a thousand
 years,
 And Evan's, Donald's fame rings in each clansman's ears!

27 And Aidenues waves above them her green leaves,
 Dewy with Nature's tear-drops, as they
 pass,
 Grieving, if aught inanimate e'er grieves,
 Over the unreturning brave,—alas!
 Ere evening to be trodden like the grass Which now beneath them, but above shall grow

In its next verdure, when this fiery mass
 Of living valor, rolling on the foe
 And burning with high hope shall moulder cold and low

28 Last noon beheld them full of lusty
 life,
 Last eve in Beauty's circle proudly gay,
 The midnight brought the signal-sound of strife,
 The morn the marshalling in arms,—
 the day
 Battle's magnificently stern array!
 The thunder-clouds close o'er it, which when rent
 The earth is cover'd thick with other
 clay,
 Which her own clay shall cover, heap'd and pent,
 Rider and horse,—friend, foe,—in one red burial blent!

29 Their praise is hymn'd by loftier harps than mine —¹
 Yet one I would select from that proud throng,² Partly because they blend me with his
 line,
 And partly that I did his sue some
 wrong,
 And partly that bright names will hallow song,
 And this was of the bravest, and when shower'd
 The death-bolts deadliest the thunn'd files along,
 Even where the thickest of war's tempest lower'd,
 They reach'd no nobler breast than thine, young gallant Howard!

30 There have been tears and breaking hearts for thee,
 And mine were nothing, had I such to
 give;
 But when I stood beneath the fresh green tree,
 Which living waves where thou didst cease to live,
 And saw around me the wide field revive

- With fruits and fertile promise, and 34 the Spring Came forth her work of gladness to contrive.
With all her reckless birds upon the
wing.
I turn'd from all she brought to those she could not bring.
- 31 I turn'd to thee, to thousands, of whom each
And one as all a ghastly gap did make In his own kind and kindred, whom to teach Forgetfulness were mercy for their
sake.
The Archangel's trump, not Glory's, must awake
Those whom they thirst for; though the sound of Fame
May for a moment soothe, it cannot slake
The fever of vain longing, and the name
So honor'd but assumes a stronger, bitterer
claim
- 32 They mourn, but smile at length and smiling, mourn
The tree will wither long before it fall.
The hull drives on, though mast and sail be torn.
The roof-tree sinks, but moulders on the hall
In massy hoariness; the ruin'd wall Stands when its wind-worn battlements
are gone;
The bars survive the captive they enthral.
The day drags through, though storms keep out the sun,
And thus the heart will break, yet brokenly live on
- 33 Even as a broken mirror, which the glass
In every fragment multiplies, and makes
A thousand images of one that was,
The same, and still the more, the more it breaks;
And thus the heart will do which not forsakes,
Living in shatter'd guise; and still, and cold,
And bloodless, with its sleepless sorrow aches,
Yet withers on till all without is old, Showing no visible sign, for such things are untold
- There is a very life in our despair, Vitality of poison,—a quick root Which feeds these deadly branches; for it were
As nothing did we die, but Life will suit
Itself to Sorrow's most detested fruit, Like to the apples on the Dead Sea's
shore,
All ashes to the taste.¹ Did man compute Existence by enjoyment, and count o'er Such hours 'gainst years of life,—say, would he name threescore?
- 35 The Psalmist number'd out the years of man:²
They are enough; and if thy tale be
true,
Thou, who didst grudge him even that fleeting span,
More than enough,³ thou fatal Waterloo!
Millions of tongues record thee, and anew
Their children's lips shall echo them,
and say—“Here, where the sword united nations
drew,
Our countrymen were warring on that
day!”
And this is much, and all which will not pass away.
- 36 There sunk the greatest, nor the worst
of men,
Whose spirit, antithetically mixt,
One moment of the mightiest, and again
On little objects with like firmness fixt; Extreme in all things! hadst thou been betwixt,
Thy throne had still been thine, or never been;
For daring made thy rise as fall: thou seek'st
Even now to re-assume the imperial
mien,
And shake again the world, the Thunderer of the scene!
- 37 Conqueror and captive of the earth art
thou!
She trembles at thee still, and thy wild
name
- ¹ “The (fabled) apples on the brink of the lake Asphaltus were said to be fair without, and within, ashes—Vide Tacitus, Histor. 5, 7.”— Byron
- ² See Psalms, 90 10.
- ³ If Waterloo really means what it seems to mean to mankind, the fleeting span of three score years and ten allowed by the Psalmist is more than enough to immortalize human achievement.

- Was ne'er more bruited¹ in men's minds than now
That thou art nothing, save the jest of Fame,
Who woo'd thee once, thy vassal, and became
The flatterer of thy fierceness, till thou wert
A god unto thyself! nor less the same To the astounded kingdoms all merit, Who deem'd thee for a time whate'er thou didst assert
- 38 Oh, more or less than man—in high or
low,
Batting with nations, flying from the field;
Now making monarchs' necks thy foot-stool, now
More than thy meanest soldier taught to yield.
An empire thou couldst crush, command, rebuild,
But govern not thy pettiest passion, nor,
However deeply in men's spirits skill'd, Look through thine own, nor curb the lust of wai,
Nor learn that tempted Fate will leave the loftiest star
- 39 Yet well thy soul hath brook'd the turning tide
With that untaught innate philosophy, Which, be it wisdom, coldness, or deep
pride,
Is gall and wormwood to an enemy
When the whole host of hatred stood hard by,
To watch and mock thee shrinking, thou hast smiled
With a sedate and all-enduring eye,— When Fortune fled her spoil'd and favorite child.
He stood unbow'd beneath the ills upon him piled
- 40 Sager than in thy fortunes, for in them Ambition steel'd thee on too far to
show
That just habitual scorn, which could contemn
Men and their thoughts; 'twas wise to feel, not so
To wear it ever on thy lip and brow.
And spurn the instruments thou wert to use²
- Till they were turn'd unto thine overthrow:
'Tis but a worthless world to win or lose;
So hath it proved to thee, and all such lot who choose.
- 41 If, like a tower upon a headland rock, Thou hadst been made to stand or fall
alone.
Such scorn of man had help'd to brave the shock,
But men's thoughts were the steps which paved thy throne.
Their admiration thy best weapon
shone;
The part of Philip's son¹ was thine not then (Unless aside thy purple had been thrown)
Like stern Diogenes to mock at men, For sceptred cynics earth were far too wide a den
- 42 But quiet to quick bosoms is a hell.
And there hath been thy bane, there is a fire
And motion of the soul which will not dwell
In its own narrow being, but aspires Beyond the fitting medium of desire,
And, but once kindled, quenchless ever-
more,
Preys upon high adventure, nor can tire
Of aught but rest; a fever at the core.
Fatal to him who bears, to all who ever
bore
- 43 This makes the madmen who have made men mad
By their contagion, conquerors and
kings,
Founders of sects and systems, to whom add Sophists, bards, statesmen, all unquiet
things
Which stir too strongly the soul's secret
springs,
And are themselves the fools to those they fool,
Envied, yet how unenviable! what
stings
Are theirs! One breast laid open were a school
Which would unteach mankind the lust to shine or rule.

¹ noticed abroad² See Macbeth, II. 1, 48.¹ Alexander, who should have been his model instead of the cynic Diogenes

- 44 Their breath is agitation, and their life A storm whereon they ride, to sink at
last,
And yet so nursed and bigoted to strife,
That should their days, surviving peril
past, Melt to calm twilight, they feel overcast
With sorrow and supineness, and so
die;
Even as a flame unfed, which runs to waste
With its own flickering, or a sword laid
by,
Which eats into itself, and rusts ingloriously
- 45 He who ascends to mountain-tops, shall
find
The loftiest peaks most wrapt in clouds and snow,
He who surpasses or subdues mankind, Must look down on the hate of those
below
Though high above the sun of glory
glow,
And far beneath the earth and ocean
spread,
Round him are icy rocks, and loudly
blow
Contending tempests on his naked head.
And thus reward the toils which to those summits led
- 46 Away with these! true Wisdom's world will be Within its own creation, or in thine.
Maternal Nature! for who seems like
thee,
Thus on the banks of thy majestic
Rhine?
There Harold gazes on a work divine, A blending of all beauties, streams and dells,
Fruit, foliage, crag, wood, cornfield, 50 mountain, vine,
And chiefless castles breathing stern farewells
From gray but leafy walls, where Rime greenly dwells
- 47 And there they stand, as stands a lofty
mind,
Worn, but unstooping to the baser
crowd,
All tenantless, save to the crannying
wind,
Or holding dark communion with the
cloud.
- There was a day when they were young and proud,
Banners on high, and battles' pass'd
below;
But they who fought are in a bloody
shroud,
And those which waved are shredless dust ere now,
And the bleak battlements shall bear no future blow.
- 48 Beneath these battlements, within those
walls,
Power dwelt amidst her passions, in proud state
Each robber chief upheld his armed
halls,
Doing his evil will, nor less elate Than mightier heroes of a longer date What want these outlaws conquerors should have?
But history's purchased page to call them great?
A wider space, an ornamented grave*
Their hopes were not less warm, then souls were full as brave.
- 49 In their baronial feuds and single fields, What deeds of prowess unrecorded
died!
And Love, which lent a blazon to their shields,
With emblems well devised by amorous
pride,
Through all the mail of iron hearts would glide.
But still their flame was fierceness, and drew on Keen contest and destruction near allied,
And many a tower for some fair mischief won,
Saw the discolor'd Rhine beneath its ruin run.
- But thou, exulting and abounding river!
Making thy waves a blessing as they flow Through banks whose beauty would endure forever
Could man but leave thy bright creation so,
Nor its fair promise from the surface mow
With the sharp scythe of conflict,— then to see

* In Ramsay's version of the ballad Johnie Armstrong, the King asks Johnie.—
"What wants that knave that a king sould half But the sword of honor and the crown?"

- Thy valley of sweet waters, were to know Earth paved like heaven; and to seem such to me,
 Even now what wants thy stream?—that it should Lethe be
- 51 A thousand battles have assail'd thy
 banks,
 But these and half their fame have pass'd away,
 And Slaughter heap'd on high his wel-tering ranks;
 Their very graves are gone, and what are they?
 Thy tide wash'd down the blood of yesterday,
 And all was stainless, and on thy clear
 stream Glass'd, with its dancing light, the sunny ray,
 But o'er the blacken'd memory's blighting dream
 Thy waves would vainly roll, all sweeping as they seem
- 52 Thus Harold inly said, and pass'd
 along,
 Yet not insensible to all which here Awoke the jocund birds to early
 song;
 In glens which might have made even exile dear.
 Though on his brow were graven lines austere,
 And tranquil sternness, which had ta'en
 the place
 Of feelings fierier far but less severe, Joy was not always absent from his
 face,
 But o'er it in such scenes would steal with transient trace
- 53 Nor was all love shut from him, though his days
 Of passion had consumed themselves to dust.
 It is in vain that we would coldly
 gaze
 On such as smile upon us, the heart must Leap kindly back to kindness, though disgust
 Hath wean'd it from all worldlings:
 thus he felt,
 For there was soft remembrance, and sweet trust
 In one fond breast, to which his own would melt,
- And in its tenderer hour on that his bosom dwelt.¹
- 54 And he had learn'd to love,—I know not why,
 For this in such as him seems strange of mood,—
 The helpless looks of blooming infancy, Even in its earliest nurture, what sub-
 dued,
 To change like this, a mind so far imbued
 With scorn of man, it little boots to
 know;
 But thus it was; and though in solitude Small power the nipp'd affections have to grow,
 In him this glow'd when all beside had ceased to glow
- 55 And there was one soft breast, as hath been said,
 Which unto his was bound by stronger ties
 Than the church links withal, and,
 though unwed,
 That love was pure, and, far above disguise,
 Had stood the test of mortal enmities Still undivided, and cemented more By peril, dreaded most in female eyes;
 But this was firm, and from a foreign
 shore
 Well to that heart might his these absent greetings pour!

- The castled crag of Drachenfels Frowns o'er the wide and winding Rhine, Whose breast of waters broadly swells Between the banks which bear the vine,
 And hills all rich with blossom'd trees,
 And fields that promise corn² and wine,
 And scatter'd cities crowning these,
 Whose far white walls along them shine,
 Have strew'd a scene, which I should see With double joy wert thou³ with me.

 And hands which offer early flowers,
 Walk smiling o'er this paradise,

 And noble arch in proud decay.

- ³ Byron's sister Augusta

Look o'er this vale of vintage-bowers;
But one thing want these banks of Rhine,— Thy gentle hand to clasp in mine!

3

I send the lilies given to me,
Though long before thy hand they touch,
I know that they must wither'd be,
But yet reject them not as such;
For I have cherish'd them as dear,
Because they yet may meet thine eye,
And guide thy soul to mine even here,
When thou behold'st them drooping nigh,
And know'st them gather'd by the Rhine,
And offer'd from my heart to thine!

4

The river nobly foams and flows,
The charm of this enchanted ground,
And all its thousand turns disclose
Some fresher beauty varying round
The haughtiest breast its wish might bound Through life to dwell delighted here.
Nor could on earth a spot be found To nature and to me so dear,
Could thy dear eyes in following mine Still sweeten more these banks of Rhine,

56 By Coblenz, on a rise of gentle ground,
There is a small and simple pyramid, Crowning the summit of the verdant
mound;
Beneath its base are heroes' ashes hid,
Our enemy's,—but let not that forbid Honor to Marceau! o'er whose early tomb
Tears, big tears, gush'd from the rough soldier's lid.
Lamenting and yet envying such a
doom,
Falling for France, whose rights he bat- 60 tled to resume.

57 Brief, brave, and glorious was his young career,— His mourners were two hosts, his friends and foes:
And fitly may the stranger lingering
here
Pray for his gallant spirit's bright
repose:
For he was Freedom's champion, one of those,
The few in number, who had not o'erstept
The charter to chastise which she be- 61 stows
On such as wield her weapons; he had kept
The whiteness of his soul, and thus men o'er him wept.

58 Here Ehrenbreitstein, with her shatter'd wall
Black with the miner's blast, upon her height
Yet shows of what she was, when shell and ball
Rebounding idly on her strength did
light
A tower of victory! from whence the
flight
Of baffled foes was watch'd along the plain.
But Peace destroy'd what War could never blight,
And laid those proud roofs bare to summer's rain—
On which the iron shower for years had pour'd in vain

59 Adieu to thee, fair Rhine! How long delighted
The stranger fain would linger on his
way!
Thine is a scene alike where souls united Or lonely Contemplation thus might
stray,
And could the ceaseless vultures cease to prey
On self-condemning bosoms, it were
here.
Where Nature, not too sombre nor too gay,
Wild but not rude, awful yet not austere.
Is to the mellow earth as autumn to the
year.

Adieu to thee again! a vain adieu!
There can be no farewell to scene like
thine;
The mind is color'd by thy every hue.
And if reluctantly the eyes resign Their cherish'd gaze upon thee, lovely Rhine!
'Tis with the thankful heart of parting
praise,
More mighty spots may rise, more glaring shine,
But none unite in one attaching maze
The brilliant, fair, and soft,—the glories of old days.

The negligently grand, the fruitful
bloom
Of coming ripeness, the white city's sheen,
The rolling stream, the precipice's
gloom,

- The forest's growth, and Gothic walls
between,
The wild rocks shaped as they had turrets been,
In mockery of man's art, and these withal
A race of faces happy as the scene, Whose fertile bounties here extend to
all,
Still springing o'er thy banks, though empires near them fall
- 62 But these recede. Above me are the Alps,
The palaces of Nature, whose vast
walls
Have pinnacled in clouds their snowy scalps,
And throned Eternity in icy halls Of cold sublimity, where forms and falls
The avalanche — the thunderbolt of
snow!
All that expands the spirit, yet appals.
Gather around these summits, as to
show How earth may pierce to heaven yet leave vain man below
- 63 But ere these matchless heights I dare to scan,
There is a spot should not be pass'd in
vain,— Morat! the proud, the patriot field!
where man May gaze on ghastly trophies of the slain,
Nor blush for those who conquer'd on that plain;
Here Burgundy bequeath'd his tomb-less host,
A bony heap, through ages to remain, Themselves their monument, — the Stygian coast
Unsepulchred they roam'd, and shriek'd each wandering ghost!
- 64 While Waterloo with Cannæ's carnage vies,
Morat and Marathon twin names shall
stand,
They were true Glory's stainless victories,
Won by the unambitious heart and
hand
- Of a proud, brotherly, and civic band, All unbought champions in no princely
cause
Of vice-entail'd Corruption; they no
land Doom'd to bewail the blasphemy of laws
Making kings' rights divine, by some Draconic clause!
- 65 By a lone wall a lonehei column rears
A gray and grief-worn aspect of old days,
'Tis the last remnant of the wreck of
years,
And looks as with the wild-bewilder'd gaze
Of one to stone converted by amaze, Yet still with consciousness, and there it stands
Making a marvel that it not decays,
When the coeval pride of human hands, Levell'd Avenium, hath strew'd her subject lands
- 66 And there—oh! sweet and sacred be the name!—
Julia—the daughter, the devoted—gave Her youth to Heaven, her heart, beneath a claim Nearest to Heaven's, broke o'er a father's grave!
Justice is sworn 'gainst tears, and hers would crave
The life she lived in, but the judge was just,
And then she died on him she could not save
Their tomb was simple, and without a
• bust,
And held within their urn one mind, one heart, one dust
- 67 But these are deeds which should not
pass away,
And names that must not wither, though
the earth
Forgets her empires with a just decay.
The enslavers and the enslaved, their death and birth;
The high, the mountain-majesty of worth

¹ The code of Draco, an Athenian lawgiver of the seventh century, was noted for its free use of the death penalty

² A reference to the story of Julia Alpinia, who was thought to have died after vainly trying to save the life of her father, who was condemned to death as a traitor by Aulus Cæcilia. Byron's information was derived from an inscription on a monument since proved to be forged

³ An allusion to the superstition that the spirits of unburied men could not pass the river Styx, which bounded Hades

- Should be, and shall, survivor of its 71
 ^{woe,}
 And from its immortality look forth In the sun's face, like yonder Alpine
 ^{snow,} Imperishably pure beyond all things below
- 68 Lake Lemman woos me with its crystal
 face,
 The mirror where the stars and mountains view
 The stillness of their aspect in each trace
 Its clear depth yields of their far height
 and hue:
 There is too much of man here, to look through
 With a fit mind the might which I
 behold;
 But soon in me shall Loneliness renew Thoughts hid, but not less cherish'd than of old,
 Ere mingling with the herd had penn'd me in their fold
- 69 To fly from, need not be to hate, mankind.
 All are not fit with them to sin and toil,
 Nor is it discontent to keep the mind Deep in its fountain, lest it overboil In the hot throng, where we become the spoil
 Of our infection, till too late and long We may deplore and struggle with the coil,
 In wretched interchange of wrong for
 wrong
 Midst a contentious world, striving where none are strong
- 70 There, in a moment we may plunge our
 years
 In fatal penitence, and in the blight Of our own soul turn all our blood to
 tears,
 And color things to come with hues of
 Night;
 The race of life becomes a hopeless
 flight
 To those that walk in darkness: on the sea
 The boldest steer but where their ports invite;
 But there are wanderers o'er Eternity¹ Whose bark drives on and on, and anchor'd ne'er shall be.
- Is it not better, then, to be alone,
 And love Earth only for its earthly sake?
 By the blue rushing of the arrowy Rhône,
 Or the pure bosom of its nursing lake,
 Which feeds it as a mother who doth make A fair but froward infant her own
 care,
 Kissing its cries away as these awake, —
 Is it not better thus our lives to wear, Than join the crushing crowd, doom'd to infect or bear?
- 72 I live not in myself, but I become Portion of that around me; and to me High mountains are a feeling,¹ but the hum
 Of human cities torture. I can see Nothing to loathe in nature, save to be A link reluctant in a fleshly chain, Class'd among creatures, when the soul can flee,
 And with the sky, the peak, the heaving plain Of ocean, or the stars, mingle, and not in
 vain
- 73 And thus I am absorb'd, and this is
 life
 I look upon the peopled desert past,
 As on a place of agony and strife, Where, for some sin, to sorrow I was cast,
 To act and suffer, but remount at last With a fresh pinion; which I feel to
 spring,
 Though young, yet waxing vigorous as
 the blast
 Which I would cope with, on delighted
 wing, Spurning the clay-cold bonds which round our being cling.
- 74 And when, at length, the mind shall be all free
 From what it hates in this degraded
 form, Reft of its carnal life, save what shall
 be Existent happier in the fly and worm. —
 When elements to elements conform,
 And dust is as it should be, shall I not Feel all I see, less dazzling, but more warm?

The bodiless thought? the spirit of each spot?
Of which, even now, I share at times the immortal lot?

75 Are not the mountains, waves, and skies, a part Of me and of my soul, as I of them?
Is not the love of these deep in my
heart
With a pure passion? should I not contemn
All objects, if compared with these?
and stem
A tide of suffering, rather than forego Such feelings for the hard and worldly phlegm
Of those whose eyes are only turn'd
below,
Gazing upon the ground, with thoughts which dare not glow?

76 But this is not my theme; and I return To that which is immediate, and require Those who find contemplation in the urn,
To look on one,¹ whose dust was once all
fire,
A native of the land where I respire
The clear air for a while—a passing guest,
Where he became a being,—whose desire Was to be glorious, 'twas a foolish
quest,
The which to gain and keep, he sacrificed all rest

77 Here the self-torturing sophist, wild Rousseau,
The apostle of affliction, he who threw Enchantment over passion, and from
woe
Wrung overwhelming eloquence, first
drew
The breath which made him wretched, yet he knew How to make madness beautiful, and cast
O'er erring deeds and thoughts a heavenly hue
Of words, like sunbeams, dazzling as they past
The eyes, which o'er them shed tears feelingly and fast.

78 His love was passion's essence—as a tree
On fire by lightning, with ethereal flame

¹ Jean Jacques Rousseau (1712-78), who was born in Geneva.

Kindled he was, and blasted; for to be Thus, and enamor'd, were to him the same.

But his was not the love of living dame, Nor of the dead who rise upon our
dreams,

But of ideal beauty, which became In him existence, and o'erflowing teems Along his burning page, distemper'd though it seems.

79 This breathed itself to life in June, this Invested her with all that's wild and
sweet,
This hallow'd, too, the memorable kiss Which every morn his fever'd lip would greet,
From hers, who but with friendship his would meet.¹
But to that gentle touch through brain and breast
Flash'd the thrill'd spirit's love-devouring heat,
In that absorbing sigh perchance more blest
Than vulgar minds may be with all they seek possess

80 His life was one long war with self-sought foes,
Or friends by him self-banish'd, for his mind
Had grown Suspicion's sanctuary, and
chose,
For its own cruel sacrifice, the kind,
'Gainst whom he raged with fury strange and blind
But he was phrensied.—wherefore, who may know?
Since cause might be which skill could never find;
But he was phrensied by disease or woe,
To that worst pitch of all, which wears a reasoning show

81 For then he was inspired, and from him came,
As from the Pythian's mystic cave of yore,
Those oracles which set the world in
flame,
Nor ceased to burn till kingdoms were no more
Did he not this for France? which lay
before

¹ In his Confessions (Bk. 9), Rousseau gives an account of his passion for Madame D'Hel-bach, whom he met every morning for the kiss which was the common salutation of French acquaintances

- Bow'd to the inborn tyranny of years? 85 Broken and trembling to the yoke she
 bore,
 Till by the voice of him and his com-peers
 Roused up to too much wrath, which follows o'ergrown fears?
- 82 They made themselves a fearful monument!
 The wreck of old opinions — things which grew,
 Breathed from the birth of time the veil they rent,
 And what behind it lay, all earth shall
 view
 But good with ill they also overthrew, Leaving but ruins, wherewith to rebuild Upon the same foundation, and renew Dungeons and thrones, which the same hour refill'd,
 As heretofore, because ambition was self-will'd.
- 83 But this will not endure, nor be endured!
 Mankind have felt their strength, and made it felt
 They might have used it better, but allured
 By their new vigor, sternly have they dealt
 On one another; pity ceased to melt With her once natural charities But
 they,
 Who in oppression's darkness caved 87 had dwelt,
 They were not eagles, nourish'd with
 the day,
 What marvel then, at times, if they mistook their prey?
- 84 What deep wounds ever closed without a scar?
 The heart's bleed longest, and but heal
 to wear
 That which disfigures it; and they who
 war
 With their own hopes, and have been vanquish'd, bear
 Silence, but not submission: in his lair Fix'd Passion holds his breath, until 88
 the hour
 Which shall atone for years; none need
 despair:
 It came, it cometh, and will come,—
 the power
 To punish or forgive—in one we shall be slower.
- Clear, placid Leman! thy contrasted
 lake,
 With the wild world I dwelt in, is a thing
 Which warns me, with its stillness, to forsake Earth's troubled waters for a purer
 spring.
 This quiet sail is as a noiseless wing To walt me from distraction; once I loved Torn Ocean's roar, but thy soft murmuring
 Sounds sweet as if a sister's voice re-proved,
 That I with stern delights should e'er have been so moved.
- 86 It is the hush of night, and all between Thy margin and the mountains, dusk, yet clear,
 Mellow'd and mingling, yet distinctly
 seen,
 Save darken'd Jura, whose cap heights
 appear Precipitously steep; and drawing near,
 There breathes a living fragrance from the shore,
 Of flowers yet fresh with childhood; on the ear
 Drops the light drip of the suspended oar,
 Or chirps the grasshopper one good-night carol more;—
- He is an evening reveller, who makes His life an infancy, and sings his fill, At intervals, some bird from out the brakes
 Starts into voice a moment, then is still There seems a floating whisper on the
 hill,
 But that is fancy, for the starlight dews
 All silently their tears of love instil, Weeping themselves away, till they infuse Deep into Nature's breast the spirit of her hues
- Ye stars! which are the poetry of
 heaven!
 If in your bright leaves we would read the fate
 Of men and empires,—'tis to be for-
 given,
 That in our aspirations to be great,
 Our destinies o'erleap their mortal state,

- And claim a kindred with you; for ye are A beauty and a mystery, and create In us such love and reverence from afar,
 That fortune, fame, power, life, have named themselves a star.
- 89 All heaven and earth are still—though not in sleep,¹ But breathless, as we grow when feeling most,
 And silent, as we stand in thoughts too
 deep—All heaven and earth are still. From the high host Of stars, to the lull'd lake and mountain-coast,
 All is concentr'd in a life intense,
 Where not a beam, nor air, nor leaf is lost,
 But hath a part of being, and a sense Of that which is of all Creator and Defence
- 90 Then stirs the feeling infinite, so felt In solitude, where we are least alone.
 A truth, which through our being then doth melt,
 And purifies from self: it is a tone,
 The soul and source of music, which makes known Eternal harmony, and sheds a charm Like to the fabled Cytherea's zone,² Binding all things with beauty, —
 'twould disarm
 The spectre Death, had he substantial power to harm.
- 91 Not vainly did the early Persian make His altar the high places, and the peak Of earth-*o'*ergazing mountains, and thus take
 A fit and unwall'd temple, there to seek
 The Spirit, in whose honor shrines are weak.
 Uprear'd of human hands Come, and compare
 Columns and idol-dwellings, Goth or Greek,
 With Nature's realms of worship, earth
 and air,
 Nor fix on fond abodes to circumscribe thy pray'r!
- Thy sky is changed!—and such a change! Oh night,
 And storm, and darkness, ye are wondrous strong,
 Yet lovely in your strength, as is the
 light
 Of a dark eye in woman! Far along,
 From peak to peak, the rattling crags
 among Leaps the live thunder! Not from one lone cloud,
 But every mountain now hath found a
 tongue,
 And Jura answers, through her misty
 shroud,
 Back to the joyous Alps, who call to her aloud!
- 93 And this is in the night:—Most glorious
 night!
 Thou wert not sent for slumber! let me be
 A sharer in thy fierce and far delight,— A portion of the tempest and of thee!
 How the lit lake shines, a phosphoric
 sea,
 And the big rain comes dancing to the
 earth!
 And now again 'tis black,—and now the glee
 Of the loud hills shakes with its mountain-mirth,
 As if they did rejoice o'er a young earthquake's birth.
- 94 Now, where the swift Rhone cleaves his way between Heights which appear as lovers who have parted¹
 In hate, whose mining depths so intervene,
 That they can meet no more, though broken-hearted;
 Though in their souls, which thus each other thwarted,
 Love was the very root of the fond rage Which blighted their life's bloom, and then departed—
 Itself expired, but leaving them an age Of years all winters,—war within themselves to wage
- 95 Now, where the quick Rhone thus hath cleft his way.
 The mightiest of the storms hath ta'en his stand.

- For here, not one, but many, make their
play,
And fling their thunder-bolts from hand to hand,
Flashing and cast around; of all the
band,
The brightest through these parted hills 99 hath fork'd
His lightnings,—as if he did understand
That in such gaps as desolation work'd, There the hot shaft should blast whatever therein lurk'd.
- 96 Sky, mountains, rivers, winds, lake, lightning! ye!
With night, and clouds, and thunder, and a soul
To make these felt and feeling, well may be Things that have made me watchful, the far roll
Of your departing voices, is the knoll!
Of what in me is sleepless,—if I rest But where of ye, O tempests! is the 100 goal?
Are ye like those within the human
breast?
Or do ye find, at length, like eagles, some high nest?
- 97 Could I embody and unbosom now That which is most within me,—could I wreak
My thoughts upon expression, and thus throw Soul, heart, mind, passions, feelings, strong or weak,
All that I would have sought, and all I seek,
Bear, know, feel, and yet breathe—into 101
one word,
And that one word were lightning, I would speak;
But as it is, I live and die unheard,
With a most voiceless thought, sheathing it as a sword.
- 98 The morn is up again, the dewy morn,
With breath all incense, and with cheek all bloom,
Laughing the clouds away with playful scorn,
And living as if earth contain'd no tomb,—
And glowing into day: we may resume
The march of our existence: and thus I,
- Still on thy shores, fair Leman! may find room
And food for meditation, nor pass by Much, that may give us pause, if ponder'd fittingly.
- Clarens! sweet Clarens, birthplace of deep Love!
Thine air is the young breath of passionate thought;
Thy trees take root in Love, the snows
above
The very glaciers have his colors caught.
And sun-set into rose-hues sees them
wrought
By rays which sleep there lovingly: the rocks,
The permanent crags, tell here of Love, who sought
In them a refuge from the worldly shocks,
Which stir and sting the soul with hope that woos, then mocks.
- ('larens' by heavenly feet thy paths are trod,— Undying Love's, who here ascends a throne
To which the steps are mountains;
where the god
Is a pervading life and light,—so shown Not on those summits solely, nor alone In the still cave and forest; o'er the flower
His eye is sparkling, and his breath
hath blown,
His soft and summer breath, whose tender power Passes the strength of storms in their most desolate hour.
- All things are here of him; from the black pines,
Which are his shade on high, and the loud roar
Of torrents, where he listeneth, to the vines
Which slope his green path downward to the shore,
Where the bow'd waters meet him, and
adore,
Kissing his feet with murmurs; and the
wood,
The covert of old trees, with trunks all hoar,
But light leaves, young as joy, stands where it stood,
Offering to him, and his, a populous
solitude.

102 A populous solitude of bees and birds,
And fairy-form'd and many-color'd things, Who worship him with notes more sweet than words,
And innocently open their glad wings, Fearless and full of life. the gush of
springs,
And fall of lofty fountains, and the bend Of stirring branches, and the bud which brings
The swiftest thought of beauty, here extend,
Mingling, and made by Love, unto one¹⁰⁶ mighty end

103 He who hath loved not, here would learn that lore,
And make his heart a spirit, he who knows
That tender mystery, will love the more,
For this is Love's recess, where vain men's woes,
And the world's waste, have driven him far from those.
For 'tis his nature to advance or die;
He stands not still, but or decays, or¹⁰⁷
grows
Into a boundless blessing, which may vie
With the immortal lights, in its eternity!

104 'Twas not for fiction chose Rousseau this spot,
Peopling it with affections, but he
found
It was the scene which Passion must allot
To the mind's purified beings; 'twas
the ground
Where early Love his Psyche's zone unbound,¹
And hallow'd it with loveliness. 'tis lone,
And wonderful, and deep, and hath a¹⁰⁸
sound,
And sense, and sight of sweetness, here
the Rhone Hath spread himself a couch, the Alps have rear'd a throne.

105 Lausanne¹ and Ferney¹ ye have been the abodes
Of names which unto you bequeath'd a name,²

Mortals, who sought and found, by dangerous roads,
A path to perpetuity of fame.
They were gigantic minds, and their sleep aim Was, Titan-like, on daring doubts to pile
Thoughts which should call down thunder, and the flame
Of Heaven again assail'd, if Heaven the
while
On man and man's research could deign do more than smile

The one was fire and fickleness,¹ a child, Most mutable in wishes, but in mind A wit as various,—gay, grave, sage, or wild,— Historian, bard, philosopher, combined;
He multiplied himself among mankind.
The Proteus of their talents, but his own Breathed most in ridicule,—which, as the wind,
Blew where it list'd,² laying all things prone,— Now to o'erthrow a fool, and now to shake a throne

The other, deep and slow, exhausting
thought,
And having wisdom with each studious
year,
In meditation dwelt, with learning
wrought,
And shaped his weapon with an edge severe,
Sapping a solemn creed with solemn sneer,
The lord of irony,—that master-spell, Which stung his foes to wrath, which grew from fear,
And doom'd him to the zealot's ready
Hell,
Which answers to all doubts so eloquently
well.

Yet, peace be with their ashes,—for by
them,
If merited, the penalty is paid,
It is not ours to judge,—far less condemn;
The hour must come when such things shall be made Known unto all, or hope and dread allay'd
By slumber, on one pillow, in the dust.

Which, thus much we are sure, must lie decay'd;
And when it shall revive, as is our trust,
'Twill be to be forgiven, or suffer what is just.

- 109 But let me quit man's works, again to read
His Maker's, spread around me, and suspend
This page, which from my reveries I
feed,
Until it seems prolonging without end
The clouds above me to the white Alps¹¹³
tend,
And I must pierce them, and survey whate'er
May be permitted, as my steps I bend
To their most great and growing region.
where
The earth to her embrace compels the powers of an

- 110 Italia! too, Italia! looking on thee, Full flashes on the soul the light of ages, Since the fierce Carthaginian¹ almost won thee,
To the last halo of the chiefs and sages Who glorify thy consecrated pages.
Thou wert the throne and grave of empires, still
The fount at which the panting mind¹¹⁴ assuages
Her thirst of knowledge, quaffing there her fill,
Flows from the eternal source of Rome's imperial hill.

- 111 Thus far have I proceeded in a theme Renew'd with no kind auspices —to feel We are not what we have been, and to deem
We are not what we should be, and to steel
The heart against itself, and to conceal, With a proud caution, love, or hate, or aught,— Passion or feeling, purpose, grief or zeal,—
Which is the tyrant spirit of our¹¹⁵
thought,
Is a stern task of soul —no matter,—it is taught.

- 112 And for these words, thus woven into
song,
It may be that they are a harmless wile,—

The coloring of the scenes which fleet
along,
Which I would seize, in passing, to beguile
My breast, or that of others, for a while.
Fame is the thirst of youth, but I am
not So young as to regard men's frown or
smile,
As loss or guerdon of a glorious lot;
I stood and stand alone,—remember'd or forgot

I have not loved the world, nor the world me,¹
I have not flatter'd its rank breath, nor
bow'd
To its idolatries a patient knee, Nor eom'd my cheek to smiles, nor cried aloud
In worship of an echo, in the crowd
They could not deem me one of such,
I stood Amongst them, but not of them, in a shroud
Of thoughts which were not their thoughts, and still could,
Had I not filed² my mind, which thus itself subdued

I have not loved the world, nor the world me,— But let us part fair foes, I do believe, Though I have found them not, that there may be Words which are things, hopes which will not deceive,
And virtues which are merciful, nor weave Snare for the failing. I would also deem O'er others' griefs that some sincerely grieve,
That two, or one, are almost what they seem,
That goodness is no name, and happiness no dream.

My daughter! with thy name this song
began;
My daughter! with thy name thus much shall end,
I see thee not, I hear thee not, but none Can be so wrapt in thee, thou art the
friend
To whom the shadows of far years extend:

¹ See Manfred, II, 2, 50 ff. (p. 557)

² defiled (See Macbeth, III, 1, 64)

Albeit my brow thou never shouldst
 behold,
 My voice shall with thy future visions 1 blend,
 And reach into thy heart, when mine is cold,
 A token and a tone, even from thy father's mould

116 To aid thy mind's development, to watch Thy dawn of little joys, to sit and see Almost thy very growth, to view thee catch Knowledge of objects,—wonders yet to
 thee!
 To hold thee lightly on a gentle knee,
 And print on thy soft cheek a parent's kiss,—
 This, it should seem, was not reserved
 for me;
 Yet this was in my nature as it is,
 I know not what is there, yet something like to this.

117 Yet, though dull hate as duty should be taught,
 I know that thou wilt love me, though my name
 Should be shut from thee, as a spell still fraught
 With desolation, and a broken claim Though the grave closed between us,—
 'twere the same,
 I know that thou wilt love me, though to drain
 My blood from out thy being were an aim,
 And an attainment,—all would be in
 vain,—
 Still thou wouldst love me, still that more than life retain

118 The child of love, though born in bitterness,
 And nurtured in convulsion,—of thy sire
 These were the elements, and thine no less
 As yet such are around thee, but thy fire Shall be more temper'd, and thy hope far higher.
 Sweet be thy cradled slumbers! O'er
 the sea
 And from the mountains where I now respire,
 Fain would I waft such blessing upon
 thee,
 As, with a sigh, I deem thou might'st have been to me.

From CANTO IV
 1817 1818

1 I stood in Venice, on the Bridge of Sighs;
 A palace and a prison on each hand:
 I saw from out the wave her structures
 rise
 As from the stroke of the enchanter's
 wand:
 A thousand years their cloudy wings expand Around me, and a dying Glory smiles O'er the far times, when many a subject
 land Look'd to the winged Lion's marble piles,¹ Where Venice sat in state, throned on her hundred isles!

2 She looks a sea Cybele, fresh from ocean,
 Rising with her tiara of proud towers
 At any distance, with majestic motion,
 A ruler of the waters and their powers, And such she was,—her daughters had their dowers
 From spoils of nations, and the exhaust-less East Pour'd in her lap all gems in sparkling
 showers
 In purple was she robed, and of her feast
 Monarchs partook, and deem'd their dignity increased

3 In Venice Tasso's echoes are no more,
 And silent rows the songless gondolier;²
 Her palaces are crumbling to the shore, And music meets not always now the
 ear:
 Those days are gone—but Beauty still is here.
 States fall, arts fade—but Nature doth not die,
 Nor yet forget how Venice once was
 dear,
 The pleasant place of all festivity,
 The revel of the earth, the masque of Italy!

4 But unto us she hath a spell beyond Her name in story, and her long array Of mighty shadows, whose dim forms descend

¹The winged Lion of St Mark stands on a column near the Ducal Palace ²Before the capture of Venice by Napoleon, in 1797, the gondoliers were accustomed to sing stanzas of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. See Rogers's The Gondola (p. 211).

Above the dogeless city's vanish'd sway;¹

Ours is a trophy which will not decay
With the Rialto; Shylock and the Moor, And Pierre, cannot be swept or worn
away—

The keystones of the arch! though all were o'er,
For us repeopled were the solitary shore

- 5 The beings of the mind are not of clay.
Essentially immortal, they create And multiply in us a brighter ray And more beloved existence: that which Fate
Prohibits to dull life, in this our state Of mortal bondage, by these spirits supplied,
First exiles, then replaces what we hate.
Watering the hearts whose early flowers have died,
And with a fresher growth replenishing
the void.

- 13 Before St Mark still glow his steeds of brass,²
Their gilded collars glittering in the
sun,
But is not Doria's menace come to pass?
Are they not bridled?—Venice, lost and
won,
Her thirteen hundred years of freedom
done, Sinks, like a seaweed, into whence she
rose!
Better be whelm'd beneath the waves,
and shun,
Even in destruction's depth, her foreign
foes,
From whom submission wrings an infamous repose

- 14 In youth she was all glory,—a new Tyre,
Her very by-word sprung from victory.
The "Planter of the Lion,"³ which through fire
And blood she bore o'er subject earth
and sea;

Though making many slaves, herself still free,

And Europe's bulwark 'gainst the Ottomite,⁴

Witness Troy's rival, Candia! Vouch it, ye

Immortal waves that saw Lepanto's fight!

For ye are naimes no time nor tyranny can blight

- 15 Statues of glass—all shiver'd—the long file
Of her dead Doges are declined to dust; But where they dwelt, the vast and sumptuous pile Bespeaks the pageant of their splendid
trust,
Their sceptre broken, and their sword in rust,
Have yielded to the stranger's empty
halls,
Thin streets, and foreign aspects, such as must Too oft remind her who and what enthralled,
Have flung a desolate cloud o'er Venice's lovely walls

- 16 When Athens' armies fell at Syracuse,⁵ And fetter'd thousands bore the yoke of
war,
Redemption rose up in the Attic Muse,
Her voice their only ransom from afar.
See! as they chant the tragic hymn, the car
Of the o'ermaster'd victor stops, the reins Fall from his hands, his idle scimitar Starts from its belt—he rends his cap-tive's chains,
And bids him thank the hard for freedom and his strains.

- 17 Thus, Venice, if no stronger claim were
thine,
Were all thy proud historic deeds forgot,
Thy choral memory of the Bard divine, Thy love of Tasso, should have cut the knot

² The famous bronze steeds of St. Mark's Church, which the Genoese commander Doria said in 1379, he should bridle before giving the Venetians peace.

³ The Lion of St Mark was the emblem of the Republic of Venice.

⁴ The Venetians defended Candia, in Crete, against the Turks for 24 years. Troy was besieged 10 years by the Greeks.

⁵ Plutarch relates, in his Life of Nicias, that after the Athenians had been defeated and captured at Syracuse (5th cent B.C.), those who could recite passages from the works of Euripides were set free. See Browning's Reluctation's Adventure, 125 ff.

- Which ties thee to thy tyrants; and thy lot Is shameful to the nations,—most of all, Albion! to thee the Ocean queen should not Abandon Ocean's children, in the fall 26 Of Venice, think of thine, despite thy watery wall
- 18 I loved her from my boyhood, she to me
Was as a fairy city of the heart, Rising like water-columns from the sea
Of joy the sojourn, and of wealth the mart;
And Otway, Radcliffe, Schiller, Shak-speare's art.¹
Had stamp'd her image in me, and even so,
Although I found her thus, we did not
part,
Perchance even dearer in her day of
woe,
Than when she was a boast, a marvel, and a show
- 19 I can repeople with the past—and of The present there is still for eye and
thought,
And meditation chasten'd down, enough,
And more, it may be, than I hoped or
sought,
And of the happiest moments which were wrought Within the web of my existence, some From thee, fair Venice! have their colors caught
There are some feelings Time cannot benumb,
Nor Torture shake, or mine would now be cold and dumb.
- 25 But my soul wanders. I demand it back
To meditate amongst decay, and stand A ruin amidst ruins, there to track Fall'n states and buried greatness, o'er a land
Which was the mightiest in its old command,
And is the loveliest, and must ever be The master-mould of Nature's heavenly
hand;
- Wherein were cast the heroic and the
free,
The beautiful, the brave, the lords of earth
and sea,
The commonwealth of kings, the men of Rome!
And even since, and now, fair Italy!
Thou art the garden of the world the
home
Of all Art yields, and Nature can decree,
Even in thy desert, what is like to thee?
Thy very weeds are beautiful, thy waste
More rich than other climes' fertility; Thy wreck a glory, and thy ruin graced
